His name anywhere and in any way it must have been on the Cross, for His whole life led up to and found its completion there. And if Jesus on the Cross is the Revealer of God, then is the Cross not only the symbol and token of a divine redemption but of the yet deeper truth of the divine nature and character and will.

The Cross speaks of humility, of patience and infinite loving-kindness, of ministry and suffering on account of and in behalf of others, of utter self-sacrifice in love, as well as of the conquest and putting away of sin. Does this seem incongruous with our notions of the sovereignty and majesty and glory of God? Then our notions must be wrong, the reflections, perhaps, of earthly thrones and dominions. We have read even our Old Testament to little purpose if we have not seen there a God who humbles Himself, Who bears the burdens and suffers under the pains and is afflicted in all the afflictions of His people. And we read the story of the life of Jesus amiss if we suppose that these things came upon Him otherwise than as that will of God which He came to do, or that this will was other than the expression of the inmost character of God His Father.

"There standeth one among you whom ye know not," said the Baptist to his inquisitors, referring to the Christ. And they never did know Him, most of them, because they could not understand or accept a Christ coming down into the actual conditions of their own lives and identifying Himself with His people. And to-day men make the same mistake, looking afar for a God above the heavens, where He is, indeed, but where they cannot apprehend or understand Him, and knowing Him not standing among them, about their paths and about their beds, in the things which most intimately concern them, working with them, sharing with them, suffering with them, serving them, imparting Himself to their imperfect, hampered and hungering human lives. It is here we must know Him, for here He reveals Himself and here we are bidden to be like Him. Is it any wonder that the Cross, so mysteriously, so necessarily interwoven with the warp and woof of our lives, should be discovered also in the life of God, the very mark by which we know Him as our God forever and ever? And conversely, if the Cross is a token of the nature and character of God, if that which it implies to us is, in its deepest meaning, inwrought with the very Life Eternal and Divine, can we marvel that it must needs find place in our lives which He means to have grow up unto Him and be conformed to His own image?

The Cross, therefore, that we are to take up and bear after Christ who is the Revelation of God, is not something to be wondered at, to be explained away as a thing fortuitous or adventitious, to be deprecated or, if possible, avoided. It is not only a means but an end of our training. "The fellowship of His sufferings" follows, in the desiderata of St. Paul, "the power of His resurrection." It must be a very blessed and glorious experience, a part of the heavenly inheritance of the saints, to come to know the Cross as Christ knows it in the midst of the throne!

In these days of suffering and sacrifice and self-surrender it is well to think on these things; and near the Cross of Calvary to seek their deepest and truest meaning for us.

Bulletin of the Board of Religious Education of the Province of Sewanee. The first number of this Bulletin, from the University Press, Sewanee, received from the Rev. Gardiner L. Tucker, Field Secretary, Houma, Louisiana, is an attractive summary of the religious educational agencies connected with the Church in the Province, from the Christian home to which God first commits His little ones for rudimentary and essential training in His knowledge and admonition, to the Theological Department of the University of the South where they may learn to teach others also. It strikes us as one of the most practical publications of its kind that we have seen. It ought to be carefully read by every Churchman in the Province, not only for its brief and sensible presentation of a most important subject but that they may know about their own Church schools and the aims set before them, that they may be guided in the education of their own children and be able to advise others of what the Church has to offer them on this line.

The Foreword of the Bulletin is as follows:

The great task that confronts the Church of Christ in America to-day is: To hold the nation true to the high ideals that have animated our people in entering the war;

To train men and women for the great reconstruction that must follow the great war;

To win the world for Christ and His Kingdom.

The old order of things in this world is passing away. There must come a new order, wherein shall dwell righteousness.

For this work of reconstruction the educational system of America must train the growing generation.

An educational system without religion will be as food without salt—unfit for the nurture of well-rounded lives, and impotent to produce character.

The Christian Church must furnish the religious element in American education.

There are five great forces of religious education: The home, the church, the school, the college, the seminary.

The Lesson Learned

N. B. T.

Half way between two Easters,
While still the earth was sweet,
I met that shadow on the road
That all mankind must meet—

The ancient shape of Sorrow,
That beckoned me apart;
Light of my eyes it took away,
Heart of my very heart.

To-day the sad earth quickens
As fragrant April nears,
All thronged about with memories
Of lost and lovely years.

And I, who listened trembling
For the first Easter bell,
I find within my spirit wrought
A tender miracle.

The old Judean garden
Seems close as yesterday,
The fair, bright dawn, the broken seal,
The great stone rolled away.

My soul looks forth on Easter
With understanding eyes
That tears have washed of bitterness,
And sorrow has made wise;

That see with crystal vision
What they had missed before—
Life as a strong white angel
And death a shining door.

O risen Christ and holy,
O Love that liveth yet,
Half way between two Easters
It was Thyself I met!

"What is the blood of Christ?" asked Livingstone of his own solitary soul in the last months of his African wanderings. "It is Himself. It is the inherent and everlasting mercy of God made apparent to human eyes and ears. The everlasting love was disclosed by our Lord's life and death. It showed that God forgives because He loves to forgive.—J. Clifford.

THE CHURCH PENSION FUND.

Letter from the Bishop of Virginia.

Mr. Editor: Please give me a little space in which to set right misapprehensions which have grown out of your recent articles on the Church Pension Fund.

Evidently, to my mind there are those who want the Church Pension Fund, first, to increase the pensions of men retiring after March 1, 1917, and, second, to give something like the automatic pension of the General Clergy Relief Fund to those who retired before March 1, 1917.

Let us consider the second class first as simplest to treat. Here I speak from the point of view of the Diocese of Virginia. Our Diocese has for many years enjoyed the benefit of a Disabled Clergy Fund most sympathetically and admirably managed. Every deserving and needy clergyman who retired had a right to his share in the benefits of that Fund, and moreover, the Bishop could recommend to the General Clergy Relief Fund any deserving and needy clergyman who had given up the active ministry. It is fair to presume that every Diocese having a Clergy Relief Fund did as did Virginia.

And what then was the action of Virginia in merging with the Pension Fund? This Diocese made a distinct stipulation as a condition of its going into the Pension Fund that every disabled clergyman should receive from the Pension Fund what he is receiving from these Relief Funds. The General Clergy Relief Fund merged with the Pension Fund on the same condition, and to this Fund every clergyman in the Church had the privilege of applying. Some Dioceses had no Disabled Clergy Fund, but the clergy of these Dioceses were not without recourse. The General Clergy Relief Fund made provision for them.

Now note that every clergyman who retired before March 1, 1917, will receive from the Pension Fund exactly what he received from his Diocese or from the General Clergy Relief Fund or from the two combined. You may depend that needy and deserving clergymen applied, or some friend, perhaps their Bishop, applied for them to these two sources of aid. But if no such application was made the Church cannot and must not be charged with neglect or partiality. You, in the kindness of your heart, want the aged and disabled clergy to have more: so do I. It would be a delight to me to see every disabled man who has done the work of the ministry in the spirit of the Master, made comfortable and easy in mind by the Church at whatever cost, but no well informed person will say that discrimination has been made against any class by the Church Pension Fund. Yet some highly intelligent people have been led into this damaging error by articles which have appeared in your columns.

The other matter which gives you deep concern is one in which, as in the case just mentioned, I have much sympathy with you. It is the small amount of pension given to those clergymen who retired after March 1, 1917, or who will retire before their parishes build up a valuable annuity for them. Six hundred dollars a year is promised them. We may leave out of account the prospect of any increase on that minimum; the cases affected will be so few and so far in the future. But surely, six hundred dollars is not a pension to be despised. It is a larger amount than some clergymen have ever spent on themselves in any year of their lives. In a small family it may make the difference between self-respect and confessed indigence. In a word, it is worth fully as much as it claims to be worth. And better still, it is an earned pension. Who would not rather enjoy the acknowledged fruit of his labors than to live on alms, bountiful indeed but inevitably irksome first or last to the giver?

Do not mind my putting these thoughts into words. They are yours as well as mine. I am simply bringing out into high relief some facts about the Pension Fund. The facts are these:

First. The method of the Pension Fund is ultimately to give each parish the privilege of accumulating a pension for its rector. The process has already begun.

Second. For the men now at work, provision to the amount of six hundred dollars; as almost all of them will be disabled before their parishes can accumulate enough to make up a pension as large as six hundred dollars.

Third. To merge into the Pension Fund existing agencies of Clergy Relief, giving to every man who is helped by those agencies, without regard to the date of his retirement, exactly what he has been receiving.

Now the second and third of these objects require large sums of money. I am not a financier nor an actuary nor even a skilled bookkeeper, but when the men who are managing the Pension Fund without reward and at the expense of labor and valuable time, tell me that two millions of dollars have been set aside to liquidate the liabilities of the General Clergy Relief Fund, one million to liquidate the liabilities of Diocesan Funds not yet merged, and something like four or five hundred thousand to liquidate the liabilities of Diocesan Funds already merged, I do not see how I can question the wisdom of the Trustees' action any more than I can question their self-sacrifice in attending to this difficult business. The Trustees say that when the General Clergy Relief Fund has liquidated its liabilities it shall be expended according to the intention of the donors. What more can any one ask?

You will observe, my dear Southern Churchman, that I have spoken only of the disabled clergy in all that I have said, but I have not forgotten the widows and orphans of deceased clergymen, for these are included in all mergers and in the plans of the Pension Funds. Without knowing the figures, I should say they are numerically at least three to one of the ordained men.

Reviewing what I have written, it seems to me that the eight million and four-fifths or so is disposed of for the present. Some of these days the Trustees may be called on to redistribute the money then in hand, but now, you, as a fair and reasonable and candid man, must see, and doubtless will say, that the Pension Fund is beginning its work under wise and able management, giving every man a chance, excluding none from its benefits and using the money committed to its care for the best interests of its beneficiaries.

Remember, moreover, that the nine million of dollars, which bulk fully as largely in my eyes as in yours or those of any other person, will not be in the hands of the Trustees, in cash, for several years. Some of the payments are in four annual installments.

And finally, if any set of men wishes to give to needy clergymen of any age whatsoever, they shall certainly have every encouragement from me; but along with my good will, and as an instance of the same, I deeply, strongly, insistently advise that the Bishops of such prospective beneficiaries be first consulted.

CHURCH PENSION FUND—AGAIN.

Mr. Editor: I want to thank you publicly for the splendid editorial in the Southern Churchman of March 2, 1918, entitled "The Church Pension Fund and Its Initial Reserve Fund," and tell you we stand back of you in your plea for the neglected clergy of the Church. It is brave, clear and convincing. It is a challenge which is honestly given and should be honestly met.

I cannot hope to add anything to the letter of Dr. Egar in the Southern Churchman of November 24, 1917, and to your editorials, but I feel so intensely in the matter I trust you will let me give expression to two points.

The dissatisfaction of the clergy of the Church, and there is dissatisfaction among both clergy and laity, that our brethren who served the Church before March, 1917, should be proscribed, is largely due to the fact (I wish to be corrected if I am mistaken here) that the rules governing the distribution of the moneys of the Pension Fund were not understood from the first, and the reason is that these rules were divulged "at sundry times and in divers manners." For instance, the first time, if I remember aright, seeing the rule as to the exclusion of clergy retiring before March 1, 1917, from the benefits of the Fund, was in the New York Churchman, and in that paper alone, some months after the system was generally acceded to. I recall that at a meeting of the clergy of one of our Dioceses after the system was accepted by a number of the conventions of the Church, not one was sure what the provisions were. They accepted the new system largely upon faith and have been disappointed. Again in the last Living Church Annual there is a new provision, new at least to me, viz., "The minimum ($600) not promised if ordination took place at thirty-six or over." What the next pronouncement shall be no one may conjecture. I am free to say, and I believe there are many who feel as I do, that had I known of the proposed injustice to the older clergy I should not have voted for the Pension System nor aided it. There is another defect which is very grave which, for lack of time, I cannot specify.

To my mind there is a serious defect in the management of the Fund. This is a large trust and deserves the attention of big men. The Trustees are all busy men who have not time for the thought and work involved. For instance, Bishop Lawrence, the President, with the work of a large Diocese and as a member of the War Commission, has more than one man can do. We admire the courage and temerity of men like Mr. McAdoo and the Bishop. The result is the work is left in the hands of the Secretary, who masterfully moulds its policy. With all respect I would suggest that the Secretary should confine himself to the duties of Secretary, and that a clergyman, either Bishop or Priest, who has the sympathy and financial ability for such work be appointed President and make it his life work. And who in the American Church is comparable to Bishop Lawrence, could he give up himself to the work?

The clergy are entitled to a man of the cloth, of large sympathies, who knows his brethren and their difficulties, with whom they may deal. Were this done I feel sure that a hard-hearted business point of view would give place to the Christ spirit as it is seen in the twenty-fifth chapter of Matthew.

THE BISHOP JONES CASE.

Mr. Editor: There is considerable discussion about the so-called Bishop Jones' case. But the real, pertinent question is, Has his usefulness come to an end as Bishop of Utah? Had he been Bishop of some other Diocese, the question might not have arisen. But in Utah the Mormons comprise a majority of the population. They are unreservedly and enthusiastically loyal and patriotic. A pacifist Bishop there would become so decidedly unpopular that it would be useless to expect our Church to make any impression on the Mormons. His attitude would be taken as the attitude of the Church. Such is the penalty of "leadership."

In Utah the great question is how to overcome Mormonism. The Mormons have assigned some of their most sumptuous and commodious buildings to Red Cross work. This humane work is here carried on in a systematic manner and on a colossal scale. A contrary attitude on the part of our Church would cause them to point at us the finger of scorn and taunt us with being outside the pale of common humanity.

The question does not apply to war in general. It applies to this war at this time. It should not make or unmake "precedents." It has nothing to do with any other case now or in the future. Let each case be considered on its own merits. If we decide each case correctly we need not worry about "precedents." It is always a right precedent to do right.

On the Committee of Investigation were some Bishops who were specially well qualified to come to a right decision. If the usefulness of the Bishop of Utah has come to an end in Utah, then that would seem to decide the case.

AMERICAN CHURCH INSTITUTE FOR NEGROES.

A Portion of the Report and Address of Rev. Robert W. Patton, D. D., Provincial Secretary, delivered at the Synod of the Province of Sewanee,
Charleston, S. C., November 13th, 14th and 15th, 1917.

Another part of the work which you and the general Church have given me is that of representative of the American Church Institute for Negroes. I wish that the allotted time permitted me to deal much more fully with this supremely important part of our responsibilities. I am firmly persuaded that no part of this Church's work in America, and perhaps in the world, is more vital to us than the work for the negroes. Of the work we are doing for the negro race, none of it seems to me so promising of large immediate results as that committed by the Board of Missions to the American Church Institute for Negroes. Its special responsibility is for the Church's High and Industrial Schools for negroes, and the Bishop Payne Divinity School. Its work and the money it spends is exclusively in the Southern States, and all but one of the schools it now supervises and helps to support are in the Province of Sewanee. It has done and is doing a work of immense importance for this Province, for the Church and for the whole of America.

I attended this summer by invitation of the Commissioner of Education of the United States Government a Conference on Negro Education in Washington. The commissioner, Dr. Claxton, a Southern man, literally begged the churches to awaken to a more serious sense of responsibility for this service to the nation. He said that the authorities of the national government and of the States are literally dependent upon the Church Industrial and High Schools for negroes to train, not only the teachers in the public schools, but leaders of the race in every walk of life. He said that to meet the pressing needs for teachers in the public schools for negroes, if they are to be properly trained in mind and character the churches must multiply their efforts fourfold, and especially perfect and improve the equipment of those schools already established by the churches. It was a clarion call from the government to the Church to come over and help them in this time and in the days to follow of national peril. The American Church Institute for negroes was given distinguished mention at this conference at the capitol.

The schools which the American Church Institute now makes appropriations to, are St. Paul's School, Lawrenceville, Va.; St. Augustine's, Raleigh, N. C.; St. Athanasius, Brunswick, Ga. The Fort Valley School, Fort Valley, Ga.; St. Paul's, Atlanta; St. Mark's, Birmingham; The Vicksburg Industrial, Vicksburg, Miss.; St. Mary's, Columbia, S. C., and the Bishop Payne Divinity School, Petersburg, Va., the only Divinity School of our Church in the whole world, outside of Africa, devoted exclusively to preparing negro young men for the priesthood.

The institute hopes to raise funds enough not only to greatly improve every school now on its list, but to provide the means to enable every Bishop in the South to maintain at least one thoroughly equipped Church Industrial School. On the rolls of the schools assisted by the Church Institute there were registered last year 2,600 negro boys and girls, many of them to be the future leaders of their race. Hundreds were refused admission because there was no room for them in the schools.

It is sometimes asked why this work cannot be done solely through the Board of Missions. The answer is that the Board itself ten years ago authorized the organization of the institute as an auxiliary to itself, just because it felt that this work was so pressing as a national Christian responsibility that over and above what the Board with its numerous responsibilities in all the world could do, there was needed a special corporation of its own creation to give special emphasis to this one cause.

Why does the negro to-day loom so large not only as a great responsibility to the Church and nation, but our most precious undeveloped asset? As the world war rocks the confidence of the nations, while freedom trembles for its life, and the thrones of organized selfishness totter in dark chaos to their fall, there emerges one strong, unshaken, unconquerable cry—I am the resurrection and the life, and in as much as ye have done it unto one of the least, of these my brethren, ye have done it unto me. The strength and permanence of democracy awaits the day, which is being summoned out of the night of this war, when the strong shall remain victor, only as he gives his strength to the weak.

In His wise providence God has given to the Anglo-Saxon, through the historic Church, which is the spiritual mother of democracy, the leadership in the definition and defense of political freedom. The wars of the Anglo-Saxon in previous centuries for the defense of democracy have been chiefly wars within the race itself. The civil wars in England, the war of our American Revolution, our bitter civil wars in America were gigantic struggles within the soul of the race itself struggling to purge its own mind and heart that it might look upon the God-lit hills of freedom.

For the first time in the history of this race God calls the nations to go beyond its borders, to cease to hold so divine a gift for itself alone, to refuse to be content with being an asylum and to battle that not only in America, but in the whole world from no human being and from no race shall be withheld the privilege of climbing those far heights to which God and the human heart call them. Surely if ever there was one, this is a holy war.

But lo! As the Anglo-Saxon, especially the American comes out of himself with heart aglow and eyes afire with sacred indignation to deliver the world from bondage, there stands in the way ever against him the angel of the living God, and pointing to the black man utters the prophetic words, "Thou shalt not see my face except thy brother be with thee." God has set this strange irony of fate in our very pathway. We cannot conquer in this battle for freedom, we the strong privileged Anglo-Saxon, without the help of the American negro. If the negroes were to strike in the cotton fields of the South, our own and our allies' guns would be silenced and our soldiers would freeze in the snows of the Italian Alps; and in the wind-swept trenches of Northern France.

Thus the Anglo-Saxon, in his pride of racial superiority must stoop to conquer. For the first time in history he is compelled by the will and love of God for all men, to take the hand of his former slave, and looking in his eye, say, "My brother, I had forgotten thee. Thou wast lost, and are found."

As the nation in its strength discovers at last that its final strength is in its weakness, in the ten million negroes of the South, shall the Church forget, shall the South forget—we who loved the negroes in the days of old, that debts of love can never be discharged. I want to ask this Synod to send a message and pledge of material support to the American Church Institute for Negroes as part of our tribute to make this world safe for democracy.

Dividing the allegiance of the world to-day while the nations are wheeling into line, stand two men and both are strong. One is strong with the strength of a Centaur: his right hand wields a dripping sword, his face, his mouth stream with the blood of the victims he has sacrificed for himself. He is without mercy and might. Standing removed and yet among and above us is another man. He too is strong and a man of blood, but it is His own blood which furrows His face and the thorns still enwreath His brow. He wields no sword though His own side is pierced with a spear, and Mercy is His name. He is the strong Son of God, our King. Which of these men shall conquer? Thou shalt conquer, oh, Galilean! when Thy people follow Thee. Shall we follow Him now?

The Synod adopted the following resolutions:

Whereas, having been deeply impressed through the report of the Provincial Secretary, Rev. R. W. Patton, D. D., of the great service being rendered the negro race in the South and our whole country through the Church's Industrial High Schools for Negroes, and the Bishop Payne Divinity School—all located in the South, and bearing in mind that the General Board of Missions wisely authorized the organization of the American Church Institute for Negroes, as an auxiliary to itself to advise, inspect and make appeals for the support of these invaluable schools, therefore:

Resolved, The Bishops, Clergy and Laity delegates to this Synod hereby express to the American Church Institute for Negroes this Synod's profound appreciation of the indispensable service and pledges not only its moral support, but in every way in its power stands ready to co-operate for securing in the South financial support.

Resolved, That in view of the expressed intentions of the Board of the American Church Institute to ask the Board of Missions at its next session in December for certain special appropriations from its undesignated legacy funds and for larger appropriations from its general fund, this Synod heartily endorses this appeal and hereby petitions the Board to give this appeal its most favorable consideration.

How a Woman Manned a China Outpost.

Miss Julia C. Emery.

The New York Times for February 25, 1918, contained a statement from Bishop Bashford, the Methodist Episcopal Bishop in China, in view of possible race wars to arise when this war shall be ended. "The only solution of the problem," he concludes, "is the multiplication of Christian Missions, to win the yellow and black races to Christianity."

Miss Alice Peavey has neither Bishop Bashford's years nor his experience, but fifteen months in China have brought her to the same conclusion. She went from Western Massachusetts in the summer of 1916, spent her first half-year at the language school in Peking and her first summer in Kuling, then in the fall of 1917 was stationed at Changsha, at which time the Rev. and Mrs. Walworth Tyng were at home on furlough.

Thence she writes, on December 10, 1917: "I suppose people at home are tired of hearing that now is the time to evangelize China, but those of us here can see, oh, so plainly, that now as China is beginning to grasp western civilization, she is going to be pretty much what we make her. Now, when she is going through the internal strife that nearly all countries have had to go through, we must give her of our best and set before her Christian ideals. She will pull through if we have faith in her and take advantage of every opening."

It is not every new-comer to whom one would defer, but sometimes a brief experience gives discernment which many uneventful years would fail to bring. In forwarding the letter from which we have quoted, Bishop Roots says of Miss Peavey: "She has been doing excellent work at Changsha, and her conduct during the disturbances of which she speaks in such a modest way was beyond all praise." Remaining portions of Miss Peavey's letter read as follows:

"Changsha is a fascinating place, but very, very different from the north and much more typically Chinese than Peking. The streets are very narrow and dirty. Nearly all the houses have two stories; in the north they have only one. It is a much larger city than I expected to find, and there are over two hundred foreigners here. In some ways it is not at all like Central China; in others I feel as though I were off the ends of the earth. I have seen only three newspapers in the three months I have been here, and the mails come by fits and starts. Now that the water is low, boats cannot come up, and mails, etc., have to come in little sampans which are very early upset. Until the Tyngs return I am living in the Yale Mission Hospital, just outside the city.

"I am so glad I am not an official in China; their lives seem to be such uncertain quantities. A little while ago the ex-Governor was in hiding in this mission till he could get a foreigner to escort him safely down the river.

"At last I feel that I am really in a non-Christian country, that has been closed to western civilization. Here I have had my first sight of what a country divided within itself, without a real head, with different customs and not even the same spoken dialect, can come to. It is quite the most interesting and thrilling thing I have ever seen. Somehow there is a touch of mediaevalism in it to me.

"One night last month I went to bed with everything quiet, expecting to go on my usual round of duties the rest of the winter. The next afternoon the city suddenly became full of northern soldiers retreating from the south. Still I thought nothing of it. Late that night I heard that our mission had been appointed a Red Cross station and that the Chinese were fleeing there for foreign protection.

"With the Tyngs away there were no foreigners there. I could not get in that night because the city was under martial law and any one on the streets after 8 P. M. was shot. The next morning I was awakened by the servants coming into my room and telling me they were very frightened and that there was a big fire near. I jumped up and found that the barracks near us were burning and the northern soldiers were retreating under my window and I could hear shooting everywhere. At seven I went in to the Mission and found over a hundred Chinese women and children gathered there. After quieting them and having the morning service (which I very much fear was only a lip service, considering the shooting that was going on around us), I went out on the street to do what I could for the wounded and dead. The most distressing thing was to meet a man going to be executed, and have him tell me he was a Christian and ask me to save him. I was perfectly helpless. Mr. Fang, our Chinese priest, spent the whole day on the street, taking wounded to the hospital and helping everywhere. The American Consul ordered foreign women off the street, but allowed me to stay on at the Mission, on the condition that a foreign man stay in the Mission Compound and go out with me when I went. The man he sent is a young Churchman from St. Bartholomew's Parish, New York, who is out here for a year under the Yale Mission. The streets seemed fairly quiet all day, foreigners were safe anywhere; we only had to look out for pot-shooting and hid in stores when it got too thick.

"The whole thing seems a tempest in a teapot, and the Chinese become scared at anything. The northern soldiers were here twenty-four hours before the southerners, and so scared that most of the killing was amongst themselves in their desire to get away. Many were killed trying to board a moving train, many in trying to swim out to boats in the river, and practically all the shooting was done by them. At the end of the week there were six hundred wounded in the Red Cross Hospital and seven thousand prisoners of war (whom the foreigners are taking care of), and yet there had been no real fighting within a good many miles of us.

"I spent that whole week living at the Mission and existing on canned goods and an alcohol stove. After Sunday night some of the Chinese left, but we had about fifty all through the week. On Monday the southern soldiers arrived, and after that all northerners who came were simply disarmed and taken prisoners. The police disappeared and every official left the province. There was no one in command and no one to make or enforce laws, and the city was said to be in a state of anarchy, but a more quiet state of anarchy I cannot imagine. Of course there was some looting, but only in houses of those who had supported the north. It is very interesting to think that only seven years ago the foreigners here were looted, and now the Chinese come to the foreigners for protection! The times are changing!

"On Monday the Consuls ordered the women to leave. A few did, but before the others were ready there was fighting down the river so that they could not leave. The single women had no intention of doing so.

"During that week at our Mission we harbored the workers of a lace factory, whom I have been very anxious to get hold of. They are all non-Christian women from the country, and I hope their stay with us had some effect upon them. At least, they have been coming to church ever since. At the end of the week all the Chinese left, and I was very glad to get back to bed and bath. The next week I helped out at the Red Cross Hospital, as they were rushed to death and most of the foreign nurses ill. At present all is quiet and peaceful, but we hear today that the southerners have been beaten in the north, and that the northerners are coming back to rescue the prisoners. However, that whole week was a most valuable one to me in many ways. I only hope that pray that I rightly used the wonderful openings which were given me, and that even though my Chinese is very poor, I made the people realize that I am here to serve them."

THEOLOGICAL STUDENTS BECOMING EXTINCT.

Seminaries Lose Twenty-three Per Cent of Their Students.

By Rev. Paul Micou, Secretary Collegiate Department General Board of Religious Education.

If it were proved that two more years of war would leave us only sixty theological students, would the Church at last view with alarm her scarcity of candidates for Holy Orders? Calculations show that in 1919-20 there will be sixty-four men studying in our twelve seminaries. Dividing equally, and granting the General Seminary by courtesy the remainder, nine students will occupy the time of fourteen professors at Chelsea Square, and the other seminaries will have five each to use their fine equipment and endowments.

Statistics are fallible, and on them no one ventures actual prophecies. But it is hard to deny the probabilities shown by the figures collected by the General Board of Religious Education. Their validity rests entirely on the effect of the next draft upon the seminary junior classes. This is only a matter of estimate at present.

Juniors are liable to draft. Middlers and seniors are not, for they were in seminaries when the draft law went into effect. The new draft regulations place most of the juniors in class I. This multiplies many times the likelihood of their being called to the colors this spring. The chances are that three-fourths will be so summoned.

Furthermore, with the draft operating on our postulants in the colleges as they come of age it is hardly likely that more than one-fourth of the members of this year's juniors will enter the seminaries each fall during wartime.

On these two assumptions hangs all our argument. Lest we be accused of figuring on too high a loss of theological students, let us remind the reader that we are not providing for any loss of middlers and seniors, as the call to various forms of altruistic war service becomes more insistent. Experience has shown it is very hard for a man to stay in a seminary when he seems so much needed in our cantonments or "over there." Overestimate in one case, if there is any, is balanced by underestimate in the other.

Last year's enrollment in the seminaries was 396 (an increase of 45 over the preceding year). This year the seminaries have 305 students, a loss of 23 per cent. As indicated above, the draft will probably take away 63, which is three-quarters of the 85 juniors. From the remaining total must be subtracted all the seniors, who number 99, and probably one-half of the 51 special students, or 26. This leaves 117 students to be carried over to next year.

According to our assumptions the fall of 1918 will show only 21 new students entering (or one-fourth of this year's junior class). Thus the total enrollment of 1918-19 will be 138.

The present middle class numbers 70, and they, with the remaining 25 "specials," leave the seminaries in June, 1919. This leaves only 43 students to be carried over into 1919-20.

Add to this number the 21 new students we have assumed to be the normal number entering in war time, and 64 will be the total enrollment for 1919-20.

We dare not think of the effects of still another year of war, for this is bad enough. Putting the calculations on a percentage basis, we find that the total number of theological students in 1917-18 is 77 per cent of the anti-bellum enrollment; in 1918-19 it will be 35 per cent; and in 1919-20 it will drop to 16 per cent.

Some may say that this is a situation caused by a wholly unusual national and world crisis and, as it will pass, we need not worry. But the Church looks to the seminaries to furnish annually the majority of the men who are ordained. Similar causes will cut down the number of those entering the ministry from other sources than the seminaries.

Hence we face a period when we will stand still in our Church development, if indeed we do not actually go backward. For not only will there be this falling off in ordinations, but several hundred of our ministers are engaged in one form or another of war service, and their places in the parishes have not been filled.

Furthermore, consider the need of the foreign field. The minimum of ordained men called for by our Board of Missions is eighteen. Many more could be used, but even this minimum is not forthcoming.

We would not have our seminary students fail to take part in the most tragic moments of mankind. Rather are we proud that the 23 per cent of loss this year is higher than that of any other communion.

Eight Baptist seminaries lost 19 per cent; eight Methodist, 18 per cent; four Congregational, 17 per cent, and ten Presbyterian, 14 per cent.

But the gap in the line of the Church's leaders can be endured only if we prepare for an immediate advance at the termination of the war. Our seminaries must be filled to overflowing in the first year of peace. How can it be brought about?

The searching out of qualified men for the ministry at home and in foreign lands must become the major task of those in authority—Bishops, priests, Sunday-school superintendents, teachers, directors of Brotherhoods of St. Andrew, leaders of boys' work, college professors and lay workers in all organizations. Sermons must be preached showing the central place of the Church in the days of world reconstruction, so that fathers and mothers will be as proud to have their sons ordained to be leaders of the Church as they now are to have them commissioned in the service of the nation.

There are four classes to whom the appeal should especially be directed.

1. Older men, who can be pried loose from their professions, and with such training as they need sent into the vocation of the ministry. The war has shown that no man is too wedded to his work to be able to leave it if the cause is sufficient. There are always a few such men as "specials" in the seminaries. They are the only men who can stop the gap in the line of ordinations, and enable the Church to hold her own until reinforcements come from the seminaries two or three years after the end of the war. Let every minister bring such men to the Bishop for advice and counsel at the time of his annual visitation.

2. The soldiers, whose hearts are open to hear the call of the world's spiritual need, just as they have already responded to the call of moral and social need. The Civil War has shown us that we can expect much from this source. Chaplains, Y. M. C. A. secretaries, Red Cross and Brotherhood of St. Andrew workers have a great obligation laid upon them in this matter.

3. College students, who are not of draft age. The government will not call these under classmen save in case of great necessity. They have been told they are in college preparing for the days of reconstruction. If the opportunity to serve the world through the Church is laid before them, many will heed the call to the sacred ministry. For this our ministers in college towns and the Y. M. C. A. college secretaries are mainly responsible, but the student's own rector is not thereby excused from writing and speaking to "his boy."

4. High school boys, who make vocational decisions to a degree that is not fully recognized. The pressure will be almost overwhelming to make the boy choose a business or a mechanical training course, and to go to work as soon as school days are over. Every church worker that touches the boy of right calibre must urge him to take a cultural course and enter college. The needs of the Church must be clearly laid before him. If he is mature enough he can make an intelligent decision, at least along general lines of Christian service.

If this be applicable to the boy in the distractions of public school life, how much more does it apply to the boy in the Church preparatory school, where conditions are simpler? Principals and masters in such schools have their greatest opportunity now to show that their schools exist to discover and develop the leaders of the Church.

This is not an appeal for quantity alone. Our ministers had better be too few than of poor quality. The evil in the present situation lies in the fact that Bishops are forced to accept most of those that apply because they have parishes and missions which must be manned. If the Church seriously enters on a movement to find men for her ministry, she can place her standards at the highest notch, and rest assured that she will secure the men who will reach them. What is needed is not a wholesale call and sentimental God-speed to all volunteers, but a careful "hand-picking" of the choicest boys and college students and older men. This is not overlooking the divine element in the call. Human agents are needed to phrase it. The Holy Spirit will consecrate our common sense.

The Great Commission

Notes From the Missions House.

An Old Friend in New Quarters: Many readers will recall Dr. Mary Glenton as "somewhere" in the mission field—long ago, it may be, in St. Peter's Hospital, Helena, Montana; then for a year in the negro work in Columbia, S. C.; again at Anvik on the Yukon; later for years at Wuchang, on the Yangtse; invalided home "trying again" at the Settlement, La Grange, in the Diocese of Atlanta. An infected joint necessitated her leaving there, and after struggling a while to help in a children's home in Michigan, she went for treatment to the hospital of her training in Chicago. There it was found necessary to amputate a leg, but with all her old courage and cheerfulness, she is accustoming herself to the makeshift which takes its place.

And now we hear of her from St. Agnes' Hospital, Raleigh, N. C., where she has been visiting in the late winter. Mrs. Hunter writes on the 7th of March:

"Dr. Glenton is really to be with us. She is improving steadily in her walking, though she feels it is very, very slow. She is able now to walk up and down stairs and make the rounds of the wards once every day, which is all that is necessary for a resident, as we have an interne and a regular hospital staff. She is to do a good deal in the way of drug room work, saying, she thinks, many dollars by compounding ointments and medicines herself. During her 'visit,' she has done a good deal of back filing work on charts, etc., and relieving me of some of the office work which has to be done at the hospital. She has not been idle at all since she came, and her cheerful spirit does us all good."

Our new superintendent of nurses, Mrs. Lottie R. Jackson, R. N., retains the old position as head nurse as well as the new one of superintendent. She is very firm, but kind and friendly with the nurses and patients and very efficient. The hospital looks as clean as a pin, and she is never at a loss in an emergency. We have, too, a very good interne, one of our own graduates, who for the years he was in school was our confidential secretary and stenographer. Also, notwithstanding the exodus of so many doctors for war-work, we have been able to keep a number of our general staff, including the most important of all, our surgeon-in-chief, Dr. Hubert A. Roster.

"I regret that we are facing a deficit in the hospital treasury. We have not enough money to pay a quarter of our February bills. This has not happened before in months, if in years."

We hear from St. Elizabeth's School, Wakpala, S. D.:

The Indians come to us from far and near with all sorts of requests, and we help them as much as we can whenever we can in simple little ways. They are taking a touching interest in the Red Cross this year, and bring their subscriptions and dues to us to send in.

Church Intelligence

Board of Missions—Meeting of the Executive Committee.

The Executive Committee of the Board of Missions met in the Church Missions House, New York, on March 12, 1918, met with a good representation.

From the domestic field they received and acted upon the resignation of the Rev. Guthrie Pitblado, of Florida. In Montana the Rev. R. F. Blanning was appointed in place of the Rev. J. W. Hard. Miss Edith S. Scamman was appointed at the request of the Bishop of Oklahoma for work in that district.

At the request of Bishop Tucker an appropriation was made for the training, at the New York Training School for Deaconesses, for Miss Ernestine Gardiner preparatory to her appointment as a missionary in the District of Kyoto.

One-half of the bequest of the late Rev. William Thompson, D. D. (approximately $15,000) was set aside to be held by the Board as a trust fund for the endowment of the "Thompson Memorial Chair of Philosophy" in St. Paul's College, Tokyo, Japan.

The legacy received from the estate of the late Rev. A. R. Morris was turned over to the Standing Committee on Trust Funds to be held until required for payments upon the contract for the erection of the academic building for St. Paul's College, Tokyo, Japan, to be known as the "Arthur Rutherford Morris Memorial Hall."

The following appointments were made for the foreign field: Mr. Clarence R. Wagner for the Missionary District of the Philippines; Mrs. A. C. St. John and Miss Marion S. Doane as nurses in St. Luke's Hospital, Tokyo, Japan.

Under the authority given it by the Board, the Executive Committee granted an appropriation of $3,400 from the undesignated legacies for the District of New Mexico; $1,000 for North Dakota; $2,000 for St. John's School, Corbin, District of Lexington; $6,000 for St. Andrew's School, Mayaguez, District of Porto Rico; $15,000 for Christ Church, Osaka, District of Kyoto.

The Executive Committee also expressed its sense of loss on account of the death of Messrs. Henry Lewis Morris, Charles G. Saunders and William R. Stirling.

One Day's Income Plan.

The middle of March found the One Day's Income Plan totaling $15,000. The Board of Missions is much heartened by the nature of the response to this movement. People, realizing the necessity of having the Church speak out above the din of war, are many of them sending larger offerings than usual to the Plan. Quite a number of the offerings have been doubled this year; very seldom do contributors give less than formerly.

It is to be hoped that this measure of giving is an index of what the Church plans to do in such times as these. With the deficit of $143,000 carried over from last year, and with at least $200,000 added to the regular cost of maintenance due to war prices, the Church has need for undue thoughtfulness lest a very serious situation arise. The Board's Treasurer reports that offerings from the parishes are about $26,000 less than for the corresponding period last year.

Some hopeful messages are, however, reaching the Missions House. One Churchman—a physician—has doubled his offerings for missions in 1918 because he realizes the additional needs arising from the war and the vital importance of putting into the world's life the fundamentals for which the Church's missionary work stands. From Pennsylvania comes similar news; certain Church people have doubled all their offerings for Church enterprises and are making their war gifts additional sacrifices.

Brotherhood Work in Camps.

If one would know the kind of work accomplished by the Brotherhood of St. Andrew secretaries in the camps, and there are forty of them in as many camps let him glance over the two following brief summaries of "among other work" accomplished during the week.

The secretary at Kelly Field, the great aviation camp in Texas, reports: "Organized two prayer groups; organized a Bible class for the Y. M. C. A.; assisted in noon-day services at the Majestic Theatre; addressed Church Club at St. Paul's on Brotherhood Work; addressed two hundred men in the United States Arsenal; held two conferences in bedrooms with soldiers and visited many of the soldiers in the base hospital."

And while the Kelly Field secretary was thus engaged another Brotherhood worker at Camp Wadsworth, the home of the New York Guardsmen, was going about as follows:

"Made seventy base hospital calls; helped two sick boys to get from camp to railroad station and made all arrangements for their transportation; called upon forty-seven men in tents for personal interviews; gave knitted articles to more than one hundred men and found three St. Andrew Brotherhood men."

These reports are merely a matter of form and are made weekly to headquarters and show in a small way some of the real things the Brotherhood secretaries are doing in forty camps throughout the country.

Camp Dix.

The clubhouse at Camp Dix is now in full operation and used by large numbers of the soldiers. The Dioceses of New Jersey, Newark, Pennsylvania, Delaware and Western New York have spent about $30,000.00 upon the three buildings at Camp Dix, with their equipment. With a staff of Clergy connected therewith, four women from each Diocese each month, have the management of the canteen. Ground has been given for the administration building of the other churches and the use of the chapel also for their services. This good example of Christian courtesy has made for good feeling. What may seem a large expenditure of money has been due to the great cost of building materials, the scarcity of labor and the necessity of bringing water and electric current from a distance, and the cost of transportation.

The relation to the work of the Y. M. C. A. in the camp is excellent, and the officers and soldiers alike appear to find great satisfaction in what our Church has done and is doing. This work was planned immediately after the choice of Wrightstown, some eighteen miles southeast of Trenton, was determined upon, and the work was going on for considerable time before the General War Commission organized. With the buildings completed, the emphasis is put upon personal work. It is expected that the Dioceses of Central New York and Albany will have part with those named in the support of the work, as many men are coming from all parts of the eastern country.

If any one will send to Rev. Edgar L. Cooke, St. George's Chapel, Wrightstown, N. J., the name of any one in the camp, giving the regiment and company, or other definite address, the person will be looked up.

Armenian and Syrian Relief: Receipts and Apportionments.

Cleveland H. Dodge, treasurer of the American Committee for Armenian and Syrian Relief, announces receipts of $681,618.99 for the month of February, making a total of $8,240,168.92 collected by the committee for relief in the Russian Caucasus, Persia and Southern Palestine. The committee have already cabled $7,210,367.55 to the field.

New apportionments amounting to $955,000.00 were made at the Executive Committee meeting of March 1st. This money was allotted as follows:

Two hundred and fifty thousand dollars for relief in the Russian Caucasus via Tiflis.

Two hundred thousand dollars were sent to Persia via Teheran.

Two hundred thousand dollars to Eastern Armenia and Western Persia via Tabriz.

One hundred and fifty thousand dollars for relief in Asia Minor via Constantinople.

One hundred thousand dollars for relief in Syria via Beirut.

Fifty thousand dollars for Palestine via Jerusalem.

Five thousand dollars to Armenian refugees in Port Said.

Large Checks Received.

Two checks of $70,000.00 each were received by the American Committee for Armenian and Syrian Relief this week. One came from the Canadian Sunday-schools, the other from the City of Portland, Oregon. An article published in the Literary Digest, February 23rd, has brought checks amounting to $8,335.60 so far. Every incoming mail brings dozens of others.

The above added to a gift of $200,000 from the Red Cross and miscellaneous receipts makes a total of $454,549.83 for the week ending March 1.

Rt. Rev. W. C. Brown, D. D., Coadjutor

A Protest to the Church Pension Fund.

The Vestry of Langley Parish, Virginia, some weeks ago adopted a strong preamble and resolutions protesting against the exclusion of the clergy who had retired before the present Pension system went into effect from participation in the benefits of the surplus of the Initial Reserve Fund. The resolutions follow:

1. "That the exclusion of those clergymen whose active service in the Church terminated prior to March 1, 1917, was, in the opinion of this Vestry, an error of the gravest character.

2. "That it is the view of this Vestry that of all persons justly entitled to pension benefits, those who, having given their active lives to the service of the Church and by reason of age and infirmity necessarily retired before March 1, 1917 (of which number many are now destitute and unable to provide themselves with the bare necessities of life), instead of being thrown into the discard as worthless and unentitled to consideration, should be given the tenderest and most ample care of which the Church is capable.

3. "That, in view of the fact that the present Pension Fund has on hand a balance of almost $4,000,000, unnecessary to its establishment and maintenance, all of which was destined, if required, to be expended in primarily paying pensions, and as at least a considerable proportion was undoubtedly contributed on the natural assumption that all deserving clergymen and their dependents should be benefited thereby, a continued withholding of the full benefits of the Pension Fund from this, the most deserving and most needy of the whole body of clergy, will constitute a stain upon Christianity and be a dark blot upon the history of the Protestant Episcopal Church.

4. "That inasmuch as there is present need and suffering among the excluded class, with funds in hand to mitigate the same without endangering the future welfare of the exclusive classes for whom the Pension Fund is being particularly administered, it is the sense of this Vestry that steps be forthwith taken to remedy and rectify the aforesaid grave and unnecessary evil, either by modifying the plan of distribution of the Pension Fund to carry out what is certainly the desire of many of the contributors thereto and members of the Church in which this institution is existing, so that all her needy clergymen may be cared for, or, if the shocking omission is to be continued, then by establishing an organization and securing funds to help those thus heartlessly and shamefully discarded, in order that they may be assisted in their endeavors to eke out the remainder of their earthly existence."

New Chapel Opened.

The new Emmanuel Chapel of Cunningham Chapel Parish, Clarke County, situated at Boyce, was opened on Sunday, March 10, with very impressive services and large congregations. The Rev. C. Braxton Bryan, D.D., of Petersburg, was the preacher at both the morning and evening services. Dr. Bryan was the rector of the parish thirty-one years ago, when the old chapel upon this same site was built and consecrated by Bishop Randolph. The services were conducted by the Rev. B. D. Chambers, present rector of the parish, assisted by the Rev. Giles B. Palmer, of Meade Memorial Chapel of White Post. The combined choirs of the parish rendered the music.

The new chapel is built of the native blue limestone along very attractive and artistic lines, being a combination of the Gothic and Old Mission types of architecture. The windows were made by Lamb, of New York, and include a beautiful chancel window, a most attractive window over the vestibule and six triple windows on the sides made of the wonderfully tinted and mellow American opalescent glass. The interior finishing is in chestnut, as are the pews and chancel furniture. The chapel has a seating capacity of two hundred and sixty and cost $12,600, of which less than $2,000 remains unpaid.

Christ Church, Millwood, has recently received two very beautiful gifts, one a very handsome silk flag for the chancel by Mrs. H. B. Gilpin; and the other a walnut pulpit by Mrs. Hugh M. Nelson in memory of her husband, who for over forty years was a vestryman of the parish.

Lenten Services. The Rev. W. Russell Bowie, D. D., was the preacher at the mid-day Lenten service in St. Paul's Church, Richmond, on Monday, March 4th. Dr. Bowie delivered a forceful and earnest sermon from Judges 8:6, in which he described the cowardly neutrality displayed by the men of the Soccoth in refusing to aid Gideon and his band until they were sure of the result of his fight against Zebah and Zalmunna, and applied the lessons suggested to the men who wait to be assured of the outcome before taking their stand on the side of righteousness.

On Tuesday and for the remainder of the week, the Rev. S. Roger Tyler, rector of Trinity Church, Huntington, W. Va., was the speaker. In the vigorous and evangelical style which has endeared him to so many Richmond Churchmen, Mr. Tyler spoke of some of the fundamental doctrines which are in danger of being forgotten in these latter days. Victory which comes by faith in Christ and is not to be won by merit or good works was the subject of his address on Tuesday. The subject of the sermon on Wednesday was Repentance, and the speaker showed that the most moving of all the reasons for repentance is the joy it brings to the heart of the Father. Thursday Mr. Tyler emphasized the joy to be found in overcoming temptation, assuring his hearers that no other joy could equal that. The last of the series was delivered on Friday and dealt with Obedience, the speaker reiterating and illustrating St. John's teaching that a man who loves God will prove it by his life of filial submission to God's will.

The preacher at the mid-day Lenten services on Monday, March 11th, was the Rev. Walter Williams, assistant rector of St. James Church, who spoke of the inevitability of the Christian soldier taking his part in the battle of life.

Beginning with Tuesday and continuing through the remainder of the week, the Rev. H. H. Covington, D. D., rector of St. Paul's Church, Norfolk, occupied the pulpit at the mid-day services. The four sermons formed a thoughtful and suggestive series on the necessity for a personal creed. He showed on the first day how freedom may be a negative thing and a dangerous thing so long as it is freedom from rather than freedom to, that freedom of thought does not release from the obligation of thinking straight and true. On Wednesday he spoke of the effort of the idol makers, from the creator of the first graven image down to Mr. Wells and his Invisible King, and how, while they erred in thinking that they could make a God for themselves, that they did at least endeavor to gain a personal God rather than to worship a tradition received second-hand from the past. The day following Dr. Covington dealt with the Christianity of to-day in its failure to reincarnate the eternal Christ for our own time. On the last day of the series he dealt with the indifference of the average Christian as manifested in his refusal to reach out and appropriate God, his failure to think for himself.

Confirmation: On Sunday morning, March 17, Bishop Gibson confirmed a class of twenty-six at St. James Church, Richmond, the Rev. G. Freeland Peter, rector. In the evening, at St. Paul's Church, the Rev. Dr. Bowie, rector, he confirmed thirty, one of whom was for Monumental Church.

SOUTHERN VIRGINIA.

Rt. Rev. A. M. Randolph, D. D., Bishop.

Rt. Rev. B. D. Tucker, D. D., Coadjutor.

Rt. Rev. A. C. Thomson, D. D., Suffragan.

Roanoke. The Rt. Rev. B. D. Tucker, D. D., visited St. John's Church Sunday night, March 10, and confirmed twenty-five persons. Four of them were students at Hollins College and were confirmed for the Rev. Mr. Mead, of Christ Church. The Bishop preached a most helpful sermon from the text, "I will lift up mine eyes unto the hills from whence cometh my help." The church was filled and in all it was an inspiring service.

Salac. Bishop Tucker visited St. Paul's Church Monday, March 11, and at evening service preached and confirmed a large class.

Saltville. The Rev. W. R. Noe, who last November came from Wilmington, N. C., to take charge of the work in Smyth county, with residence at Saltville, has been doing most excellent work and filling most important fields.

Farmville. The Rev. Charles P. Halbrook has taken up the work at Farmville, and since last December has been doing a telling service in that parish. The church there is right across from the State Normal School, which affords an important field for the rector of that church.

Emporia. The Rev. Norman F. Marshall has taken charge of the work at Emporia. He went from Bramwell, W. Va., to Texas some years ago, then accepted work in Florida, and now has returned to his home Diocese. He is heartily welcomed back.

Evington. The Rev. J. F. Burks has taken the work in lower Campbell County, churches at Evington, Alta Vista and Rustburg. These parishes were made vacant by the resignation of the Rev. C. C. Randall, who from advanced age had to give up active service.

Camp Lee. The Rev. R. B. Nelson is getting his work well in hand at Camp Lee, and in the meantime his parish duties are being looked after in part by ministers of the Southwest Convocation.

The Arch Deaconry. The churches in this great territory are now being ministered to in part by the Rev. J. W. Hobson, of Bluefield; the Rev. C. E. A. Marshall, of Radford, with the Rev. Percy R. Dix locum tenens at Big Stone Gap. The Archdeacon, the Rev. E. A. Rich, has taken work at Newport News, chiefly at Camp Stuart and Langley Field. This is the point of embarkation for this section and great numbers of soldiers are quartered in that section between Morrisons and Old Point, which makes it imperative to have a volunteer Chaplain look after the Church boys before they leave for "Somewhere in France."

Wytheville. A handsome silk Service Flag has been hung up in St. John's Church, the Rev. F. H. Craighill, rector, with thirty-six stars on it. Of these men thirty-four are volunteers, sixteen of whom are officers; five are non-coms. Of these eight are now "Somewhere in France." For a small town congregation this is an unusual number of men in the service.

All of the six Protestant churches of Wytheville have been having union services on Sunday nights in the various churches in rotation, which have proved both a great success and blessing with congregations limited only by the capacity of the churches. No minister has preached in his own church. The rector of St. John's has officiated in two of the other churches, and at his turn he has had two of the other ministers to officiate at St. John's.

This parish has secured a splendid stereopticon which fills a long-felt need, and the rector intends to make ample use of it in his Sunday schools, chapels and for illustrated Sunday night sermons.

ALABAMA.

Rt. Rev. C. M. Beckwith, D. D., Bishop.

Confirmation and Ordination in Camp.

At Camp McClellan, Anniston, Ala., the camp of the New Jersey, Maryland and Virginia troops, confirmation and ordination services were conducted on February 14 by the Right Rev. Charles M. Beckwith, Bishop of Alabama.

Confirmation was administered in the regimental exchange of the 110th Field Artillery, and thirteen soldiers were confirmed, while more than one hundred of their soldier friends and many ladies from Anniston were present at the service.

The soldiers had erected a very beautiful rustic altar on the raised platform of the exchange. Assisting Bishop Beckwith was Chaplain C. R. Dubell, of the 110th Field Artillery. Others occupying the platform were the Rev. Carelton Barnwell, of Grace Church, Anniston; Rev. Rowan McAllister, who is a Y. M. C. A. Secretary, and Mr. Anthony Roberts Parsley, another Y. M. C. A. Secretary, who was a candidate for Holy Orders.

Bishop Beckwith made a stirring address in which he compared confirmation in the Christian life to the draft in the life of the selectman, it being the completion of what had gone before, baptism on the one side and registration or enrollment on the other.

At the close of the service Bishop Beckwith visited Y. M. C. A. 113 and there found one of the candidates who had been unable to get to the earlier service. The candidate expressed his willingness to be confirmed, and Bishop Beckwith repeated the rite. Then followed an interesting and novel ordination service in the Y shack, Chaplain Dubell preaching the ordination sermon and the Rev. Mr. Barnwell reading the ordination service, Mr. Anthony Roberts Parsley, of the Diocese of East Carolina, was ordained a deacon.

Rt. Rev. W. A. Leonard, D. D., Bishop.
Rt. Rev. F. Du Moulin, D. D., Coadjutor.

The Archbishop of York in Cleveland.

The Archbishop of York, Dr. Lang, visited Cleveland Friday, March 15, and was accorded a welcome amounting to a great demonstration. Prior to his coming the local papers made frequent allusions to his visit, always in cordial and sympathetic terms, dwelling particularly upon the Archbishop's ministry to the poor and plain people of East London prior to his elevation to York. At noon, under the auspices of the Chamber of Commerce, for many years the leading commercial and civic organization of Cleveland, he addressed more than four thousand people in the Hippodrome, the largest playhouse in the city, every seat and all available standing room being taken. He was introduced by Mr. Charles A. Otis, president of the Chamber, and for an hour held with increasing attention and interest his great audience. In magnetic presence, dignity of person, poise, speech and manner, the Archbishop reminded many of his late fellow countryman, Sir Henry Irving, who during his lifetime was a great favorite in America. In the evening the Archbishop was the guest of the Cleveland Church Club, Mr. Francis R. Morison, president, at supper at the Hotel Statler, where he addressed some six hundred men, the entire gallery being occupied with women guests. He was introduced by Bishop Leonard, and spoke as to a great convention of Churchmen, to whom he made a noble and exalted appeal for maintenance of the highest Christian ideals in the present world's great conflict. The Archbishop, with his chaplain, arrived in Cleveland Friday morning, and was the guest of Bishop Leonard at his home until he left for Chicago in the evening. Following the noonday address, upon invitation of Bishop Leonard, the Archbishop received for an hour at the Episcopal residence, the Clergy of the city and their wives.

WEST TEXAS.

Rt. Rev. Wm. T. Capers, D. D., Bishop.

Service at Camp Stanley.

An unusually helpful service was conducted on Sunday, March 10, by Bishop Capers at Camp Stanley, for the soldiers stationed at the Officers' Training School and at Camp Morse. It consisted of a celebration of the Holy Eucharist and a sermon by the Bishop. Moved by the powerful appeal of the Bishop and the spirit of the service, decisions were made which were consummated in the administration of Confirmation by the Bishop subsequent to the dismissal of the congregation.

The Ven. A. W. S. Garden, pursuant to the confirmation by the Board of Missions of his election to become Field Secretary of the Province of the Southwest, resigned his office as Archdeacon of West Texas on March 1. Bishop Capers has appointed the Rev. Lee W. Heaton, who has for some months past been serving as Diocesan chaplain to the army camps of the Diocese, as successor to the Rev. Mr. Garden. Archdeacon Heaton will make his headquarters at the offices of the Diocese, 424-6 Gunter Building, San Antonio, Texas.

The Rev. Benjamin Dennis, of Richmond, Va., has accepted a call to become rector of the Church of the Advent, Brownsville, Texas, and minister-in-charge of the Valley Missions. He will assume his responsibilities on April 1.

ERIE.

Rt. Rev. Rogers Israel, D. D., Bishop

The Cathedral Notes.

The attendance at the Lenten services this year has been very gratifying. The numbers are as large as they have ever been in the past in spite of the fact that many men have little spare time at the luncheon hour nowadays. Dr. Aigner, Mr. Woodroffe, of Cleveland; Dr. Brown, of Pittsburgh, and Archdeacon Owen have given splendid messages.

The Missionary Mission is in progress at present. The Rev. Horace Stowell was greeted by a large congregation on Mid-Lent Sunday in spite of the blizzard that came to Erie with him. All the Episcopal churches have joined together for this mission at the Cathedral. Mr. Stowell is proving a most earnest and attractive speaker and his thought is just fitted for the needs of the day. All the Clergy of the city were with him in the chancel and took part in the service Sunday morning.

The Bishop of Pittsburgh has been in Erie and its neighborhood during the past week holding confirmations for Bishop Israel. He was warmly welcomed by the Cathedral congregation and spoke at some of the noon-day services, for he seems to be able to accomplish work without fatigue that would seem impossible to many younger men.

LEXINGTON.

Rt. Rev. L. W. Burton, D. D., Bishop

The Twenty-third Diocesan Council of the Diocese of Lexington will meet this year in Calvary Church, Ashland, Ky. (the Rev. G. H. Harrison, rector), on May 28. The Cathedral Chapter will meet that afternoon; the Council convening that evening.

The Rev. R. E. Abraham, of the Holy Cross Church, Brooklyn, New York, who had accepted the charge of Paris and Cynthia, this Diocese, has found it necessary to withdraw this acceptance because of continued ill health. Mr. Abraham was at one time in charge of St. Mary's Church, Middlesboro, and his return to the Diocese was looked forward to with much pleasure. We regret the loss of his valued services, and wish him a speedy recovery.

Services Renewed: The Church at Somerset, this Diocese, which has been closed for some time, is soon to be opened again. This was once an active mission, but met with heavy reverses when the division point of the Southern Railroad was moved from that point to Danville, removing most of our communicants, who were numbered amongst the railroad men. Renewed activities at the shops there, with the incoming of new Church families, have opened up possibilities for work at the mission, which has been placed in charge of the Rev. Henry P. Manning, rector at Danville, thirty-five miles distant. Repairs are now being made to the building in anticipation of the monthly services soon to begin.

The Ven. F. B. Wentworth, Winchester, Ky., Archdeacon of the Diocese, has been delivering addresses and sermons to university and college students upon the subject of "Individualism and Socialism." His recent address before the faculty and student body of the Kentucky State University at the Y. M. C. A. in Lexington, was commented upon by the public press in the highest terms, pronouncing it as "a modern voice in the wilderness" ringing with a message of warning and counsel to a people sadly confused and distraught."

The Rev. Dr. Richard Wilkinson, rector of the Good Shepherd, Lexington, was the preacher during one of the weeks of the noon-day Lenten services in Louisville, Ky., Diocese of Kentucky. Dr. Wilkinson's visit was of unusual interest, he having been pastor of one of the largest Methodist churches in Louisville when in the Methodist Communion.

EASTON.

Rt. Rev. Wm. F. Adams, D. D., Bishop

Mrs. Rebecca C. Hepburn, wife of the Rev. Sewell S. Hepburn, D. D., rector of I. U. Parish, Kent County, died at her home on Tuesday, March 5, aged seventy-five years. She is survived by her husband and four children and one sister. Mrs. Hepburn was the daughter of the late Charles A. Powell, of Alexandria, Va. Most of her life was spent in her native State, where her husband served so long and faithfully.

She was a woman of uncommon character and sweetness of disposition, whose long life of unselfish service will be held in grateful remembrance by a multitude of friends.

Christ Church Parish, Kent Island, through the vestry, has just purchased a new Dodge five-passenger automobile for the use of the rector, the Rev. Hunter Davidson.

This parish just after Easter will begin to make improvements on the church building, which includes the erection of a Gothic Apse chancel, adding much to the beauty and convenience of the church.

NEWARK.

Rt. Rev. E. S. Lines, D. D., Bishop.
Rt. Rev. W. R. Stearly, D. D., Coadjutor.

In the death of Colonel Edwin A. Stevens on March 8, the Diocese of Newark has lost its most prominent layman; a man devoted to its service as few have been. He has long been Treasurer of the Diocese, and its good business methods are largely due to him. He has been deputy to the General Convention since 1901. His father was the founder of Stevens Institute and the family home at Castle Point, Hoboken, has been one of the best known in the country.

He made a remarkable record as marine engineer and showed marked genius in his work. He was a graduate of Princeton, in the class with President Wilson, who, when governor of New Jersey, appointed him commissioner of the roads of the State. His last public service was as a member of the Board having oversight of the construction of the new ships, and he had been along the coast from Galveston to Maine, doing a great deal of hard work for the government. He died in his sixtieth year, and his death is a very great loss not only to his friends, but to the Diocese, State and the government.

Fifteen of the Clergy of the Diocese are or have been in the service of the government: The Rev. Messrs. Mabry and Darlington are chaplains in the regular army; the Rev. Messrs. Johnston and Fair are in the ambulance service in France; the Rev. Messrs. Martin, Anderson and Stridsberg are Y. M. C. A. Secretaries abroad; the Rev. Messrs. Hoxsey and Handley are serving in the army as enlisted men; the Rev. Messrs. Tyler, Popham and Cook are in service in the camps, with leave of absence from their parishes; the Rev. Messrs. Dunseath, Thompson and H. D. Wilson have been in Y. M. C. A. service at Camp McClellan and Camp Dix. Several others are waiting for action upon their applications for service.

Permanent Fund for Missions: At the last meeting of the General Board of Missions, it was announced that in accordance with her wishes, $5,000 had been given to establish a permanent fund in memory of Mrs. Decatur M. Sawyer, for many years the very efficient head of the Woman's Auxiliary of the Diocese of Newark. The income to be used for the support of the missionary work.

A good friend complained, "The Lord told me not to let my left hand know what my right hand was doing." I answered, "By all means. What I want you to do is to let your right hand know what it is not doing. The Lord has no objection to that."

Thy Kingdom Come on Earth

Some of the high officers of the army medical service have launched a vigorous effort to secure higher rank, and, therefore, greater authority, for the physicians in the army. Surgeon-General William Gorgas has appealed direct to Congress. He has asked the Senate Military Affairs Committee to report favorably a bill which would provide for the elevation of physicians in rank to include seventy brigadier-generals, eight hundred colonels and seventeen hundred lieutenant-colonels, whereas now the highest rank which physicians can regularly reach is that of major.

"Line officers have had no hesitation in ignoring the sanitary recommendations of medical officers of lower rank," said General Gorgas. "The men of the medical corps should get higher rank, rank commensurate with the importance of the positions they hold. Some of them are administering great hospitals, yet they hold subordinate rank. The additional grade will give them no new authority, but it will add to their prestige and give their recommendations weight."

Speaking before the Senate committee, according to press reports, Dr. C. H. Mayo, now a major, emphasized this point. He asked the committee to bear in mind the fact that America's famous doctors and surgeons "have not taken up some new thing, in which they must be trained like rookies."

"We are going right ahead with our life work," said Dr. Mayo. "We are the only men in the service who are. When the war is over, those of us who remain will return to our homes and again take up this work."

"What we ask from our government is recognition that will remove the handicaps under which we are now laboring. While we are in the United States, working in camps and cantonments, our names, which we have made prominent by our own efforts, gain us some recognition and respect, but when we go to France the men over there look at our insignia, they look to see what our government has done for us, and judge us by that. They don't know who is inside the clothes—they look at the clothes."

As one reads this, the question may come to mind as to whether the need claimed for the medical service is not equally true of the service rendered by the chaplains. Is it likely that chaplains, rapping usually as captain or even as lieutenant and never in our army higher than major, always have the weight in counsel which they ought to have in army affairs?

The United States Department of Labor has asked the churches and Sunday-schools to give publicity to this notice:

The United States Government, through the Department of Labor, is mobilizing the strong and adaptable young men of the country for work upon the farms during the coming summer. If an adequate food supply, so necessary to the winning of the war, is to be assured, it is of the utmost importance that a reserve of young men, sixteen years of age and over and under twenty-one years of age, shall be organized. This is now being done through the United States Boys' Working Reserve, and is well advanced in more than forty States in the nation.

You can materially aid our endeavor by calling attention in your church notices on March 17, to the fact that the United States Boys' Working Reserve is endeavoring to enroll the boys of the nation between sixteen years of age and older, as members of the United States Boys' Working Reserve.

The week beginning Monday, March 18, has been designated as National Enrollment week for the nation. Boys who are interested to enroll, should report to the principal of the nearest high school, or to any enrolling officer of the reserve in your city.

You can further aid us in your announcement by calling attention to the fact that parents of boys need not hesitate to allow their boys to enroll, as this is non-military. The reserve recommends to Federal State Directors in every State, the positive necessity to safeguard the physical and moral welfare of the boys that work, and to use such agencies as churches, schools and all constructive organizations to assist in the matter of supervision and inspection of these boys.

Faithfully yours,

W. B. WILSON,
Secretary.

Through the Associated Press comes this report, which will be of interest to the multitudes of people who have been giving to the Armenian-Syrian Relief Fund:

As the British Army in Palestine advanced, refugees from villages evacuated by the Turks are drifting southward. Many of the inhabitants have been reduced to pitiable circumstances. In Syria conditions are even worse. Stories of famine and fresh Turkish cruelties are narrated by those who have made their escape.

The American Committee for Armenian and Syrian Relief has established stations in Jerusalem, Bethlehem, Jaca, Hebron and several other cities of Palestine. Three orphanages are being equipped in Jerusalem by the committee to shelter five hundred children. Jerusalem was stripped of supplies by the Turks and left in a state of isolation, owing to damage to the railway, and when the relief work was begun the poorest people were reduced to eating refuse.

Stephen Trowbridge, of Brooklyn, Cairo representative of the Armenian and Syrian Relief Committee, said today that the whole city of Jerusalem was now being rationed by the committee. Six soup kitchens are temporarily feeding eight thousand destitute persons. The advance of the British Army is increasing the area in which relief measures are necessary. Many refugees from Jaca, deported by the Turks to Bethlehem, have died from the effects of their treatment at the hands of the Turks. In Jerusalem there are six hundred and sixty Armenian exiles from Adana, and there are large numbers in Hauran, Syria. Twelve Jews and three Christians, deported from Jerusalem by the Turks, have been hanged in Damascus.

Clinics had been established in Jerusalem, Mr. Trowbridge said, and were crowded, the regular hospitals being used for wounded soldiers. Relief industries have been established and will soon be expanded, placing thousands of persons on the payrolls. The British military authorities are employing large numbers for road construction, and for making army shirts and sandbags. The lace industry is limited by a shortage of thread, eight hundred women having been turned away last month. The committee is instructing boys in mechanics, shoemaking, tailoring, carpentering and agriculture. Only through industrial development, coupled with sanitary regulations, said Mr. Trowbridge, would it be possible to clean up Jerusalem and banish typhus.

The railway from Egypt, built by the British, is being utilized by the army, and the committee has obtained motor trucks for forwarding foodstuffs from Egypt.

In a powerful sermon printed in the last issue of that graphic and very vital magazine, "Temperance," which is published by our Church Temperance Society in New York, Dr. George Craig Stewart, of St. Luke's Church, Evanston, Ill., concludes thus:

"I bear no malice toward those engaged in the business, but I hate the traffic. I hate its every phase. I hate it for its arrogance, its hypocrisy. I hate it for its cant and craft and false pretenses. I hate it for its greed and avarice. I hate it for its domination in politics. I hate it for its corrupting influence in public affairs. I hate it for the cowards it makes of public men. I hate it for its utter disregard of law. I hate it for the load it straps to labor's back, for its wounds to genius, for the tragedies of its might-have-beens. I hate it for the almshouses it fills and the prisons, for the insanity it begets, for the spiritual blight and its moral degradation. I hate it for the women it has destroyed and the hearts it has broken. And we all must hate it. As virtue hates vice, as righteousness hates sin, as justice hates wrong, as liberty hates tyranny, as freedom hates oppression. Let's make Chicago free and the United States free from alcohol. Let the dry land appear!"

Surprising strength is being developed in many unexpected quarters on behalf of the ratification by State legislatures of the prohibition amendment to the Federal constitution. Not only have a number of legislatures, including those of Kentucky and Maryland, in which States the liquor trade has been very prominent, already ratified the amendment, but there actually seems a strong likelihood that the legislature of New York will follow suit at the present session.

Palm Sunday. The Sunday next before Easter is associated in our minds with our Lord's so-called Triumphant Entry into Jerusalem on the Sunday before His crucifixion. The New Lectionary has therefore left undisturbed the lessons from Zechariah and from St. John in the present Prayer Book arrangement, except to throw prophecy and fulfilment together, instead of prophecy in the morning and fulfilment in the evening. We have, indeed, rather strengthened this aspect of the day by giving also St. Luke's story of the Entry in the morning for use if desired. But the day has other aspects besides a Kingly procession amidst the huzzahs of a shallow multitude. The way to His throne lay for our Lord through rejection, Gethsemane and Calvary. It is this indeed that is stressed in Collect, Epistle and Gospel and also in Matthew 26 and Daniel 9, the other lessons in the present Prayer Book Lectionary. We have retained and shortened Matthew 26 by beginning at verse 17; and having already used Daniel 9 on the evening of the Third Sunday in Lent, we have substituted a prophecy of the Passion from Isaiah (perhaps to verse 9 of chapter 63 would be better), and have given in the morning, in the Old Testament Historico-topical course, Ezekiel's prophecy of the Return from Exile, under the figure of a resurrection from the dead, which is needed to bring out the full teaching of the day, as given in both Collect and Epistle. Comparison with the lessons on Palm Sunday Table I will show how rich are the selections. The Passover is introduced in the first year's Historico-topical course, referred to in Matthew 26. Note also the correlation between Zechariah 9:13 and John 12:20ff; and the fact that taking the two years together, there is opportunity to read all four of the accounts of the Entry.

The week-day selections lead up to Easter, that is, to redemption, both topically and historically. In the morning we have given Jeremiah's concluding messages: prophecies of the judgment upon Babylon and the redemption of Israel. It is these prophecies taken in connection with those of the new covenant which should have saved Jeremiah from being handed down the ages as a pessimist and which should teach us the needed lesson of a Christian and not a worldly optimism: redemption and salvation through suffering and discipline. Salvation of the soul and progress in the world are neither of them automatic. For New Testament lessons, we have continued St. Luke's Life of our Lord, which, it will be noticed, throws into this week the event thereof, beginning with the Entry on Sunday, and including the events of Thursday night and Good Friday. In the evening, there are given topical selections, from both Old and New Testaments, and a double selection on each day, for choice. The selections at present given in the Prayer Book are all of them used, but many other selections are added. For instance, the story of the Crucifixion itself is given each year, besides Apostolic comments thereupon, instead of being relegated entirely to the Gospel for the Day, which, in many instances, will not be read; and finally the redeeming death of our Lord is brought out as not only the fulfilment of prophecy, but also of the history of the past, in the redemption, first from Egypt and second from Babylon.

Almighty and everlasting God, Who, of Thy tender love towards mankind, hast sent Thy Son, our Saviour Jesus Christ, to take upon Him our flesh, and to suffer death upon the cross, that all mankind should follow the example of His great humility; Mercifully grant, that we may both follow the example of His patience, and also be made partakers of His resurrection; through the same Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

Collect for Annunciation of the Blessed Virgin Mary.

We beseech Thee, O Lord, pour Thy grace into our hearts; that, as we have known the incarnation of Thy Son Jesus Christ by the message of an Angel, so by His passion we may be brought unto the glory of His resurrection; through the same Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

Collects for Good Friday.

Almighty God, we beseech Thee graciously to behold Thy family, for which our Lord Jesus Christ was contented to be betrayed, and given up into the hands of wicked men and to suffer death upon the cross: Who now liveth and reigneth with Thee, and the Holy Ghost, ever one God, world without end. Amen.

Almighty and everlasting God, by Whose Spirit the whole body of the Church is governed and sanctified; Receive our supplications and prayers, which we offer before Thee for all estates of men in Thy holy Church, that every member of the same, in His vocation and ministry, may truly and godly serve Thee; through our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ. Amen.

O Merciful God, Who has made all men, and hatest nothing that Thou hast made, nor desirest the death of a sinner, but rather that he should be converted and live; Have mercy upon all Jews, Turks, infidels, and heretics; and take from them all ignorance, hardness of heart, and contempt of Thy Word; and so fetch them home, blessed Lord, to Thy flock, that they may be saved among the remnant of the true Israelites, and be made one fold under one shepherd, Jesus Christ our Lord, Who liveth and reigneth with Thee and the Holy Spirit, one God, world without end. Amen.

Collect for Easter Even.

Grant, O Lord, that as we are baptized into the death of Thy blessed Son, our Saviour Jesus Christ, so by continual mortifying our corrupt affections we may be buried with Him; and that through the grave, and gate of death, we may pass to our joyful resurrection; for His merits, who died, and was buried, and rose again for us, Thy Son, Jesus Christ our Lord. Notes: Critical students of the Gospels place their dates about forty years or more after Pentecost. Years of active evangelization these were. The theme of all the sermons would be our Lord Himself. (1 Cor. 1:23.) "Constant repetition would result in an 'oral tradition' representing every event or word important for the Truth, or most vividly remembered." (Farrar.) Need would be felt for preserving this information of eye-witnesses; so gradually more and more of them would be committed to writing, not always by authority. (Luk. 1:1.) That this information might be trustworthy, finally four definite Gospels grew into being under the Holy Spirit's inspiration. (Luk. 1:2-4; John 20:31.) Even before these, the Epistles gave valuable truth about our Lord and His teaching, and the Old Testament in its types in sacrifices and worship and mani-

Gethsemane.

In dark Gethsemane,

He lay, grief-stricken and alone!

The softly, glowing Syrian night,

Looked calmly on.

Whilst He, the Lord of life and light,

Lay quivering there.

In awful agony of soul,

He, pleading, cries in anguished prayer:

"Oh, Father, let this cup

Pass by Thy Son,

If so Thy holy will be done!"

Ah, no, not so could victory be won,

And Satan spoiled of death!

In bloody sweat, in tears,

He wrestled in the garden's gloom,

Assailed by deadly fears,

Alone, bereft of God.

Thou trod'st the pathway to the tomb,

And glorified for me

Its black, its awful gloom!

For Thee!

The riven heart, the cursed tree,

For me,

A path of light through dark Gethsemane!

Palm Sunday.

"God forbid that I should glory save in the Cross of Our Lord Jesus Christ;" "I determined not to know anything among you save Jesus Christ, and Him crucified"—so St. Paul, in phrase after phrase, opens windows by which we can look into his soul, and see there the utter dominance of one controlling reality—the Cross of Christ.

And why did Christ Crucified thus dominate his thought? The Apostle was a practical man, and he knew by the results of manifold experience that the Cross was the inscrutable, but divinely sufficient, answer to the deepest need of mankind. He had come into close contact with the licentious populace of the Graeco-Roman world, and he had discovered in city after city that the message of Jesus Crucified had an incomparable power to draw the hearts of the most abandoned, to speak peace to the awakened conscience, and to provide an adequate dynamic for a renewed life. Nor had the preaching of the Cross power alone with publicans and sinners. He had watched its effect upon the religious and God-fearing, and beheld them pass from the twilight of the Law to the glorious sunshine of the Kingdom of Grace. More even than this—he knew the transformation which Christ Crucified had effected in his own experience, for he had himself passed from struggle to victory, from defeat to triumph, from death to life.

And as we turn the pages of the New Testament we see writ large this centrality of the Cross. St. Peter, writing in his old age from Rome, reminds the persecuted Christians of Asia how, long before, he had himself witnessed "the sufferings of Christ," and the aged Apostle, in adoring reminiscence, refers to them again and again as the centre of the believer's hope. St. John discovers in the death of Jesus the outstanding and incontrovertible manifestation of the mighty truth of the inmost secret of the Divine Being—"God is love;" and finds in the Blood of Jesus Christ cleansing from all sin.

And, as we scan the Gospels for indications of the mind of Christ, we find, in His thought, too, the centrality of the Cross. Its shadow and its mysterious necessity darkened across His way, until He won the final victory with prayers and strong crying in the Agony of the Garden; and went forth, a willing Victim, to lay down His life, a ransom for many.

In these days, troubled by strange and alien thinking, this centrality of the Cross is often denied. "There is so much good in the worst of us," is the cry; and as "God is a good fellow," all will be well. The testimony of history and experience, however, is loud in its protest against this easy philosophy. The deepest souls, from Paul and Augustine to Luther and Wesley, have rather groaned under the consciousness that there is "so much bad in the best of us;" until they have found their failure and their imperfection covered by the perfect obedience of Christ, their guilt done away by the shedding of His precious blood. "I, if I be lifted up, will draw all men unto Me," is a universal truth, unaffected by the passing and ephemeral phases of thought. The modern Church will only attain to depth and lasting fruitfulness as she can sincerely echo the cry of the Apostle: "God forbid that I should glory, save in the Cross of our Lord Jesus Christ, by whom the world is crucified unto me, and I unto the world."—Canadian Churchman.

"But One Police Force, the American Woman."

In putting out the summary of regulations designed to conserve foodstuffs necessary to support the allies and our own armed forces during the coming three months or more, the Food Administration says:

"The effectiveness of these rules is dependent solely upon the good will, and the willingness to sacrifice, of the American people. In the last analysis the success or failure of any plan such as here outlined rests with the people. We are dependent upon the co-operation of the trades. We have but one police force, the American woman, and we depend upon her to organize in co-operation with our State and local food administrators to see that the rules are obeyed by that small minority who may fail. Part of the rules will be enforced under the Lever Food Act; other parts are voluntary, and will depend upon public sentiment for their success. Our experience hitherto has shown a willingness of the vast majority of consumers, and a full co-operation of the trades, to undergo the self-sacrifice necessary to render such measures effective. The small minority who refuse to co-operate should not be allowed to defeat the Nation's necessities."

We believe this police force can be relied upon to do its duty. The American woman has not failed yet to bear her share of the war responsibilities and burdens. This is a new task, but she is equal to it. One thing, however, should be kept in mind. Food conservation is not by any means simply the woman's or housewife's job. It belongs to the whole people. Nothing is asked of the wife and mother that is not asked also of husband and father and children. It is a joint program in which all are to participate cheerfully and gladly, helping to win the war.

The case was being presented by a speaker, and the time for quiz came. One of the audience arose and said, "I have listened with interest to the arguments and I believe they are sound. As for giving my personal aid, I would, but—"

"Please stop right there," said the speaker earnestly. "Take that 'but' out, or I would rather not have your help at all. It is the 'buts' that are hurting the cause. The 'buts' are pro-German propaganda, however you may look at it. There is no 'but' about it, as I see it. We must win this war! To do that we must concentrate our attention upon the means of winning. We must save food or surrender. We must feed our soldiers in France or we have sent them over merely to murder them—our sons and brothers and husbands. That 'but' cuts me like a knife. I have a son in France, two nephews in France, another in training here. They are giving their all to win this war. We ask the people to save the food to feed them, and you say, 'I would, but—' I beg you, all of you, take the 'buts' out of your thinking forever. Join me in saying, There is but one thing we are set on doing, and that is to put Prussianism forever out of the place of power or pretense or possibility of again embroiling and enslaving the world! We are going to win this war. Food must be had. No matter what others may do, no matter what anyone may say, as for us, we are going to do just this one thing—substitute, reduce, save, sacrifice to any extent needed to win this war!"

The appeal was electric, so filled was it with intensity of feeling and conviction. The audience rose as one and pledged itself to this one thing. And the one who had called forth the thrilling words, said with ample apology, "I did not mean it, nor realize what I was saying. I agree with the speaker with all my heart, and will fling away the blighting 'buts' from this hour!"

There is a lesson in it for us all. The "buts" slip in so easily. Just remember that in effect, if not in intention, they are pro-German.

This much is certain—that while this acute need of white flour abroad lasts, no church ought to have any kind of food function at which white bread or white flour cake or pastry is served. The churches can at least set an example to this extent. It can be done, too, so as to please the palate and ease the conscience at the same time. The people can discover how delicious are the breads and muffins and war cakes and pies and puddings that can be made without white flour.

What a fine moral effect to have at every such supper the Food Administration cards, such as the dining cars have, impressing upon the people the reality of food conservation and its absolute necessity! Just to get everybody talking on the subject would help greatly in the educational process. Here is a chance to do one's bit to win the war.—Government Bulletin.

The Housekeeper's Alphabet.

"Looking over some of grandmother's papers the other day I came across what was called the 'Housekeeper's Alphabet.' It was the most delicious mixture of moralizings and household helps that could be imagined. Let me read it to you," said Mrs. Happy Home-maker.

A Glowing Cross of Red.

Upon the field of battle

Plowed by the shrieking shell,

Where wounded lie and many die

In the midst of earthly hell:

To what do they look for succor

While bombs burst overhead?

A banner white, with emblem bright,

A glowing cross of red.

Out of the murk of carnage

It shines a beacon star;

The rosy glow dispels the woe

Of wounded near and far.

Beneath this glorious banner

A valiant force is led;

Upon the arm they wear a charm—

A glowing cross of red.

Back of the field of battle,

Over the couch of pain,

With tender touch that's serving much,

They strive with might and main

To bind up all the broken,

To dry the tears they shed.

Why do they care? Because they bear

A glowing cross of red.

Upon this world of battle

The Master looks to-day

Down from the skies with saddened eyes

That war should yet hold sway.

But, see: his smile illumines,

Some follow where I tread;

I claim them mine by mercy's sign.

A glowing cross of red.

A True Easter Story.

One day while teaching at R—, in Virginia, feeling tired and homesick, after a hard day's work at school, I took a stroll into the fields some distance from my rustic school house. As I walked I noticed an object bearing the human form approaching me, but crawling like an animal on his hands and knees.

My first impulse was to gather up my skirts and, like the priest and Levite of old, pass by on the other side. But when a plaintive voice spoke pleadingly, "Won't you please teach me how to read?" I paused and looked more closely. As my eyes rested on the suppliant I saw the twisted and distorted form of a young lad clothed in rags with dirty face and hands and unkempt hair, who had never, as I learned later, been able to walk or stand upright. In the painful effort of locomotion two large lumps of flesh had formed on each of his hands, and altogether he was so repulsive that I thought I never could come near enough to him to teach him anything. But the admonition of the apostles, "Do good as you have opportunity," rang in my ears as I looked. "That is what you are down South for," I thought, and then said:

"If you will clean yourself up and comb your hair, I will try to teach you. You may meet me here in this place after school tomorrow afternoon. Where do you live?"

"Come and see," he replied; and as he crawled ahead I followed to the home of this poor, unfortunate young lad.

I found myself in a single large room with only the ground for a floor. It was a miserable home for a family of nine children, under the care of shiftless, drinking parents, and my heart was stirred to its depths by the sad spectacle. The mother being the soberer of the two parents, I said to her:

"Your son wishes to learn to read, and I have promised to teach him."

"He has such a bad temper," she replied; "you better not try to do anything with Jim."

But as I came away the son said: "If I had some soap I would try to wash myself," and at my invitation he went home with me and was well supplied with the necessary articles.

The next day he was on time, and much more presentable, for his first lesson.

His progress was very rapid. In two days he had mastered the alphabet, and I found him eager to gain knowledge. In a short time he had learned the greatest lesson of all. Christ's power to save from sin, and frequent visits at his home revealed the fact that his temper, which had been a terror to all in the home, had given place to such sweetness of disposition that all wondered, and the entire household was manifestly changed for the better, while his own countenance, so repulsive before when lightened up with resurrection glory, was beautiful to gaze upon. In two short months he could read the Bible intelligently, and the rough speech gave way to gracious words "seasoned with salt."

Cold weather coming on, through the influence of others, Jim found a place where he could scour the sills in one of the city hospitals. Calling on him one day, he said:

"Teacher, I scour them just as white as I can to please Jesus."

The rest of this true story is soon told. Jim, who had never been strong and well, was taken ill; he failed rapidly, and being suddenly sent for as I, with the hospital staff the day before Easter, gathered around his dying bed, one and another said: "We shall miss him. Jim has brought twelve of the boys to Christ since he came into the hospital."

Jim had an impressive funeral on Easter Monday, and when his remains had been laid away in beautiful Hollywood Cemetery, we teachers lingered to decorate his resting place with flowers, and in our sadness conversed over the miraculous transformation of Jim and his departure on "resurrection morn" to be with his Saviour whom he had loved and served with his whole heart.—Lutheran.

How Parents Can Aid the Sunday School Teacher.

Do you realize how much parents sometimes thoughtlessly handicap the work of Sunday school teachers by seeming indifference to their painstaking?

Simply to send a child to Sunday school, week after week, is not enough. You must bring yourself into more vital touch with the good work that is going on there every week in that short hour which precedes or supplements the church service, if you would have your child's interest in it unwavering.

There is nothing which so stimulates a child to renewed effort in anything as a knowledge that father and mother are interested in the same thing, and are making a study of it, just as he or she is.

Visit the Sunday school often, just as you do, or ought to do, the day school. Become acquainted with the man or the woman who is your child's religious instructor; look over the lessons that are taught; talk with your child about them; make the names of God and Jesus household words, and let him see your reverence and belief in the grand old Bible lessons with which his young mind is grappling.

A subject which is thus daily discussed and lived up to in the home cannot fail to impress itself upon the mind more forcefully than one which is talked about only on Sunday, and then forgotten until the next.

A teacher can impart a lesson only. It is the child's work to absorb it. There are some thoughtful children, subject to moral and uplifting home influences, who can do this to a greater degree than can others.

A child, too, who is blessed with church-going parents will not be so apt to drift away from church as the one whose parents go to church only at far-separated intervals, such as Christmas and Easter, and stay away from service all the rest of the year.

I cannot cite an instance within my own observation where children whose parents are constant churchgoers do not themselves attend church as regularly as ever they did the Sunday school, coming into it as a matter of course, and still remaining in the Sunday school, many of them as earnest, faithful and consistent teachers.—Ex.

"All which is real now remaineth,
And fadeth never;
The hand which upholds it now, sustaineth

The soul for ever.
Know well, my soul, God's hand controls

Whate'er thou fearest;
Round Him in calmest music rolls
Whate'er thou hearest.

What to thee is shadow, to Him is day,
And the end He knoweth,
And not on a blind and aimless way
The spirit goeth."

For the Young Folks

The Bulbul Legend.

Have you heard the tale of the bulbul?
The nightingale of the East,
How it sang that first bright Easter dawn,
As if at a royal feast?

It had saved its sweetest song, they say,
To herald the risen Lord,
As the Conqueror of sin and death,
And the One to be adored.

It sang of the love of God on high,
The power of Christ the King,
The death of death, and the hope of man,
Till it made the heavens ring.

When it finished the song of its life,
And had done its very best,
It flew again in its quiet way
To its little lowly nest.

When, lo, how wondrous was the change,
Which it found had taken place;
For each little dull brown egg it left
Now shine with a brilliant grace.

One had turned red like the blood of Christ,
One gold like the stars above,
One shone with the prange of the dawn,
One was bright with blue for love.

It was done by God, the legend says,
To show that He prized the song.
And so bright-colored eggs at Easter
Still pass this story along.

The tale of the bulbul's song and nest
A beautiful truth hands down:—
God ever prizes His creature's best,
And it with glory will crown.

But unto men, who give Him their best,
The risen Lord adds this grace:—
That they may show His power and love,
And His brightness in their face.

Oh, marvelous honor, thus to wear
The marks of a love Divine;
To bear the image of God above,
And with His glory to shine.

The Poor Little Hobarts.

"What do you think, Auntie!" cried three voices at once the first Sunday morning that the Bliss children were home from the country. "We know some children who never get to Sunday school."

"I think I could understand better if one talked at a time," said the young lady with a smile. "What is it, Bobby?
You are the biggest."

"I said we know some children who never go to Sunday school—they never did go, Auntie."

"That is perfectly dreadful," said Auntie. "What is the reason they do not go?"

"There is no Sunday school near them," said Ruth. "Their father has to take them five miles to school every morning and go for them at night.
They live way off in the big woods with no neighbors."

"It is the Hobart family, Helen," said Mrs. Bliss. "They have charge of the big tract of land Will is manager for. We lived in a shack near them for a week or two this summer. You see the company must hire men to live in the forest to see that people do not steal the timber and molest the cattle that they graze there. They are very nice people, though they are so far from school and church. Their children had a good time with ours this summer."

"Let's save them some of our papers and send them," suggested Amy. "I know they would be glad for some pictures and stories."

"Let's," cried the others, but they soon forgot all about their kind resolution. Perhaps you know that boys and girls, particularly little boys and girls, have many kind thoughts, but often they forget to carry them out.

So the Hobarts were forgotten until in the winter, when Mr. Bliss had to make a trip to the tract of land; and as the weather was very nice and the roads fine he took his wife and the three children with him in the big automobile. The Bliss children bought candy and nuts and chewing-gum and taffy for the Hobart children, but they never thought of tucking in the Sunday-school papers they had once planned to send.

"Have to stay over Sunday!" cried three voices sadly, when the big storm ragged and made traveling out of the question. "We'll miss Sunday school tomorrow!"

But it could not be helped. They were comfortable in the snug farmhouse while outside the wind howled.
Amy cried herself to sleep at the thought of missing Sunday school for the first time in three years, and the boys were very sorry, but you know boys of seven and eight do not cry so easily as little girls of half-past five.

"Come into the sitting-room," said Nellie Hobart promptly at nine o'clock next morning. "It's time to begin."

The children wondered what it was time to begin, but they went in soberly to see. Mrs. Hobart was at the piano and her family and Mr. and Mrs.
Bliss were sitting with books in their hands. She played a tune the children knew at once, and soon they were singing merrily, for it was one they used in the Sunday school at home. Then Mr. Hobart read from the Bible and he asked Mr. Bliss to pray, and then they had more singing. The little Bliss children looked on with open eyes and mouths.

"Since we have some visitors we can have two classes," said Mr. Hobart.
"Usually we have but one. But first we must take our offering."

The money was taken up in a little basket and laid by for a real Sunday school miles away, and then they had the lesson and more singing. "And you have papers, too!" cried Bobby when the familiar little papers were brought out. "I like this nearly as well as our school."

"And we have entertainments, too, don't we, Mamma?" said Joe Hobart.
"If you don't get to go home today we'll give an entertainment for you tonight."

So that night there was more singing and the children spoke pieces, and Mr. Hobart told them Bible stories and Mr. Bliss read from a book of Bible tales and Mrs. Bliss sang and played, so that every one was amazed when the clock struck nine.

"Come back again!" called the little Hobarts when the road was cleared and the big automobile started on its way.
"We like to have you."

"We will go back soon," whispered
Mr. Bliss to the children, "and we'll take them a magic lantern and some Bible pictures for their Sunday school.

That is a little secret, so you must not tell it."

So the Bliss children are looking forward to getting back to the tiny Sunday school very soon with the big, splendid magic lantern and all the books and papers they have collected for the Hobart children. And what do you think? They never, never say "the poor little Hobart children" since they went out to see them that winter day and were snowed in for two whole days.
Can you guess why?—Hilda Richmond.

I Know Not the Man.

Have you ever walked along the shore of the ocean, or of a great lake, perhaps, where the leaping waves brought all sorts of queer trophies to lay at your feet, pebbles and shells and seaweeds torn from the gardens of the deep? If you have, you know how interesting it is to hunt through this merchandise of the sea and search for treasures. Of course, you may not find anything more valuable than a sand dollar. But you do find things that suggest stories.

For instance, I once found an oar, broken right through the blade. What bit of sea tragedy it represented I do not know. Some one may have lost his life when the oar broke. Because it is a type of people who fail in great emergencies, I have chosen it as a text for our Lenten lesson.

The Bible gives us many examples of men who fail in this way. Yet let us think of the men who were with our Lord on the last sad night He spent on earth. He went from the Garden of Gethsemane, you will remember, to the palace of the high priest with His captors. None of His friends were with Him. John the Beloved followed at a distance. And Peter, who had declared he would be faithful even though he were threatened with death—Peter, who drew his sword when it was not required—slipped away like a coward.

John was able to secure admission to the house and he succeeded in getting Peter admitted also. It was daily in those early morning hours, so the soldiers made a fire and gathered about it. Peter joined the little company and drew near to the welcome blaze, but he was not unobserved.

First one serving maid, then another, and at last a man saw him and said:
"Art thou not one of His disciples?"
Then Peter, who in the old, far-off days had been a fisherman on Galilee's blue waters until Jesus called him to catch men, forgot himself and told an untruth. He had been with the Master on the Mount of Transfiguration. He was the first to declare His divinity; yet now he said he was not an apostle and he added: "I know not the Man."

When we read the story we are apt to think Peter was a contemptible coward. We are quite sure that if we had been there we should have said "Yes" instead of "No." Ah, would we? Do we never deny our Lord? Have we never by word or action said, "I know not the Man?"

It is easy to be loyal to Church and religion when everybody else is. The test comes when we find ourselves among the minority. Peter was alone in that company of unfriendly folk who surrounded Christ, or at least, he seems to have forgotten John. He lost one of the finest opportunities of his life. Then he met the loving eyes of his Master, the cock crew for the third time, and he went out to weep bitterly.

Yet, after his three-fold denial, he had another chance to prove that he really did love Jesus. He took it, and finally gave his life for the faith. So we, too, are continually being offered other chances. Lent is full of them. The Church is calling to us in this holy season, which we ought to love, to come back and be no more faithless, but loving, obedient children; for the time will come when the door will be closed. Our Lord has warned us of that. So let us be exceedingly vigilant during these last days.—Young Churchman.

Sowing and Reaping.

If we would remember that our giving is to God, it is hard to believe that we would give sparingly. The farmer expects his harvest to be in proportion to the quantity of the seed which has been properly sowed. One reason that men do not receive more is that they do not give more.

"I don't see how Foreign Missions help the home churches," said Lou Baker, looking up at her mother. The preacher said they did yesterday when he was preaching about missions, you know."

"Do you remember the beautiful beds of nasturtiums Mrs. Snow and I had last summer, Lou?" asked her mother.

"Yes, but—"

"But what has that to do with missions?" replied her mother, smiling. "Let's see. Mrs. Snow would not cut her flowers, you remember. Her bed was a perfect blaze of color for a while. She wanted it to be the finest in town, and for a short time it was. Then the vines began to die, though she gave them the best attention. Before August there was nothing but dry stems left. The flowers had bloomed themselves to death, and drawn all the life from the roots.

"This year she did not plant nasturtiums; she said they did not pay. My bed bloomed until frost. I was on the Flower Committee for the hospital, and sent great bunches of my nasturtiums every week to the sick people. I could not help it; they were so lovely, and brought so much brightness into the long, bare wards. I never thought of saving my plants by giving away my flowers, but so it proved."

"So you think, mamma, that the more we give to Foreign Missions, the more we have at home?" asked Lou.

"There is that, scattereth, and yet increaseth, and there is that withholdeth more than is meet, but it tendeth to poverty," quoted Mrs. Baker. "When I saw the joy the flowers, gleaming like great blotches of red and yellow sunshine, brought into the days of those poor sick ones, I loved my flowers more heartily than I had ever done for the beautiful gift of the flowers. They taught me a lesson on Foreign Missions."—From "Boys and Girls."

The Golden Gloves Family.

Dorothy sighed a great big sigh as she laid her book of fairy stories on the table. Aunt Margaret, who was visiting at Dorothy's house, smiled understandingly, for Aunt Margaret had read every one of those very fairy stories herself when she was a little girl.

"I used to sigh for wishing rings, Dorothy," she said, "and for seven-mile boots, and for golden gloves, too. I never did find a wishing ring or a pair of seven-mile boots, but I did find the golden gloves.

"Really and truly golden gloves, Aunt Margaret?" asked Dorothy eagerly. "Can you wear them all the time?"

"When I put them on they stay until I do or say something that is unkind. Then they fall off and I have to put them on again."

"Oh, that's just like the fairy stories. Do you suppose I will ever find any if I look and look?"

"Throw up your hands," said Aunt Margaret, "and I will put a pair of golden gloves on them."

Dorothy laughed gleefully as her two little hands went up quickly.

"Thumbs first," said Aunt Margaret, as she rubbed Dorothy's thumb just as if she were putting on a glove, while she said one word as a fairy god-mother would have said a magic word. The word she said was "Do." Then she rubbed Dorothy's first finger, as if she were slipping a finger of a glove on that, and said another word. The second word was "Unto." Then came the second finger, and all the other fingers of that hand, and then the thumb and all the fingers of the other hand. When Aunt Margaret had slipped a word on each finger she made a motion as if she were pulling a glove up, first on the left hand and then on the right hand, as she said the last two words.

The words she put on Dorothy's fingers and pulled up over her arms were, "Do unto others as you would that they should do unto you."

Dorothy looked a bit disappointed. "Oh, auntie," she said, "I thought you meant really and truly golden gloves."

"These are really and truly golden gloves, little girl, and if you will wear them all the time and get everybody else in the world to wear them, this old world will be a much more wonderful place to live in than fairyland."

When Dorothy was ready to go out to play she came up to Aunt Margaret. "I'm going to try playing in golden gloves this afternoon," she said. "Please put mine on for me again. I'm afraid they came off when I grabbed my story book from Freida."

Aunt Margaret took Dorothy's two little hands and put the golden gloves on them again.

Then Dorothy went to play at Mary's house. Mary was her best friend. As she ran through the gate in the high hedge she heard something say, "Meow, meow." She saw a kitten with its head caught in the fence. "I'm in such a hurry. I s'pose somebody will come along and get that cat loose directly," she thought as she ran on. She stopped suddenly and looked at her hands. Then she ran across the grass, pushed the hedge back, and gently lifted the kitten out.

"I think I'm going to like my gloves," she said to the kitten as it rubbed up against her feet and purred gratefully.

Dorothy and Mary played all the games they loved best. While they were blowing soap bubbles Dorothy saw Mary's grandmother looking and feeling all around for something.

"She's just lost her glasses again," said Mary. "She's always losing them. Come on and play. She'll find them directly." Dorothy looked down at her hands.

"I'm sure my gloves will come off if I do not find grandmother's glasses because if I were a grandmother I know what I should want a little girl to do unto me." So she laid down her bubble pipe and found the glasses.

When grandmother held her hand a minute and said, "Thank you, dearie," Dorothy had such a happy feeling in her heart she thought, "Oh, I know I'm going to love my gloves."

As Dorothy was going home she passed the fruit stand on the corner. Some of the other girls and boys were teasing Carmella, the little Italian girl whose father had the fruit stand.

"Dago! Dago!" shouted one of the boys. Carmella's black eyes flashed angrily. As she turned quickly her foot slipped and she fell into a puddle of water. The boy who was teasing her clapped his hands and shouted:

"Oh, my, what a muddle: See the Dago in the puddle!"

Everybody laughed—everybody except Dorothy. She started to laugh, too, for Carmella did look too funny for anything, sitting right flat down in the street, but then Dorothy thought, "Oh, my gloves. I'm sure I shouldn't want any one to laugh unto me." So she went right over to Carmella and put her arm about her and helped her up. Somehow every one stopped laughing, and a little bird sang a happy song in Dorothy's heart, "Golden gloves are the very best gloves of all."

That evening Dorothy told Aunt Margaret and mother and father and her big brother Harold all about her golden gloves. Father thought of some things that had happened at his office that day and he said:

"Do you have any extra pairs in men's sizes, Dorothy?" Dorothy slipped down from her chair and put a great big pair of golden gloves on father's hands.

"I think I might be able to use a pair to advantage myself," said Harold, so Dorothy put a pair on his hands.

Mother and Aunt Margaret held up their hands, too, and Dorothy put golden gloves on them. All of the family like their gloves so well that now every morning just after breakfast Dorothy goes around putting golden gloves on all the family.

The happiest family to be found anywhere is the Golden Gloves Family. Their home is more wonderful than fairyland, and sunshine follows them always along the trail of the Golden Gloves.—Mrs. E. C. Cronk.

Who Likes the Rain?

"I," said the duck, "I call it fun, For I have my pretty red rubbers on; They make a little three-toed track In the soft, cool mud—quack! quack!"

"I," cried the dandelion, "I! My roots are thirsty, my buds are dry." And she lifted a tousled, yellow head Out of her green and grassy bed.

"I hope 'twill pour! I hope 'twill pour!" Purred the tree toad at his gray bark door;

"For, with a broad leaf for a roof, I am perfectly weatherproof."

Sang the brook: "I laugh at every drop, And wish they never need to stop, Till a big, big river I grew to be, And could find my way to the sea."

"I," shouted Ted, "for I can run With my high-top boots and raincoat on, Through every puddle and runlet and pool I find on my way to school."

Nature is not always serene, but God's promise of seed time and harvest fails not. The lilies of the field are as beautiful to-day as when Jesus pointed to them as an indication of God's love for the beautiful and God's greater care for His own children. We, like the psalmist of long ago, may still lift up our eyes to the mountains and realize that our help comes from Jehovah. If we approach "God's beautiful out-of-doors" with an open mind, we are forced to the conclusion that there is a power controlling the universe, which is wise and beneficent, and who, we may also learn from Jesus Christ, is forever loving, too.—Howard A. Bridgeman.

Community Thrift

Thrift is contagious. Thrifty towns, like thrifty people, are always cheerful-looking and prosperous.

Thriftless towns are shiftless towns. They have a dreary, dismal look—broken fences here, shutters off the hinge there, ruts in the road and blights on the trees.

Thrift is contagious. When one man sets out to keep his house nicely painted and in good repair, the lawn well mown and the yard free from litter, the neighbors soon do likewise. And before long the whole community is a better and more pleasant place in which to live.

W. E. M. THORNTON.

W. E. M. THORNTON, of Altavista, Va., died at the home of his son, Dr. V. A. Thornton, of Stony Creek, Va., on February 7, 1918, in his sixty-sixth year. His health had failed for several years from "hardening of the arteries," but the end came rather suddenly, but calm and peacefully, just going to sleep to awake with his Lord, in whom his faith was strong and abiding. Like his ancestors of old he was a vestryman of the Episcopal Church for many years.

Mr. Thornton was a direct descendant of the Thornton and Clark families of Gloucester and Brunswick Counties, though he was a native of Sussex.

He leaves a widow, who was a daughter of William S. Thornton, of Sussex County, one son, Dr. V. A. Thornton, and two grandchildren to mourn their loss.

Mr. Thornton was a successful merchant and peanut buyer, until his health compelled him to retire, then he moved to Altavista, Va., and was elected first mayor of the town. After serving two terms, his health still failing, he had to resign. He was highly respected by all and loved by those who knew him well.

A FRIEND.

MEMORIAL MINUTE.

The Commission on the Enrichment and Revision of the Prayer Book is called upon again to record the passing away of one of its members, MR. CHARLES C. SAUNDERS, prominent in his Diocese, honored by all who knew him, a delegate to the General Convention and conspicuous for his usefulness as a member of Committees on the Constitution and Canons of the Church. His removal from the work and deliberations of the Commission on the Revision of the Prayer Book is a loss most serious to the Commission and to the Church.

Few laymen were so well posted as he in liturgical matters, and so deeply interested in the subject. Although of positive theological and ecclesiastical views, he was at the same time distinctly appreciative of the needs of the Church to-day. The members of the Commission had learned to value the soundness of his opinions, to appreciate the breadth of his outlook, while the charm of his character and manner made a deep impression on them all. We looked upon him as a dear friend and valued colleague.

With him may we be partakers of the heavenly kingdom.

MRS. M. ELLA EMORY.

After a long and useful life, she entered into rest on February 6, 1918, at her home in Georgetown, Md., after a short illness, MRS. ELLA EMORY, in her eighty-sixth year, daughter of the late George W. and Susan Ann Biddle Oldham, of Cecil County, Maryland, a faithful follower of Christ's teachings, conscientious to all duties toward her Church, her family and her friends. Her memory will be cherished in the hearts of all who knew her, leaving all glad that one so unselfish, so loving and so untiring has been a part of their lives, and an example to follow. As she lived, so she peacefully, quietly passed out of this life to the life eternal. She is survived by one sister, and several nieces and nephews. Mrs. Emory's grandfather, Colonel Edward Oldham, was a gallant officer of the Revolution and a member of the original order of the "Cincinnati," also a direct lineal descendant of Augustine Herman, first settler of Bohemia Manor.

Services were held on Saturday, February 9th, at St. Andrew's Chapel, Shrewsbury Parish. Interment was at Old St. Stephen's Cemetery, Earleville, Md., where repose seven generations of her ancestors.

For so He giveth His beloved sleep.

Beyond the veil the way continues to ascend. The soul which has acquired the habit of climbing continues to climb. There are higher heights—who dares name them? There are divine visions—who dares portray them? There are more than angelic songs—how futile to try to strike them till the harp be strung! But there is One who gathers in Himself the measures of all possible heights, the sights of all visions, and the melodies of all possible songs. At the mention of His name the soul which has conquered the altar stairs, presses up and on, along the glory heights. His name is God.—J. J. Vance.

Atonement and Forgiveness.

It is sometimes argued that as human forgiveness does not need an atonement, God's pardon should be regarded as equally independent of any such sacrifice as is now being considered. But this is to overlook the essential features of all forgiveness, which means that the one who pardons really accepts the results of the wrong done to him in order that he may exempt the other from any punishment. Thus, as it has been well illustrated, when a man cancels a debt, he, of necessity, loses the amount, and if he pardons an insult or a blow, he accepts in his own person the injury done in either case, so that human pardon may be said to cancel at its own expense any wrong done; and this principle of the innocent suffering for the guilty is the fundamental truth of the Atonement. It is, therefore, urged with great force that every act of forgiveness is really an act of Atonement, and thus human forgiveness, so far from obviating the necessity of Divine Atonement, really illuminates, vindicates and necessitates the Divine pardon, for "forgiveness is mercy which has first satisfied the principle of justice." And so we hold that Christ's death made it possible for God to forgive sin. What His justice demanded His love provided.

W. H. Griffith Thomas.

Sorrow and Joy.

World vision and world viewpoint are essential for the ultimate judgment of joy and sorrow. The narrowing personal viewpoint weeps in unnecessary sorrow or rejoices in unwarranted joy. The Gospel speaks of both these errors.

"The world shall rejoice" at the spectacle of Jesus' crucifixion. What a relief for His enemies to think that His voice, so often heard in rebuke, was at last silent! No longer for them was He the accusing finger of conscience. They rested more easily now His free spirit was not abroad amid their nicely adjusted systems of doctrines. His discovering of fundamentals and call to reconstruction had been disquieting. They had feared lest His propaganda should catch the imagination of the people. It was better that this man of unshackled spirit should die rather than the whole people perish.

"Ye shall weep and lament." At His death those early disciples lost a teacher, guide and friend. Not fully did they comprehend Him. He was an increasing marvel to them with the unfolding secrets of power and communion with God. They realized that He had shown them some things clearer. They had looked into the face of the Father. His going away was distressing enough, but the shame and injustice of it all numbed their hearts. They saw in it the defeat of the noblest and holiest they had known. It was the triumph of bigotry, which in its hatred had turned to wickedness.

"Your sorrow shall be turned into joy." Both the disciples and the world were in possession only of the personal viewpoint. Their judgment was warped. Both were shortsighted. They could not see the bearings of the life and death of Jesus. Temporal, not eternal, were their bases of judgment. But at Pentecost, with the realization of final issues and of Christ's relation to God, man, life, death, forgiveness and power comes a revision of those judgments. The world's joy is turned to grief and the disciples' sorrow is turned to lasting joy. World vision and world viewpoint would show them the entire pre-eminence for the world of the gift of the Spirit which Christ would send when He returned to the Father.

In many things in life we lose the deep joy that should be ours because we have no large vision and viewpoint. No mother can prevent the sob of her yearning heart as she sends her boy to the battlefields of Europe. She bids him go because she realizes that there are some things dearer than life itself. By God's help she may look on into the years and anticipate the deep joy that will come because her son played his part, saw his life in relation to the eternal verities of this struggle and invested that life in God's service. So in all things in life, our sorrow comes from the personal viewpoint. No blame to us! God made the love of home and dear ones. In that love, imperfect as it is, we see mirrored the perfect love of the Father.

But as we see the personal in Christ's vision of the world, we find that we do not lose it, but it is enriched by its relation to that world vision, and we have a new joy which no man taketh from us.—Canadian Churchman.

Thoughts For the Thoughtful

What you are to men depends on what God is to you.—Ex.

"Man's perversity may delay, but it cannot frustrate God's purposes."

It is not by paces but by prayers that God is come at.—Bishop Andrewes.

We have to know a good many other people to become well acquainted with ourselves.

The worst pit of misfortune into which a man can fall is the one he digs himself.—Ex.

The secret of happiness is not in doing what one likes, but in liking what one has to do.—Barrie.

Jesus did not come only to preach the Gospel, but that there might be a Gospel to preach.—R. W. Dale.

Whenever you attempt a good work you will find other men doing the same kind of work, and probably doing it better. Envy them not.—Drummond.

To the Christian death is but the fulfilment of a promise: "I will come again and receive you unto Myself; that where I am there ye may be also."

There is no step of saintliness and there is no thrill of purest peace that is impossible to you, if only you have placed yourself in earnest under the discipline of Christ.

The performance of a duty is never a useless office, though we may not see the consequences, or they may be quite different from what we expected or calculated on.—Selected.

It is easy in the world to live after the world's opinion; it is easy in solitude to live after our own; but the great man is he who in the midst of the crowd keeps with perfect sweetness the independence of solitude.

"I count this thing to be grandly true: That a noble deed is a step toward God,

Lifting the soul from the common sod

To a purer air and a broader view."

To help a brother up the mountain while you yourself are only just able to keep your foothold, to struggle through the mist together—that surely is better than to stand at the summit and beckon.—Forbes Robinson.

Any trouble or anxiety that makes you feel helpless and lonely and in need of a Human Helper and a Human Comforter, thank God for it. He is teaching you to cast yourself upon One who is perfectly human because perfectly divine.—Selected.

While the kingdoms of this world have their day and perish, the kingdom of God endures. Slowly the purpose of the ages is being fulfilled till in the end He will manifest Himself as the Eternal King, supremely exalted, supremely holy.—A. F. Kirkpatrick.

The glory of the world declares that the living God stands behind the world; for if He did not stand behind it and pervade it with His gracious eulogy, there could be none of this beauty. Beauty is always the outward and visible sign of indwelling mind.—W. L. Watkinson.

By all means use sometimes to be alone.

Salute thyself; see what thy soul doth wear;

Dare to look in thy chest, for 'tis thine own.

And fumble up and down what thou findest there.

—George Herbert.

Passing centuries, however many their number, could not erect merely an exalted ethical character into the Christ of today and forever; and the study of His character is largely profitless save as it leads men and nations to hear the voice of Jesus as on the last day, the great day of the feast, He stood and cried, saying, "If any man thirst let him come unto Me and drink."—R. E. Speer.

There is no work that has ever been accomplished, that proved of lasting worth, which has not been built on the foundation of certainty in the existence of and trust in God. All work, if it is to be of worth, must come from and be built on this foundation of certainty in God. Guide yourselves so you will hope and trust in Him, and in that hope and trust you will find the goal of eternal life.—Bishop Howden.

CHURCH KNOWLEDGE AND NURTURE.

fold prophecies gave much knowledge. Early testimony of Christian Fathers like Justin Martyr and Irenaeus; constant use; and later Council action caused these to be accepted as Canonical. Secular writers, Josephus, Pliny and Tacitus; help inform us. The first three Gospels (Synoptics) give chiefly Our Lord's Galilean Ministry, many miracles and parables, and are narratives without comment. St. John's Gospel gives the Judean Ministry special miracles, conversations and controversies, and is most doctrinal. The Gospel of St. Matthew was written more especially for Jews, and about the Kingdom; Mark for Roman Christians, and of service; Luke for Greeks, and of Atonement; and John for every one, and of Divinity and Incarnation. ("Caley's" & Rhee's books are needed for this lesson.)

"The man who is not conscious of his own faults has no charity for another."

"The devil is always polite upon first acquaintance."

The Atonement and Christian Experience.

In all ages the truth that "Jesus died for me" has adequately met and perfectly satisfied the conscience of the sinner, and it will always remain the test of a satisfying doctrine of the Atonement that it meets the demand for peace with God and assures the conscience burdened with sin and guilt.

A well-known English Congregational minister, the Rev. J. Morgan Gibbon, tells of a friend of his, belonging to the most advanced schools of theological thought, who was called to see a sick man in one of the mean streets of a great town. He found him very ill and very poor. The room was bare of all comfort and lacked even most of the necessities of human existence. After a little while the minister said, "What can I do for you? Tell me fully and frankly what you want and I will do my best to help you."

"I only want one thing," was the startling reply, "the forgiveness of my sins." The minister's eyes had roamed the room, and he had already made a mental note of several things which were sorely wanted. But the dying man ignored these trifles. He was beyond the reach of men's harm or help. He was independent of wealth and comfort and all the things men strive for. One great deep-sea need had come to the surface and scared all lesser wants away. "I only want one thing, the forgiveness of my sins." Mr. Gibbon then sums up the incident by saying, "Now what can one do in such a case? I know only of one thing. There is only one word I know of to be said, 'Jesus Christ died for you. Ye are made near in the blood of Christ.'" It is, of course, impossible to explain it fully, and no one really believes that the death of Jesus Christ was demanded by the anger of God. On the contrary, God gave His Son, because before He gave, He loved the world. We cannot help speaking in terms of earthly justice by referring to penalties and satisfaction, but we know that the righteousness of God is not contradictory of, but in full harmony with His love. Yet Jesus Christ died, the just for the unjust, shedding His blood for the remission of sin, and when conscience is aroused in a man, the only antidote to despair is the Cross.

Another striking testimony to this fact of experience, that a man's conscience when awakened cannot accept God's love without atonement, will be found in Falconer, The Unfinished Symphony, telling of a conversation with the late Professor Pfeiderer, who asked for an actual instance. On one being given, Pfeiderer replied, "If a doctrine really meets a deep human need, it must be true." To those to whom the use of the word "satisfaction" is objectionable it may be said that so long as the truth enshrined in it is emphasized, the word itself counts for very little. "If the misuse of a word would reconcile thoughtful men to the truth intended to be conveyed, one might easily forgo it." All that is desired is that the conscience and heart of a man convicted of sin shall find perfect rest and peace, and apparently this is impossible apart from the acceptance of a Saviour whose death was at once a vindication of righteousness and a guarantee of pardon.

W. H. Griffith Thomas.

"If some of us would praise God more, we should blame our neighbor less."

Whatever we adore and esteem, we are changed into its image. Idolaters are as stupid and senseless as the idols to which they pay homage. Thus when God is chosen as one supreme good and last end, by conversing with Him, the image of His glorious holiness is derived on the soul, and it becomes godly; the heart is drawn by His attractive excellencies, and the life directed to Him.—William Bates.

Risen With Christ.

In the midst of life's vicissitudes and manifold tribulations, Christians have a right to all the comfort and strength which the prospect of a joyful resurrection, at last day, can impart. This right they must not be denied. Of the consolation that springs from the deserted tomb in the garden they will not be deprived. It is not in the power of the most vivid imagination to exaggerate the ecstasies of that hour when they shall be caught up to forever participate in the glory of their risen Redeemer. Nothing is so eminently fitted to kindle in men's souls a good hope of a blessed immortality as the complete victory which Christ achieved over the last enemy that shall be destroyed. Since Christ is risen, we may depart from the sepulchre, even with rejoicing, as the Marys did from the empty tomb.

Now, into the deepest sorrows and darkest hours of human experience, the brightest rays of joy may enter through the belief that the loved one whom we reluctantly surrender to the embrace of relentless death, we at the same time commit to the unutterable rapture of an endless life. If for one thing above another God should be praised, it is for the privilege, in trouble, in sore bereavement, of looking in hopeful trustfulness unto Christ and His triumph, and of distilling great consolation out of the blessed vision. Meanwhile, this vision should not be allowed to diminish the consolation of present resurrection with Christ, nor to make us insensible to the obligations it imposes. The apostle spake not to dead, but to living men, not of future glorious possibilities, but of present realities, when he said: "If ye be risen with Christ, seek those things which are above." Already is the believer risen with Christ.—Exchange.

The Resurrection From the Dead.

At the moment when Christ died, nothing could have seemed more abjectly weak, more pitifully hopeless, more absolutely doomed to scorn and extinction and despair than the Church which He had founded. It numbered but a handful of weak followers. They were poor, they were ignorant, they were helpless. They could not claim a single synagogue or a single sword. So feeble were they, and insignificant, that it would have looked like foolish partiality to prophesy for them the limited existence of a Galilean sect. How was it that these dull and ignorant men, with their cross of wood, triumphed over the deadly fascinations of sensual mythologies, conquered kings and their armies, and overcame the world? Recompense.

We are quite sure
That He will give them back—bright, pure and beautiful;
We know He will but keep
Our own and His until we fall asleep.
We know He does not mean
To break the strands reaching between The Here and There.
He does not mean—though heaven be fair—
To change the spirits entering there, that they forget
The eyes upraised and wet,
The lips too still for prayer,
The mute despair.
He will not take
The spirits which He gave, and make
The glorified so new
That they are lost to me and you.

I do believe
They will receive
Us—you and me—and be so glad To meet us, that when most I would grow sad
I just begin to think about that gladness, and the day
When they shall tell us all about the way
That they have learned to go—
Heaven's pathways show,
My lost, my own, and I Shall have so much to see together by and by.

I do believe that just the same sweet face,
But glorified, is waiting in the place
Where we shall meet, if only I Am counted worthy in that by and by.

I do believe that God will give a sweet surprise
To tear-stained, saddened eyes,
And that His heaven will be.
Most glad, most tided through with joy for you and me,
As we have suffered most, God never made Spirit for spirit, answering shade for shade,
And placed them side by side—
So wrought in one, though separate, mystified—
And meant to break the quivering thread between.
When we shall wake,
I am quite sure, we shall be very glad
That for a little while we were so sad.

The Resurrection.

Easter Day, the Queen of Christian festivals, to which we all with joyful hearts are looking forward, bears witness to a wonderful fact, the resurrection of Jesus Christ, from the dead.
And this fact is the central truth of Christianity. Upon this fact the great Apostle to the Gentiles, with his keen, incisive intellect and his irrefutable logic, hazards the truth or falsity of the Christian religion. The Church, too, takes her stand here with St. Paul: "If Christ be not risen then is our preaching vain, and your faith is also vain."

Yea, and we are found false witnesses of God."

It is important to understand that there can be no middle ground between the truth or falsity of the resurrection of our Blessed Lord. It is either a fact or fiction. If fiction the whole fabric of Christianity falls; if fact the structure stands immovable. And the fact that Christianity has stood, unshaken by the assault of foes during all the centuries, leavening and raising the standard of life of the nations, proves beyond the reasonable shadow of a doubt, the absolute truth of the resurrection. It is an historical fact, attested and authenticated by the same law of evidence as any other accredited fact of history.

But what concerns us most and explains the joy of Eastertide is the bearing this historic fact has upon the life of men, that life that now is and is to continue to be.

Of course, we can only briefly touch upon one or two truths that it reveals.
And one of these is the new meaning and interpretation that it gives to life.
Not only is it the pledge of immortality, the certain assurance that if a man die, he shall live again, but also that "these mortal bodies shall be made like unto His own glorious Body," having new and inexhaustible powers. Not the mere "extension of an existence with which we are acquainted, but the manifestation of an existence for which we hope."

Those who can truly say: "I believe in the resurrection of the body and the life of the world to come," have caught a vision that transforms them and have been given a motive to live above the sordid, have been already admitted into the Presence Chamber of the King, where they realize the true grandeur and dignity of human life, redeemed by the Lord.—The Crozier.

"BECAUSE I LIVE—"

If any distinction may properly be made among the fundamental truths of our holy religion, blended as they are in one whole, the doctrine of the Resurrection of Christ must be the chiefest, the most all-embracing, the most satisfying and soul-enriching, of them all. In its fulness of meaning it is also, perhaps, the hardest to grasp and keep. It is a continual challenge to the deepest thought, the wisest purposes and the highest aspirations of which man is capable. As he apprehends its significance it becomes more and more the inspiration for life's duties, the solvent for its perplexities and the antidote for its disappointments. Understood in its wholeness, it is that in which and by which and for which he lives. Not only is it the assurance of the finished work on which his faith is founded, and the promise of the blessed consummation on which his hopes are fixed, but for the present moment the worth and the reality of life are, for the believer, wrapped up in the abiding and vitalizing "Because I live" of the Divine and ever-present Lord.

Again the glad and holy season of Easter approaches in the train of the sad dark days of Holy Week. Has ever its message been more needful, more welcome, than now? We know not how it will be when these lines are read, but they are written on one of the most anxious days which the war has yet brought to us. It is not in fear or in doubt, must less in despair, that men's hearts are heavy and cry out, "O Lord, how long!" but because imagination is busy with the unimaginable horror of it, and the mind shudders at the thought that it may mean a prolongation of the world's agony. We turn from the outburst of hell and carnival of death to the Cross-bearing, Risen Christ and hear Him say, "Because I live." It is more than a pledge of the presence of The White Comrade as He bends over the forms of the dying and receives their passing souls. It is more than a promise of deliverance and final salvation. Is it not an explanation, too? And is it not a battle cry? "Because I live, ye shall live also," but Christ said it before His Gethsemane and before the Cross. He took men into the fellowship of His sufferings when He took them into partnership in His life. "Because I live" sin must die and cruelty and baseness and the scornfulness of brutal pride and power must die. A redeemed world must be made clean, and things present as well as things to come must be prepared for the inheritance of My people. "Because I live" it shall be so. "Ye shall live also"—yea, though ye die; but ye shall live free, and righteously, unselfishly, courageously, whether in this world or another, as befiteth the children of God.

So the Easter light shines with undimmed glory on even the darkest places of earth and the most tragic experiences of men. Perchance we will learn this year, God helping us, new lessons in the Life of Him who gives us life through the processes of death, and victory, the Cross and the conquest, under His banner.

THE MISSIONARY TREASURY.

Mr. King's report for March 1, late in coming to hand, calls for very serious consideration. We give it entire.

Last month we reported the receipts on the apportionment as being $155,509.42. To the first of this month they had grown to $232,591.00, derived as follows:

Parishes	$175,065.06
Individuals	23,060.77
Sunday-schools	2,334.04
Woman's Auxiliary	30,346.37
Junior Auxiliary	1,784.76

Gifts to the "One Day's Income Plan" are included in this sum, and they amount to $11,373.03, as compared with $11,155.57 a year ago. This total of $232,591.00 is $26,129.30 less than the gifts of a year ago for a like period. We are sorry to say this but we must do so.

But the offerings are falling behind when the reverse should be the case, for the expenses are always growing. First as to these latter: Societies, corporations, individuals—all alike have felt and will feel more and more the ever increasing high cost of living. The Board of Missions is no exception to this rule. Whether we wish it or not, like it or not, it is a condition all must face both in our corporate capacity and as individuals. Compared with former years the Board of Missions to-day is hardly entering on new work, more's the pity, by reason for consideration of the times. Yet certain new and large items have been added to its budget. Last month mention was made of an extra $200,000 for China. The General Convention properly provided for pensions for the Clergy and the Board of Missions' share in this most excellent plan is in the neighborhood of $50,000 this year. Last year's bill was not met by $143,000. Two of these items make $343,000 not provided for in the budget. It will readily be seen that to be to-day $26,000.00 behind the receipts of last year tends to disquietude. Possibly the change of date for closing the fiscal year may have something to do with it.

For many years, perhaps always, many of us have been prone to think of our sacrifices. To-day, thank God, we are learning to forget that word, and substituting therefor "service," for we have been given a charge and privilege such as men have never been given before, and it will take all our strength and soul and courage faithfully to fulfil our trust.

GEORGE GORDON KING,

Treasurer.

Church Missions House, March 1, 1918.

One is not surprised at the falling off in missionary offerings when present conditions are considered, especially the persistent call made by the government and its multitudinous agencies for all the spare money in the country. The high cost of living is being to some extent discounted by cutting off extravagancies and simplifying the style of living. The people are doing with less and saving the change. But this equally inexorable demand for the purchase of War Savings Stamps, to say nothing of Liberty Bonds, Red Cross and Y. M. C. A. subscriptions, etc., etc., cannot and must not be avoided. The very encouraging feature is that the missionary giving has not shown a greater falling off. It is a demonstration of how our Church folk are making conscience of their missionary work and are appreciating its prime importance in the scheme of things.

But not all have learned to see it thus. A Sunday-school teacher came to us the other day to ask what she should say to one of her boys who was convinced that during this Lent War Savings Stamps should have precedence over Mite Boxes. He was no slacker, but in his judgment our first and immediate Christian duty was to "swat the Kaiser," and to this patriotic and pious purpose all his pennies were being dedicated. We could only advise her to point out that it was not good strategy to abandon any part of a hard-won battle line in the face of the enemy. The whole line must be held if a victory at any point is to be made secure, and a good general is always careful that the foe does not turn his flanks. Our battle against "the world-rulers of this darkness" is essentially one, and while a specially vicious attack from an unexpected quarter calls for extraordinary effort there it does not justify a cessation of hostilities elsewhere. On the contrary, it should be answered, if possible, by a general advance. To drop the figure, while paganism in Germany and paganism in China and, alas! paganism in America present different appearances and, upon occasions, have to be met with different weapons, yet they are essentially the same at bottom and are to be overcome, in the last analysis, by the same spiritual forces of light and love and life, under the same Captain of our Salvation. Of what avail would it be to save the world from Kaiserism and have it sink into some less virile form of heathenism; or what profit to swap Prussian junkerism for an American brand of the same article? The thing, is not unthinkable, and only the religious forces in the world will save it. Moreover, the world is being too closely united now for any nation or people to save its life alone. One must take a very wide view in these days if he would see the whole and grasp the ever broadening range of Christian interests and duty. If one cannot realize it all, yet let him be sure of this, that loyalty to the one great cause of God demands that nowhere shall there be retreat or truce or slackness. His resources are abundant if only His people are willing in the day of His power. As these lines are being written the world is staggering under the awful blow being delivered by the enemy before St. Quentin. We cannot take our mind off it long. General Haig and the Allied War Council will count no massing of men too great, no expenditure of munitions too costly to repel this deadly onslaught. Yet we know that the long line of trenches from Switzerland to the North Sea are manned and being held, and to-night munitions of war are flowing in an unbroken stream toward Ypres and Toul and Verdun, as well as toward St. Quentin and Cambrai.

Never has the great Christian mission, the preaching of the Gospel of the Kingdom of God, meant more than it does to-day. Never has its cause been more completely vindicated, nor have its values shone forth in a whiter, clearer light, than at this stormy Eastertide. It must not fail, at this critical time, of its ordinary support and more. If, in the excitement of the hour and the urgency of other demands, some of us do not understand and some forget, then the others must stand in the breach, add one more step to our spear's length and make good whatever may be lacking on their part, as perhaps, on some other part of the field they are supplying our lack of service.

It is good to notice in Mr. King's report even a slight increase in gifts under the "One Day's Income Plan." Cannot more of us, while our regular offerings flow into the Lord's treasury without fail, adopt this plan not only for annual but for more frequent special gifts? It is such an excellent reminder of how freely we have received. The very computation of it would be a valuable lesson in thrift to some people who are careless in keeping their accounts. But by whatever means, let us keep the urgency of this great part of the King's business ever before us, and not allow it to be overlooked as one of those making special demands upon our loyalty in these times of extraordinary opportunity for serving God and man.

ANSWERS.

A correspondent propounds the following queries:

"I have heard of 'Sponsors by proxy.' Is there any reality to that?"

The Prayer Book certainly contemplates the presence of the sponsors at the baptism, and to comply with the requirements of the service two or more real sponsors ought to be present. If in addition to these the parents desire other persons to be sponsors who cannot be present, and these persons have signified their willingness to accept the responsibility and assume the relationship, it is usual for the minister to include their names in the registration. The "reality" of it depends largely, as in the case of other sponsorship, upon their appreciation of the obligations assumed and their sincerity in undertaking them.

"Does the Church discriminate as to the seriousness in the breaking of any of the Ten Commandments?"

No; on the contrary, she carefully avoids making such discrimination.

"Can a Bishop refuse to depose a priest even though that priest has been guilty of a grievous moral fall? (lapse) Is there any Church law in regard to this matter?"

The canon laws on the trial of a clergyman differ somewhat in the various dioceses. We believe they are uniform, however, in this, that when, after proper presentment, the trial has been had, if the accused is found guilty, the court certifies its findings to the Bishop with the sentence which, in its judgment, ought to be imposed. The Bishop may then impose the sentence awarded by the court, or may mitigate or remit it, or may grant a new trial; but he cannot impose a more severe sentence than that adjudged by the trial court.

"Should a priest give a common hearing when asked by one party to settle a dispute where it is claimed wages are withheld, or is he justified in claiming that as being outside his sphere?"

Upon his ordination to the priesthood a minister is asked, "Will you maintain and set forward, as much as lieth in you, quietness, peace and love, among all Christian people, and especially among them that are or shall be committed to your charge?" He answers, "I will do so, the Lord being my helper." This ordinary Christian duty, however, does not compel him to act as "a judge or a divider" over his brethren; and in any given case he would use his best judgment as to whether he would wisely undertake that office, and then what means he would use to arrive at a fair and righteous decision.

Book Notices

(All books reviewed at any time in this column may be ordered at the publisher's price given, plus postage 15 cents, from the book department of the Southern Churchman.)

The Resurrection of Our Lord. By William Milligan, D. D., Professor of Divinity and Biblical Criticism in the University of Aberdeen. New York. The Macmillan Company. 1917. Pp. 318; $1.75.

This is a standard work, originally published in 1881, the popularity of which is indicated in the fact that the copy before us is from the sixth reprint of the fourth edition. In the opening chapters the evidence for the fact of the resurrection, and the various objections which have been urged against it, are considered, which lead up to the study of the significance of the fact and its bearing upon the deepest questions which affect the life of the individual and the Church. It is the later chapters, and the large number of learned notes appended, which are the most valuable. The author holds closely to the Bible, and if in some points modern thought has gone beyond him it is still a question how far it has improved upon the old teachings as well as how far its somewhat hazy conclusions will stand the test of further investigation. Meantime the old truths stand sure, far transcending our understanding of them.

Immortality. An Essay in Discovery; Co-ordinating Scientific, Psychical and Biblical Research. By B. H. Streeter, A. Clutton-Buck, C. W. Emmet, J. A. Hadfield, and the Author of "Pro Christo et Ecclesia." New York. The Macmillan Company. 1917. Pp. 380. $2.25.

The authors use the same methods applied in two previous works issued under the same editorship, namely, "Foundations," and "Concerning Prayer." Different writers approach the subject of investigation from the side which their studies and training have fitted them to discuss. Their purpose is "to bring together the ascertained results of different branches of Scientific, Philosophical, Critical and Historical study in such a way as to interpenetrate and illuminate one another in the light of the values derived from Religion, Ethics and Art." The program is a sufficiently ambitious one and would seem to proceed on the right lines. When, however, the subject is one that concerns the deepest spiritual interests of mankind, one needs to be assured that the "ascertained results" are really ascertained, and not in large measure assumed, before he accepts the resultant of their co-ordination as the final word on the matter in hand. It seems to us, with our very limited knowledge of some of these branches of study, that our authors have gone beyond what has been ascertained in some instances, especially in the sphere of Biblical criticism. The thoughtful reader will, of course, hold this caveat in mind, and will still find this work exceedingly suggestive, opening before the mind new fields for candid and reverent thought and making the unknown future of the soul less ghostly, less unreal and unnatural, than his imagination, fed on traditional forms emptied of meaning, had conceived. He will wish that more had been made of a true and tenable doctrine of Atonement, and will furnish the immortality of his faith with joys beyond the ken of science or philosophy, while gladly finding confirmatory reasons for the hope that is in him and new light on unexplored regions of fact.

Here is a single passage on a somewhat side-issue:

"* * * Joy there must be in Heaven; but it always has to be earned, and could not be itself if it were not earned. We cannot, so to speak, pay a life subscription for it and have it without further effort, throughout eternity. Nor should we be satisfied with a universe in which we could. Such a Heaven would be like an everlasting club, in which we should all pass the time, having retired from business. But the best men do not wish to retire from business; they wish rather for a business freed from the struggle for life, and all the more intense for that reason * * * If we think of Heaven as a real place it is as a Heaven of real people doing real things."

Out of the storm-beaten darkness,
Back from the wreck-strewn shore,
Out of the wild night's black menace,
Into the open door.

There where the warm light is bathing
The table all spread with cheer,
Where love stands, ready with greeting,
And Hope again draws near.

Then may the storm be forgotten /
Its thunderings die away,
The sunlight of brighter to-morrows
Shine backward, and gild to-day.

O mariner, shipwrecked, despairing,
Look for the open door,
Where Love stands ever in waiting,
Where Hope comes back once more.

FROM CAMP McCLELLAN.

Mr. Editor: I have just come from a typical Y. M. C. A. entertainment at "Y" No. 115. Ladies from Anniston and Atlanta came out and sang and talked to our Virginia boys. It was fine, and the building was crowded with enthusiastic but well-behaved fellows. The statement that there was a crowd would not be significant, usually, but to-night it speaks volumes. A show, not objectionable, but just the usual run of burlesque, was on at the big regimental Exchange. And the Y. M. C. A. was packed! All of which goes to show that our boys' hearts are in the right place. And our fellows know how to treat the ladies. If people "back home" could hear some of the compliments paid us, Virginia would be prouder than ever of her sons' traditional chivalry.

The whole division has a splendid reputation among the surrounding towns and cities. An Anniston lady received a letter from a friend who inquired solicitously if the streets were safe since the big camp had been located nearby. The reply was, "I have never felt safer than I do now. When I am out alone, I always walk close to some boy in uniform, and have had many of these unsuspecting escorts in khaki see me home!" That is one of many compliments I could repeat. Visitors insist that Camp McClellan morale is superior to any they have known elsewhere. I can't help boasting a little, because I feel that this "Blue and Gray" division is the best in our country. Moreover, the One Hundred and Sixteenth Infantry, National Guard, is the best regiment in existence!

I could go on forever in this strain, but I know my friends among the readers of "The Southern Churchman" will be glad to hear something of the work of a chaplain.

Contrary to the somewhat prevalent opinion, a commissioned chaplain does not spend all of his time in equitation and in maintaining his dignity. At any rate, he doesn't in this camp. Nobody here works any harder than "Holy Joe." In the Y. M. C. A. building staffs there are religious directors, building directors, educational directors, athletic directors. But a chaplain is usually a little of all of these. He must be, because there is only one of him in a regiment. In order to keep from "spreading himself thin" he must be omnipresent, resourceful and untiring. Here is a sample "grind" for one of my days. Any chaplain here does as much or more. Up at 5:45 to stand reveille. After breakfast, to the base hospital, where there are enough boys from our regiment to make up a small sized parish. Distribute chewing-gum, stamps to those "out of cash," comfort kits to those needing them, books to patients in the non-contagious wards, cheering words. Write letters for those unable to hold a pen. Back to the regiment to teach a big class of illiterates. G-u-n, gun; h-o-m-e, home, etc. Drop in at headquarters to see how the statistical department is getting along. I'm responsible for the work of three clerks there.

Dinner. Conference with "preachers" from surrounding towns, camp pastors, Y. M. C. A. representatives and chaplains. Baseball with some of the boys. To town and back in time for retreat and supper. As many letters typewritten as possible before the boys begin to come into my tent to "chin," bring their troubles, sing or have prayers and Bible reading. My name should be "Lieutenant Fixit," as I adjust matrimonial differences, remedy cases of non-support, and give secular and religious advice without stint. "Taps." But no rest for the weary as yet. Now is the only time of the day absolutely my own. So I write the remainder of those letters, read and study. Then between the blankets at about twelve P. M.

This is just an average day. There are many more activities that meet one. There isn't space to tell of them.

My main idea is to foster regimental spirit. That's the basis upon which much good may be accomplished.

I have only one regular service—the one Sunday morning. At this, the talk is always short and to the point, and the music is the best obtainable. If ever, after the war is over, I get into a lukewarm parish, I know just what will awaken enthusiasm and gather a big congregation—a brass band playing quick-step music, to march towards the church! Same principle as the Pied Piper. I have always wished for more congregational singing in the Episcopal church. We have it here. "Onward, Christian Soldiers" and "My Country 'Tis of Thee" nearly lift the roof off! I can have any kind of music I wish—band, orchestra, violin soloist, vocal solos and the regimental quartet. I frequently have all. Our Exchange seats thirteen hundred. It has brilliant purple pillars, gay bunting over the stage and orchestra pit, and an interior finish of "natural pine"! The acoustics are bad, but the general effect is striking.

I am awaiting a shipment from the War Commission of a Holy Communion set. When it comes, I shall have the Communion service often, early Sunday mornings. We have many Episcopalians in this regiment, and look after them the best we can. For the most part, they are loyal to their Church.

The people of Staunton gave me a Corona typewriter. It is an absolute necessity, as my correspondence is enormous. And, by the way, I always welcome letters from relatives and friends of soldiers, and answer them when possible. The Ministerial Union of Staunton furnished me with a number of khaki-bound Testaments. The American Sunday-school Union sent me a large number of hymn books. The Episcopal War Commission has furnished me with a Discretionary Fund of twenty-five dollars and a motorcycle. The fund has already been used among hospital patients and in making small loans to needy soldiers. The motorcycle is a great help, and enables me to save many hours a day. When I run out of gasoline, I have my orderly saddle "Lightning," the fastest and roughest looking horse in the corral, and get there just the same!

My orderly is really my military better half. He is an Alexandria boy, and efficiency is his middle name. Hard work is his first. He recently assured me that "the fact of a chaplain's being an officer does not constitute for most men an impassable barrier."

It will be a happy day for me when General Pershing's suggestion of more chaplains to a regiment is accepted. There's room enough for all the religious workers that can be had—Y. M. C. A. men, camp pastors and chaplains. I am glad to give enthusiastic testimony that all the different religious forces work together in absolute harmony.

Finally, I can use in the hospital all the chewing gum, candy and fruit that benevolent persons may send. And I can place all the comfort kits that come my way. Moreover, I can suggest hundreds of soldiers who would be cheered by the right sort of letters from the right sort of people.

Let me assure the readers of this paper that the boys here are eager to "go across" and "put a crimp in Wilhelm." And they can be trusted to uphold the honor of State and Nation.

WILLIAM J. ALFRIEND,
Chaplain 116th Infantry.

Camp McClellan, Anniston, Ala.

A Correction: In the letter of the Rev. Wallace Carnahan entitled "The Bishop Jones Case," our printers, in endeavoring to correct a typographical error, made such a complete jumble that one paragraph was unintelligible. We give it below as it should have appeared:

"I am sure the Episcopal Commission that acted in the 'Jones' case' sought the highest welfare of the Church, and aimed to be as kind to the offender as possible; but I doubt the sufficiency and finality of their action. The true, the logical, the consistent course for the Bishops is to present Bishop Jones for trial on the charge of disloyalty to the country, though a case of technical treason probably could not be made out; and any way that offense would come under the jurisdiction of the civil courts."

THE WAR'S VINDICATION OF CHRISTIANITY.

The Rev. Carroll L. Bates.

At the outbreak of this war, Christianity felt the pain as of a sharp wound through every fibre of her being, and was confronted by thousands of people with the challenge that she had failed. Christianity is now awakening with astonishment to a realization that in all the history of the past, she has never been so signally and completely vindicated.

Our present hard experience is a vindication of Christianity because it shows, in such a compelling manner as centuries of preaching have not sufficed to show, that it will not do to treat lightly the great essential principles of the Christian faith. We have toyed with Christianity and considered its cardinal principles as if they were pretty pictures to be hung up upon our walls. This war and the conditions attending it are God serving notice that His Gospel means what it says, and that unless we will take it seriously and unless we will embody Christianity's principles in world conduct, the opportunity He has given us will be withdrawn. It is a vivid foregleam of the judgment, and it shows us now, when it is not too late to try again, what will become of a world that imagines that the Gospel is a trifle to be admired from an aesthetic point of view, but hardly to be wrought genuinely into terms of individual or social conduct.

Let us take a brief glance at Christianity's teaching in two phases and see how completely the present world situation vindicates these.

Christianity has first a code of ethics and next a missionary program. Its object is first to bind upon men a law of conduct, then to federate all men into a brotherhood or "kingdom."

What, then, is the line of conduct to which Christianity obligates its followers? In brief, it is the line or law of conduct which the Gospel clearly shows controlled the great Founder of the Faith. Christianity obligates its followers to a spiritual rather than a materialistic interpretation of life, it demands that selfishness be replaced by a disposition to serve, that money be looked upon as a means and not an end. Christianity requires that each Christianized unit in society should dismiss the flesh-born tendency to exploit self, at the expense of other men, and that he should behave himself as His Father's child and a brother of his human fellows, using his talents in a sublimely self-forgetful service of God and of mankind. Who will seriously say that we have as a world so much as faintly essayed to put such laws of conduct to the test of practice? Rather have we not sung these rules over as so many soothing and pretty nursery songs! In our personal lives we have been selfish, in our commercial life villainously competitive, in our social life bitterly divisive, in our international life grasping and defiant. Modern science has supplied us with means for luxury, at the same time giving our generation a bent toward egotism and inclining it to go still further down the dangerous incline of materialism. The worst of the matter is that we have done this while with our lips professing to believe the Gospel that forbids each item of our misbehavior, and have gone to church (when indeed we have gone to church) to weakly excuse ourselves with the periodical re-statement to God in our confessions that we have found ourselves too humanly weak to undertake a program the wisdom of which we have admitted but only in words and never in deeds.

The writing that appeared upon the wall of Belshazzar's palace in a long gone age may be considered as a trivial incident compared with the reality and the intenseness of the divine warning that has come to us now. Having taken Christianity's ethics as a very pretty thing to think about on Sundays, but as, on no account, a law of conduct to be put in actual practice, we find ourselves suddenly confronted with the fruit of our own works. By these present world events the Almighty says to us, "Very well, have the world then, as your line of conduct will make it per force. If you would put in practice, and not merely profess to admire, the ethics of Jesus, the result would be a world of a different character. Since you will not, here is the world as your own behavior tends to make it."

We look to-day with consternation and see a world in danger of becoming dominated by the spirit that we had only meant to trifle with. We on this side of the world at least have always been at heart idealists. Our error has lain in thinking that we could taste what we covertly thought were the sweets of materialism and yet preserve our idealism. Ours was the old mistake. "Ye cannot serve God and mammon." We did not mean our conduct to be taken seriously. We never contemplated such a thing as a world given over to materialism. But Prussianism takes our besetting sin and exalts it into a grace. Prussianism takes materialism so seriously that she makes it her national creed and makes no pretense at idealism. "What if the world should become Prussianized?" millions are asking breathlessly. "Is it too late to correct an awful mistake?" we are inquiring. We are horrified when present events show to us that the world would be not worth living in if it should become dominated by materialism, and that although we have allowed materialism to rule in a secret corner of our own individual hearts.

Thus the ethics of Christianity are vindicated because we see in what is contemplated by Prussianism that any other than the ethics of Jesus put into world practice will yield an intolerable result.

We are in the position of Scrooge, who was warned by the "Ghost of Christmas Future" as to what consequences his stingy, selfish life was leading. It would be well for us to decide, as he did, to do better in time to come.

Christianity's second purpose is latent in Christ's often repeated phrase, "The Kingdom." The second of the two chief purposes of Christianity was to federate men. If Christ's world design did not contemplate a complete elimination of nationalism, it did assuredly contemplate a submergence of national lines in the unity of that common "Kingdom."

Together with our refusal to take Christ's ethics seriously has gone along an obstinate and long continued resistance to Christ's missionary program.

Whereas Christ meant both His ethical and His missionary program to furnish us with rules to be immediately applied to the present, we have relegated both programs to the world of dreams by translating both into terms of "other-worldliness."

Christ's missionary program has been thought of merely as a means for populating Heaven. The Master meant it to put us to work to so federate all nations now, cementing them together by common ideals, that strife for international prestige should disappear, and war become impossible.

Obstinately we have resisted this program of the Master. Professing to believe it with our lips our practice has belied our words. We have looked upon the command, "Go teach all nations," as poetry, not prose, to be admired sentimentally but not put in practice, at least not carried out to the lengths that such a command honestly requires. We have preferred the divisive tendencies of a competitive internationalism, we have preferred sometimes the hysteria of self-glorification to a sinking of our selfish aspirations for national prerogative that the undertaking of Christ's program of world federation would require.

And now, in the turn that world events have taken, we see what will happen if we resist Christ's missionary program any longer. "Very well," Providence seems now to be saying, "If you will not put selfish desire for national prerogative aside, if you will not put in place of your present foolish program the wiser program of Christ, if you will not federate the world's kingdoms into one, namely, God's Kingdom, here then is the bitter fruit of your own works that you must eat." So, again, we look and are stricken with horror, as we see that our own way must mean a world periodically turned into a hell of war such as it is transformed into at the present day. But the comfort of the situation is that the warning seems not to have come too late. Nothing but the missionary program of Christ, no longer resisted but put in practice as an immediate world rule, will suffice. The joy of the situation is that it has enforced by pressure of circumstance a rule of idealism that without this pressure was being lost sight of by mankind. And America seems to have been made the arbiter of this new command, "Go teach all nations." We realize to-day that this is a war to end war. This hard and bitter task once done, we are resolved not to stubbornly take our own way but God's way.

This war over, we must take Christ's command into serious account. If we will so take Christ's missionary command, if we will stop trifling with it and proceed to do it, the world need no longer be such a bloody shambles as we now see it where we sacrifice our treasure and our sons.

Thus the war vindicates Christianity, in respect to its ethics and also its missionary program, by showing with perfect clearness that anything other than Christianity will not work. Like the mathematical procedure called "reductio ad absurdum" the present crisis grimly expresses to us what the antithesis of Christianity will bring forth.

If we like the result I suppose there is nothing more to be said. How Germany or anybody else can like the prospect of such an impending hell to be set up on earth as the outcome, if not resisted, is going to mean, is more than any Christian American is able to imagine.

When the span of the Canadian bridge broke a few years ago, as the bridge was about to be completed, the builders tried again, profiting by what the disaster taught them, and the second time they had success.

Christ has given His twofold order and it will secure to us, if followed, a splendid world in which to live. We have been obstinate, followed our idea instead of Christ's, and we know now whether our way is good or not.

I am optimistic. I believe that the world now will really try the twofold command of Christ. If men will do this, if they will begin the practice of Christ's unselfish ethics, if they will, with good heart, go to work upon His plans for world-federation these sad times will be succeeded by a glorious age.

THE WOMEN OF FRANCE.

Mr. J. Collier Marshall, with the Y. M. C. A. in France, writes to the St. George's Magnet:

I can only dwell on my ever-rising appreciation of France—France, the undying! Never shall I be able to refuse any Frenchman a thing. Their courtesy to us is so beautiful and so genuine that it frightens one almost at what we may not be able to do. After all we are no better than other people, though they seem to think nothing is impossible to us.

It does not seem necessary to warn the men coming over to be extraordinarily careful of their manners: yet I am always preaching that to our boys here—to be thoughtful of every word and action, for these people here have nerves engendered by three and a half years of war, and are at the breaking point. I am glad to say that our men generally are making a fine impression. And the French women! I am so glad I am out here where I can see them bearing the full brunt of it. They do it all. The history that does not give the French women their full credit for the war won't be true nor fit to read. And never a murmur. Nor is there sadness, though when war is discussed they show what depths have been reached. It is then they ask when our men are to be ready; and that is the question none of us is able to answer, nor dare to equivocate. You can understand one's position.

I am billeted with a French family—a great-grandmere, two granddaughters, one of whom is married and has an adorable two-year child—whose father in Salonique has never seen her. Grand-mere's son is also at war. So these three women run the farms and do all the work, with the aid of two refugee boys, one of whom will be "called" next year.

"Grand-mere" is a wonder—up before day, works till late, milking, plowing (we began here January 23), and hauling manure. Yet they are not poor nor uneducated. I am never lacking entertainment. My admiration grows daily—and, above all, my amazement at their cheerfulness. When the town crier with a ruffle of his drum reads the latest proclamation that means a new ration, or bond issue, there is a head in every window listening attentively, and when it is over, do they grumble? Never! they laugh their "La-la" and go back to harder work and closer conservation to win the war—for that is what they intend to do. If the Germans could see them as I do, they'd know they never had had a chance.

And their sympathy! One of our boys died and was buried here in December, the day after his company moved away. I was not here at the time, but some days ago the town mayor asked me if I had seen his grave, and upon my reply that I had not, he asked me to view it.

It seems that being Protestant it was not possible to bury him in the churchyard; but they laid him in the Cure's garden, just beneath the churchyard wall. But see what these delightful people have done! Around his grave they have built a low graceful wall enclosing a plot large enough to hold three great apple trees, to bear him company. They have rounded the grave nicely, outlining it with flat cobbles placed end on. There's a white cross at his head and a cross of rich green moss made full length of his grave, while the interstices are filled with pansies. And further—and perhaps best of all—not being able to lay him in consecrated ground, they have broken a gateway through the churchyard wall, thereby making him one with themselves. There on the sunny southern slope he waits with their dead for "the peace" and life eternal.

Said the mayor—when I had thanked him in my broken French and, I assure you, choked with emotion—"C'est ne rien, M'sieur, but always—it will be cared for as our own."

Does God have no heroes but those who lead on a great battlefield? Has He no saints but those in pictures, with a halo about their head? Heroism is the common life, that is what the world needs; men and women who in common places will do every day duties without noise or glitter, just because the heart and conscience say, "This is the way, walk ye in it."—J. Hunter.

A WAR-TIME EDUCATION FUND:

To Meet the Conditions Caused by the War in the Work of the General Board of Religious Education.

By the Rev. W. E. Gardner, D. D., General Secretary.

The General Board of Religious Education, organized by direction of Canon 59, is the educational department of the Church.

In five years of its existence it has:

1. Provided new methods and text books for Church Sunday Schools, 108,000 pupils and teachers are using them.
2. Called for every Sunday School teacher to become a trained teacher. Over 5,000 have responded by taking courses in Summer Schools, in Diocesan Schools and Institutes, and in the Correspondence School.
3. Maintained a Religious Day School in Gary, Ind., demonstrating that the Church can teach Religion on week days in co-operation with the Public School.
4. Established connection among the rectors in college and university towns so that there is an organized, Church-wide effort to convince students that Religion and sacrificial service are essentials in education.
5. United the Theological Seminaries and Diocesan Examining Chaplains in a movement for a ministry better equipped to meet modern life, and appealing to a larger number of our best young men.

This and much more has been accomplished without a deficit, for the principle of the Board is to spend no money until it is in hand or in sight.

Seventy-five thousand men have been taken from the Church and placed in war camps. Among them are clergymen who were the mainstay of the Boards' work, Sunday School teachers and superintendents, religious leaders in universities and colleges and a large proportion of our Seminary students.

The Church is proud of the manpower she has sent into the conflict. She is also glad to face the losses in interest that arise because of the excitement and suspense attending the war and because the interest of her people is directed into war service, but such restrictions placed on religious work must not be neglected and the increasing difficulties in doing religious educational work must be overcome.

The war has increased the need for Religious Education. The people who will win the war will be the people who will conquer themselves. The Archbishop of York expressed it in a sentence when he said: "The spirit and ideals of Christianity are the hope of social reconstruction."

The leaders and teachers of Religious Education have unparalleled responsibilities. The Church must hold up their hands. The Government is always preparing for three years' more of war. Church leaders must have an even longer look forward.

What we put into our youth in 1918 may be the balance of power that turns the scale in the critical hours of 1920 and 1921.

The War-Time Education Fund is made imperative because of five critical conditions in educational work which demand immediate financial outlay. They are as follows:

Enlisting Student Soldiers and Others for the Ministry. . . . $10,700 Promoting Christian Principles

among Students.....	12,900
Co-operating with Public Education	7,700
Extending Teacher Training in Parishes	8,175
Strengthening our Church Preparatory Schools.....	5,200

Total$44,675

More specific information may be had from the General Secretary at the address below. Checks and pledges should be sent to Harper Sibley, Room 73, No. 289 Fourth Avenue, New York.

The Great Commission

A missionary from Anking, traveling last summer, thus describes Peking:

"Along the railway seemed thoroughly Japanese. When we reached Peking it was like stepping into another world—the temples, palaces, great walls, gates and people were so gorgeous. The yellow tiled upturned roofs of the Imperial and Forbidden Cities, moats and pagodas were a wonderful, never to be forgotten sight. The part of China about Anking is so very poor, it was a great comfort to see what the Chinese not merely engaged in a daily struggle for a few bits of rice could do."

And Miss Peavey writes from Changsha, "I loved Peking more than any place I was ever in, though I was studying from eight to five. Saturdays I tried to spend in sightseeing. The temples are wonderful, and so is the great wall. Twice I was received by the president, but just missed the emperor's appearance."

Eight months in the North Union Language School, which is situated in this most interesting city, are a great help to the new missionary. Miss Peavey continues after three months in Changsha:

"The Chinese are so nice and cordial, and overlook one's mistakes in the language. I study mornings and work afternoons. One afternoon I call on our people with the Bible woman; one I call by myself; one I go to a sort of mothers' meeting, when the women have a short service and Bible instruction and sew for missions or relief work in China. One afternoon I teach a Bible class of the two Bible women; one I am at home to the women. The other afternoon I gather up all the loose threads.

"Among these, accounts perhaps! A paper dollars is about 2,900 cash, a silver dollar at present 4,100—it varies from 3,000 to 4,500. When it comes to paying 70/2,900 for the day's vegetables and 480/4,500 for a tumbler, bookkeeping is just lost in the shuffle."

Methodists and Missions: Methodists of the South have just met at Memphis several hundred strong, and voted to mark Methodist missionary centenary with gifts amounting to $35,000,000. With Methodists of the North this puts the missionary centenary fund away above $100,000,000, to be secured from Methodists alone, for the cause of missions, and within a period of five years. The amount is at least five times as great as that usually given to this cause in the period named. It is the biggest missionary program ever mapped out by any religious body in the world, and it is inaugurated in a time of war and many war demands.

These Southerners have created a Centenary Commission of sixteen members, including women, and have asked for a conference of all American Methodists on March 22, to push co-operation. Bishops have issued a call to prayer, and there has been created a publicity bureau, until now unheard of among Methodists South. Reports from every part of the country show marked enthusiasm for the centenary program, with canvassers in large numbers. The occasion is the one hundredth anniversary of the founding of united missionary effort by Methodists of America.

Born of the Spirit: For sixty-two years he had lived a Buddhist. For thirteen years men had looked to him to cast out demons from the sick and rescue the dead from the torments of hell. His home was in the mountains of southern Hunan, two days' journey from the nearest missionary, at Linchow. In all his acquaintances there was not a single Christian. All he had to guide him on the way of life was a copy of the Gospels that had somehow come into his possession.

Yet he stood before the session of the Presbyterian Church at Clear Water an undoubted Christian. So accustomed were we to halting testimonies, even after long and careful instruction that we were awed by the evidence of the direct and unaided work of the Spirit in the man before us.

This is what he told us. "At first, though he was much attracted by portions of the Gospels, he was so far from grasping their import and so bound by prejudice and unbelief that before long he would throw down the book. But before long he would pick it up and begin reading again. At one of these times he came in his reading to the word "Saviour." It came with all the force of a message to his heart. It was the key that unlocked the meaning of the Gospels to him. Having found the Truth he took the books and idols of a lifetime and burned them all. But what he regarded as most urgent was prayer. He earnestly studied the Gospels to learn how. How well he learned! One petition keeps echoing in my ears, "Forgive China's sins, Lord, all of them." The Great Father, we may be sure, did not hold it against him that in his praying he first followed the way he had been accustomed to, of writing out the name of God and worshipping before it.—Linchow (China) Parish.

Nurses Training.

It was Mrs. John Wood Blodgett, of Grand Rapids, who suggested the Plattsburgh College for women. She is one of the well known Christian workers of the Middle West, and had just been chosen a trustee of Vassar, from which college she was graduated in 1885. She immediately determined to do her best to have the college buildings and nine hundred acres of grounds on the Hudson River, just back of Poughkeepsie, used during the long summer vacation this year. The outcome is the Vassar training school for nurses there this year, June to September, and to be limited to college graduates. The government has come to the support of the project through the Red Cross, and now appeal is made to college women of the country to take the course.

It is stated that tens of thousands of nurses are needed for the army and navy, not to mention tens of other thousands who are required for the depleted hospitals of the country. The Plattsburgh school at Vassar is not a short cut to a degree, for two full years will be required in study and experience, but women will here make a start, and may be available to assist in hospitals at home while other nurses go abroad. The government is exceedingly strict as to qualifications. American nurses stand at the top of the profession in all the world, and immediately the Huns are whipped demands are already in hand that the hospitals of Roumania, Italy and nearly all Southern Europe be equipped with American nurses in sufficient numbers to train local women. Conditions in hospitals all over the world are reported to be most serious.

Experimental Settlement Work.

Religious bodies are getting ready to pour into Gary, the steel city on the shore of Lake Michigan, vast sums of money. Their idea is not merely to serve the people of Gary, but to make a demonstration that will show what can be done in other cities. In 1906 Gary's site was sand dunes. Now it claims a population of 200,000, four in five of whom are foreign born, and most of whom were baptized and confirmed in the Roman Church. Those who announce their purpose to spend at least $2,000,000 within the next year or two in that city disclaim all attempts to proselyte, and say they are merely to care for people who now attend no religious services, but whose children are identified with public schools in which religious instruction is given.

The largest single projectors of Gary advance work are the Methodists, but they are closely followed by Disciples, Presbyterians and Episcopalians. The plans contemplate the erection of social centers, with educational and recreative classes, these open to all who care to use them, just as Y. M. C. A. huts are at the military cantonments. Attendance of children upon religious instruction is optional, but children from no fewer than twenty-two nationalities avail themselves of the privileges. It is stated that sixty-nine different tongues are spoken in Gary, or at any rate there are that number of nationalities. Work on some of the settlement centers starts this spring.

A cable from Paris received at the Church Missions House on March 18th announces the return in April of the Rev. S. N. Watson, D. D., rector of Holy Trinity Church, Paris. Dr. Watson may be addressed in care of the Board of Missions, at 281 Fourth Avenue, New York.

WASHINGTON.

Rt. Rev. A. Harding, D. D., Bishop.

Pastoral on the War From the Bishop of Washington to His Diocese.

The Bishop's House,
Mt. St. Alban,
Washington, D. C.

My Dear Brother:

I am impelled by the urgency of our need of Divine guidance and power in these critical days, to ask you to add to such words as you may have in mind to speak to your people, my earnest hope, as their Bishop, that they will spend these days of Holy Week in penitence and prayer and in withdrawal from the world for this season that they may be thus alone with Him.

I especially urge upon them diligence in family prayer, as well as daily attendance upon Divine worship; well knowing that you, my brethren, will give them every opportunity practical for enjoying this privilege, and that now as always you will lead them. It would be well if the opportunity for Holy Communion with intercessions were made frequent during the continuance of this Western Drive.

Faithfully yours,

Alfred Harding,

Bishop of Washington.

MARYLAND.

Rt. Rev. J. G. Murray, D. D., Bishop.

Church Work at Camp Meade.

The work at Camp Meade for the benefit of the soldiers is developing rapidly under the direction of Bishop Murray. A church is being built near Odenton, where the Rev. S. Tagart Steele, Jr., has his headquarters and which is the center from which he works. The Rev. Alan Evans, Jr., is associated with Mr. Steele pending the former's commission as chaplain in the army. Several of the churches of this section have contributed able helpers in ladies who at certain times assist at the "hostage house," and any number of magazines and other desirable papers are being forwarded regularly.

A very successful mission has just been completed by the Rev. J. A. Stonisfield, of New York, at the Church of the Epiphany, Govans, the Rev. C. E. Harding, rector. The congregations at the beginning were large and enthusiastic, and at the close the church was crowded. Many people from other congregations attended and were deeply impressed by the services and sermons.

The Rt. Rev. Charles Fiske, D. D., Bishop Coadjutor of Central New York, preached the first sermon of his two weeks' visit to Baltimore in the Church of St. Michael and All Angels, of which he was formerly rector. The Bishop was the special preacher at the noon-day services at St. Paul's Church during the first week in March, taking as his subject "The Problems of Faith Springing Out of the War."

VIRGINIA.

Rt. Rev. R. A. Gibson, D. D., Bishop.
Rt. Rev. W. C. Brown, D. D., Coadjutor

The mid-day Lenten services in St. Paul's Church, Richmond, concluded with the week of March 17th. On Monday the Rev. William H. Burkhardt, rector of Grace Church, was the preacher. He spoke of the need for greater personal holiness and social service in this critical time, from the words of the Master: "For their sake I sanctify myself."

Beginning with Tuesday and continuing through the remainder of the week, the Rev. Arthur B. Kinsolving, D. D., rector of St. Paul's Church, Baltimore, delivered a series of eloquent and stimulating sermons. The first day the preacher spoke of the great need of a deeper faith in God, and quoted Donald Hankey's striking sentence, "Faith is just betting your life there is a God." He showed how faith is to be won by means of prayer, sacrifice and obedience. In regard to prayer the speaker mentioned the thought of another that prayer is just bringing God and the soul together and leaving them there alone. On Wednesday Dr. Kinsolving took as his text the passage from the Gospel according to St. John: "Be of good cheer, I have overcome the world," and spoke of Christian optimism, an optimism which is not a refusal to face the facts, but which has its roots in the suffering which accepts the Cross and draws life from God. On the third day the subject of the sermon was the need for discipline in the life of the Christian soldier, and on the last day the voluntary going up to Jerusalem by the Master in the face of His certain knowledge that death awaited Him there, was dealt with, and the speaker showed how great was the need for our personal participation in His sacrifice.

Bishop Gibson's Visitations and Appointments: Bishop Gibson visited All Saints' Church, Richmond, the Rev. Dr. Downman, rector, and confirmed sixteen persons, two of whom were soldiers from Camp Lee, members of Abingdon Parish, Gloucester. In the evening at Holy Trinity Church, the Rev. Dr. Gravatt, rector, he confirmed eight. In addition there were two private confirmations for Dr. Gravatt—one soldier and one naval officer.

The Bishop's appointments for March and April are:

Tuesday evening, March 26—Church of the Holy Comforter, Richmond.

Wednesday evening, March 27—St. Mark's Church, Richmond.

Easter Day—St. Thomas' Church, Richmond, in the morning, and St. Andrew's, Richmond, in the evening.

The Rev. Benjamin Dennis, of Richmond, has been transferred to the Diocese of West Texas, where he becomes rector of the Church of the Advent, Brownsville.

The quarterly meeting of the Executive Committee of the Diocesan Missionary Society, which usually occurs on the second Tuesday in April, on account of the meeting of the House of Bishops on April 10, has been postponed by the Bishop of the Diocese to Tuesday, April 16.

SOUTHERN VIRGINIA.

Rt. Rev. A. M. Randolph, D. D., Bishop.
Rt. Rev. B. D. Tucker, D. D., Coadjutor
Rt. Rev. A. C. Thomson, D. D., Suffragan

The Condition of Bishop Randolph, who has been ill for some time, continues at last accounts almost unchanged. He is in the Protestant Hospital in Norfolk, where he underwent an operation some time ago. He is unconscious most of the time, and permanent improvement in his condition can hardly be hoped for.

Miss Jane Colston Howard, principal of Stuart Hall, has resigned on account of the illness of her mother. She has been in charge of Stuart Hall for several years, succeeding Miss Maria P. Duval. Miss Mary Williamson, of Hollins College, has been elected to succeed her as principal of Stuart Hall. Miss Williamson has every qualification to fill the position, and all interested in Stuart Hall most earnestly hope she will accept the position.

Christ Church congregation in Roanoke will use their new church on Easter Day for the first time. This church is built of stone, of old English Gothic type of architecture, will seat four hundred, and is finished with great taste and beauty. Bishop Tucker will be present on Easter Sunday morning to have charge of the opening services and to confirm a large class. The congregation is to be congratulated in securing a large and commodious church, parish house and rectory in the most desirable location of Roanoke.

The Rev. J. W. C. Johnson, rector of St. John's Church, Roanoke, has been ill during most of the season of Lent. His illness has not been critical, only that he has been confined to his house and unable to take but an occasional service in his church. The doctors promise that he will be able to be on duty Good Friday and Easter Day.

During this period the Rev. T. C. Page, of Bedford; the Rev. F. H. Craighill, of Wytheville, Va.; the Rev. T. F. Ople, of Pulaski; the Rev. C. E. A. Marshall, of Radford, and the Rev. G. Otis Meade have given services at St. John's.

St. Peter's Church, Norfolk, Va.: The rector of St. Peter's Church (the Rev. W. E. Callender) will be glad to receive the names of any enlisted men at the training station at St. Helena, or Norfolk, and will be pleased to call on them at the station.

The Rev. C. P. Holbrook, rector of St. John's Church, Farmville, conducted the Y. M. C. A. service in Hampden-Sidney College Chapel Sunday night, March 17. He chose as his text First Peter 2:17: "Honor all men, love the brotherhood, fear God, honor the king."

A good audience, including both students and members of the community, heard Mr. Holbrook with close attention and with evident appreciation. Interest in the Sunday night services has been steadily increasing of late, and the Y. M. C. A. has been most fortunate in securing for these occasions a number of strong and attractive speakers.

ARKANSAS.

Rt. Rev. Jas. R. Winchester, D. D., Bishop.
Rt. Rev. E. W. Saphore, D. D., Suffragan.

The Rev. Percy C. Webber, D. D., held a ten days' mission from March 12 to 21, at Christ Church, Little Rock, each night visiting Camp Pike and speaking to many of the soldiers in the various Y. M. C. A. buildings.

Bishop Winchester held services at the cantonment during Holy Week.

A reading and recreation room is open at all times in the parish house of Christ Church, Little Rock, for the soldiers. Entertainments are given, and refreshments served twice a week by the ladies of Christ Church and Trinity Cathedral congregations.

NEWARK.

Rt. Rev. E. S. Lines, D. D., Bishop.
Rt. Rev. W. R. Stearly, D. D., Coadjutor.

Notice.

Because the regular date falls in Ember Week, the forty-fourth Annual Convention of the Diocese of Newark will meet in Trinity Cathedral, Newark, N. J., on Tuesday morning, May 14th.

John Keller,
Secretary of Convention.

TENNESSEE.

Rt. Rev. Thos. F. Gallor, D. D., Bishop.

The Rev. W. S. Claiborne, Archdeacon of Sewanee and East Tennessee, has organized among his own people a hospital unit, which has been presented through the local Red Cross of Chattanooga to the government. A large majority of the doctors in this unit are Sewanee men.

The Rev. E. R. Jones, rector of Grace Church, Chattanooga, has been called and is with the Emory Hospital Unit, now at Camp Gordon.

DELAWARE.

Rt. Rev. F. J. Kinsman, D. D., Bishop.

Death of the Rev. J. Leighton McKim.

The Rev. John Leighton McKim died at his residence in Milford, Delaware, on March 20, at the age of eighty-two. He was the son of the Rev. John Linn McKim, who was at the time of his death in 1910 the senior priest in the Anglican Communion, having been ordained under Bishop White in 1835. The Rev. J. Leighton McKim was ordained deacon by Bishop Lee of Delaware in 1859, priest by Bishop Odenheimer of New Jersey in 1860. He was successively assistant at the House of Prayer, Newark, under Dr. Shackelford; rector of St. Timothy's, Roxborough, Pennsylvania; rector of Christ Church, Milford, Delaware, for forty-two years; rector of St. Mary's Hall, Burlington, New Jersey, from 1879-1887; rector of St. Paul's, Georgetown, Delaware, and for many years in charge of St. Stephen's Chapel, Harrington, Delaware. He was for seven years member of the Standing Committee of the Diocese of Delaware and represented Delaware in nine General Conventions.

The funeral services were held in Christ Church, Milford, on the 22nd, with burial in the churchyard at St. Peter's, Lewes. Bishop Kinsman officiated, assisted by the rectors of Millsboro, Lewes and Georgetown.

HARRISBURG.

Rt. Rev. J. H. Darlington, D. D., Bishop.

Archbishop of York in Harrisburg.

The Archbishop of York and his chaplain arrived in Harrisburg at 1:30 P. M. on March 23. He was met at the station by a committee headed by the Governor of Pennsylvania, the Bishop of Harrisburg and State Librarian Montgomery. The chimes of Zion Lutheran Church greeted the party as they emerged from the station and drove to the Bishop's house. In the Bishop's chapel of the Holy Spirit, the Archbishop prayed earnestly for the soldiers giving their lives at the front. He then in the great hall addressed the crowd of citizens and soldiers, and was presented with a bouquet of white roses. The party then went to the capitol, above which the British flag was waving for the first time in the history of Pennsylvania. In the House of Representatives, reputed to be the legislative chamber which rivals the House of Lords in splendor, the Governor, the Mayor, Rabbi Haas, the Rev. Dr. Mudge, of the Presbyterian Church, and A. S. Patterson, Esq., of the Chamber of Commerce, voiced their welcome. The Archbishop then delivered a masterly tribute to America's place in history and her opportunity in this critical hour of peril, praying for the men at that very moment falling in the greatest battle in all history.

EASTON.

Rt. Rev. Wm. F. Adams, D. D., Bishop.

The Rev. J. Vernon Ashworth, rector of St. Bartholomew's Parish, Crisfield, has resigned, after about twelve years' service, and will take work near New York City.

St. Paul's-by-the-Sea, Ocean City, has had placed in the chancel a beautiful set of choir stalls, lectern and prayer desk, a memorial gift.

PITTSBURGH.

Rt. Rev. C. Whitehead, D. D., Bishop.

Quiet Day: The Bishop of the Diocese held a Quiet Day for the Clergy on Monday, March 18, at the Saint Mary Memorial, Pittsburgh. In the morning there was a celebration of the Holy Communion, and two addresses. A Lenten luncheon was served in the parish house, and the addresses were continued in the afternoon, interspersed with the singing of hymns and appropriate prayers.

A meeting of Churchmen, under the auspices of the local Assembly of the Brotherhood of St. Andrew, took place at Christ Church, Pittsburgh, on Tuesday evening, March 19. A service was held in the church, followed by supper in the parish house. The main meeting was held at eight o'clock, when the Rev. Dr. Wyatt Brown, of the Church of the Ascension, spoke on "The Hope of the World"; and directors or representatives of various Chapters made reports of work being done by them at the present time. Quite a number of the soldier boys who are in Pittsburgh studying at Carnegie Technical School were welcome guests.

The Rev. McVeigh Harrison, O. H. C., lately spent several days in the Diocese giving illustrated talks and making appeals in behalf of St. Andrew's School for Boys, situated among the mountains of Tennessee. In Pittsburgh he spoke at Calvary Church and the Church of the Ascension, and made one of the noon-day addresses at the Brotherhood Lenten services at Trinity Church. He also spent a day in St. Peter's Parish, Uniontown. His appeals were listened to with much interest, and he received a number of pledges in behalf of the school.

The Church of the Ascension, Pittsburgh, has just purchased the Rex property at a cost of $30,000. This property consists of a large stone house and a garage on the corner of Ellsworth Avenue and Neville Street, directly in front of the church, and when the outhouse, which has obstructed the church, is removed, this parish will have a superb plant.

NEW YORK.

Rt. Rev. David H. Greer, D. D., Bishop.
Rt. Rev. C. S. Burch, D. D., Suffragan.

Holy Week in New York saw a most unusual order. Presbyterian, Methodist, Baptist and Reformed Churches, which never before had noon-day services, some of them never before week night ones, suddenly inaugurated programs of noon-day services, with special preachers. Topics chosen were those appropriate to the days of the week, including the Lord's Supper on Maunday Thursday. Good Friday witnessed the Passion service of three hours, and for the sake of variety, St. John the Evangelist, the Rev. John A. Wade rector, had a Good Friday service, with the Seven Last Words from the Cross dwelt upon by seven different speakers, a Church clergyman the last one only. Others included Methodist and the whole Protestant gamut. Palm Sunday in Presbyterian and other churches had sermons appropriate to the day. Such transformation was observed as New York never witnessed before.

Huguenot Chapel Consecrated. Six of the seven chapels of tongues surrounding the ambulatory of the Cathedral of St. John the Divine have now been consecrated. The last one, consecrated last week, is St. Martin of Tours, known as the Huguenot Chapel, and built in memory of the family of William P. Furniss. The only remaining chapel is that of St. Ansgarius, intended some time for services in Swedish. One of the chapels, that of St. Boniface, is intended for services in German, but none have ever been held there, and none are likely to be at this time.

CONNECTICUT.

Rt. Rev. C. B. Brewster, D. D., Bishop.
Rt. Rev. E. C. Acheson, D. D., Suffragan.

Governor's Good Friday Proclamation.

Governor Holcomb has issued his annual proclamation, designating Good Friday to be observed in Connecticut as Fast Day. These are his words:

"In compliance with custom, the Governors of Connecticut have designated the Friday before Easter as a day of fasting and prayer, in commemoration of the day when the Saviour of mankind made the supreme sacrifice. On that day, for the three years last past, we have prayed that the nation be spared from an active participation in this great world war. It was a selfish and unanswered prayer. It was decreed that this country, founded upon the divine principle of the equal rights of man, should do its part in defeating a foe which, by force of arms, seeks to subjugate the world. We should be willing to make whatever sacrifice is necessary to ensure the preservation of human liberty. I, therefore, appoint Friday, the 29th day of March next, as a day of fasting and prayer."

It is the proclamation of a Christian man, seventy-three years of age, serving his second term, and foremost among the eminent Governors of our country, with every political prospect that, despite his age and desire to retire, will be urged to accept renomination. He is a resident of Southington, Superintendent Emeritus of the Baptist

Sunday school, and a man of the simple life.

The Rev. Dr. Miel, twenty-five years rector of Trinity Church, Hartford, volunteered his services early last summer to do Red Cross work in France. He returned for the beginning of Lent, and, in addition to caring for a large urban parish, has given himself, without stint, to the calls from adjacent cities to rehearse facts about our men in France. After Easter, with the unanimous consent of vestry and congregation, he will resume his work in France.

New Haven has been visited by the Archbishop of York, who delivered a strong address in Woolsey Hall, of Yale University, March 13th, to a gathering which filled the auditorium to its extreme capacity. The distinguished President of the university, in introducing the eminent prelate, stated that of the three most notable guests who have visited New Haven within fifty years, no one received a greater welcome than their present guest.

The Church of Our Saviour, Plainville, proposes to celebrate, on Easter Monday, the fifteenth anniversary of the present rector's work in that parish. They also desire that he may long, with continued prophetic sight, lead them on. The name of the Rev. R. H. Burton is honored by the entire community, and deservedly so.

The Rev. Dr. Cyrus Townsend Brady has kindly consented to give his services, the second Sunday after Easter, in a well ordered preaching itinerary, to Cheshire, Southington and Plainville, morning, afternoon and evening.

St. Paul's, Southington, has had a very successful series of services during Lent. The rector, the Rev. Dr. W. D. Williams, every Tuesday afternoon conducted meditations in the book of Job. Besides other services, on Thursday evening the following visiting clergymen have preached: The Rev. R. H. Burton, of Plainville; the Rev. M. J. Simpson, of Cheshire; the Rev. A. T. Gesner, of Waterbury; the Rev. J. F. Sexton and the Rev. G. W. Griffith, both of New Haven, and the Rev. H. W. Perkins, of Collinsville.

The Rev. H. W. Perkins, formerly of Burlington, Iowa, and later of Boston, Mass., entered upon his work in Collinsville in October, and the people are responding heartily to his well directed endeavors.

Christ Church, Hartford, under the guidance of the Rev. S. R. Colladay, successor to the lamented Rev. Dr. James Goodwin, is entering upon an era of effective institutional work, more than necessary, since it is becoming a "down town" parish, with a parish house equipment, equal to any in the United States.

Union Services: In the interest of fuel conservation, all the religious bodies of Meriden united, early in the winter, in one general service Sunday evenings, and with great success. St. Andrew's and All Saints parishes being among the foremost in this form of godly union and concord.

The Rev. James Stuart Neill, rector of St. Mary's, South Manchester, began his ministry there Ash Wednesday, and his full, rich, varied abilities are appreciated by large and earnest congregations.

Church Work Progressing: Despite the large numbers of young men entering the service of our country, thereby perceptibly depleting the prospective man power in our parishes and missions, the work of the Church in this Diocese keeps up, and goes on in a full tide of spiritual life.

LOUISIANA.

Rt. Rev. David Sessums, D. D., Bishop.

New Orleans: Trinity Church, New Orleans, the Rev. Dr. Robert S. Coupland, rector, has finally paid off its long standing and troublesome parish debt. Members of the vestry took advantage of two heatless Mondays in February, formed themselves into committees, went forth to canvass the congregation, and raised enough money to pay the balance due. On February 15 the balance due on the note was finally paid.

In the last few years several of the strongest New Orleans parishes have carried through successful debt-raising campaigns. Both St. Paul's and Christ Church Cathedral have retired staggering burdens of debt, and have been consecrated. During the last year St. James, Baton Rouge, one of the leading parishes of the Diocese, has also paid off its debt, and has been consecrated.

Houma: The debt owed by St. Matthew's Church, the Rev. G. L. Tucker, rector, for its parish house, built in 1913, was completely cancelled in the fall of 1917. The parish is also assured of a legacy of $1,000.00 by a provision in the will of the late George Williams, a member of the vestry. The rectory has been extensively repaired and improved. A gift of $5,000.00 has recently been made to the parish by one of the members of the vestry. The money is intended to be the nucleus of an Endowment Fund for the parish. By a remarkable coincidence, this gift, which may be regarded as the laying of the cornerstone of the Endowment Fund, was made in January, 1918, the sixtieth anniversary of the laying of the cornerstone for the first church edifice, in January, 1858. An interesting feature of the Lenten services has been the open forum, held on Friday nights after service in the parish house of St. Matthew's Church. Such matters as the Race Question, Labor and Capital, Woman's Work, National Defense, Preparing Our City have been discussed. In past years important local improvements have resulted from the discussion of public matters in St. Matthew's forum, which has been maintained for six successive years, during Lent. Members of various Christian communions attend the forum meetings, and take part in the discussions, and serve on committees appointed by the forum to investigate special matters, or to appear before governmental boards and authorities. Ministers of other churches and prominent laymen and laywomen have presided over the discussions, by invitation of the rector of the parish. The forum has, therefore, served in this instance both as a promoter of social service and of Christian unity.

IDAHO.

Rt. Rev. James B. Funsten, D. D., Bishop.

News Notes of Interest.

The plans for the new Fort Hall Indian Mission are being completed, and the contractor will soon commence the work. It will be remembered this building was destroyed by fire last November. It seemed necessary to the existence of the work that there should be no delay in rebuilding, for the destruction was so complete all the work suffered. The insurance will cover more than half the cost of construction, and the Bishop hopes friends will be moved to give the balance. The Rev. S. W. Creasey is now in charge.

The Annual Convocation of Idaho will be held in Boise, May 23-26.

St. Margaret's School will probably close its session the last week in May. The session has been fairly good, all things considered. Under good conditions the girls' school could be made a great missionary influence, but with insufficient funds its progress is much hampered, especially in these war days.

St. Luke's Hospital has been quite full all the season. It takes care of fifteen hundred people annually, and has in training some thirty-five young Idaho girls. Seven graduates have gone to the front. It has some eight hundred operative cases, and a new operating room is badly needed. The cost would be about $5,000, of which amount we have received several hundred dollars.

The Rev. A. Chamberlain, Dean of St. Michael's, is making strenuous efforts to clean up the balance due on the church, which has been a weight on the congregation for several years. The Easter offering will be devoted to that end.

The Bishop has been busy in making his annual round. He has recently confirmed classes in Nampa, Rupert, Caldwell, Pocatello and North Idaho. Congregations have been good and there are evidences of a deeper interest in spiritual matters.

The Bishop expects to attend the meeting of the House of Bishops in April.

The rector at Nampa has succeeded in reducing very considerably the debt, which has been on the Parish House several years.

Idaho has a splendid war record. The people have showed enthusiasm and patriotism. They have more than met all the governmental requirements for men and money.

The Bishop has accepted the appointment of the National Red Cross Committee to speak in the Red Cross drive from May 6th to 13th.

The Rev. Mr. Franck has accepted work in one of the Y. M. C. A. tents. The Rev. Mr. Dickinson has been most prominent in Red Cross work. Dean Chamberlain has done important work on the National Food Committee, to which he was appointed, and so with others also.

The telling of the resurrection is not done exclusively in sermons and from pulpits. It is done through the daily life. A Christian's belief in the resurrection of the Lord Jesus Christ ought to mean a great deal more than a cold, bare assent to the historical fact stated in the Creed—"on the third day He rose again from the dead." "If ye then be risen with Christ," cries Paul, "seek those things which are above." The way to tell the resurrection is to make the resurrection tell.—William Reed Huntington.

Christianity and the Community

Thy Kingdom Come on Earth

The work being done by the Red Cross in the war zone across the seas is the most vivid and best known part of its wide activity, but no less important is the admirable service organized at home under its Department of Civilian Relief. In a number of cities "Home Service Institutes" have been formed to train workers in meeting the growing and urgent needs which the progress of the war will develop here. One of the institutes is to open in Richmond, Va., on April 8th under the charge of the School of Social Work and Public Health (Dr. H. H. Hibbs, 1112 Capitol Street, Director), with courses on "Home Service," on "Fundamental Methods of Work With Families," on "Health," "The Wayward Child and the Unstable Family" and "Home Economics."

As to what these Home Service Institutes mean a Red Cross Bulletin says:

"Each chapter of the American Red Cross is now being instructed to organize a Home Service section to assist families to cope with difficulties which the stress and strain of the war and the absence of husband, son or brother has thrust upon them. The wife may be inexperienced in business affairs or burdened with anxiety or worry about the children. She may be lonely and need protection. Brothers or sisters may have become wayward and irregular in school since the older brother went away. Aged parents may be lonely and helpless. Additional opportunities for recreation may be needed to compensate for the loss of the absent one and for worry about home problems and what the war may bring forth. Relief may also be needed to supplement government allowances. But the absent soldier was more than a bread-winner and contributed more than material things to the home. In such cases the Red Cross may, if its services are acceptable, send a friend to the family to partly take the soldier or sailor's place.

"Home Service Sections must also be prepared to give accurate and complete information to families of soldiers and sailors; how mail should be addressed and packages wrapped and mailed; how information may be obtained of those sick, wounded, captured or missing; what the war risk insurance law means; how to get allowances, allotments and compensation. This is helping as truly as giving families aid when sick or in want, for it will save untold anxiety and suffering and often needless fears.

"The relation of this work to the efficiency of the army and navy is a close and important one. All military leaders emphasize the importance of keeping up the morale of the fighting forces. Home Service work does just this.

"Finally, many of the soldiers who return will be broken in body by wounds, sight gone in some cases, and mind and nerves shattered by shell shock in others. To care for these broken men, to build them up physically, to overcome the deep-seated discouragement in which they will be plunged will be a task in which the Red Cross Home Service workers must be prepared to help.

"But to render genuine help to wounded and discouraged soldiers requires tact and skill as well as sympathy. The worker who is to render effective service to soldiers' families also must be trained for her work. Information must be given accurately and clearly. Such relief as may be given must be administered—especially to soldiers' families—with tact and with a clear comprehension of just what is needed. Friendly services of all kinds must be rendered efficiently. This can be done only by those who know how. Wise and tactful effort will be necessary in many families if the soldier is to find his family as well off when he returns as when he went away."

To Church people Mr. George Wharton Pepper, of Philadelphia, is known as one of the ablest and most honored of all our laymen, and it is of interest, therefore, to read in a Philadelphia paper of last week an interview from him in which the following paragraphs occur:

"I have until the last three years been always a user of alcohol in moderate quantities; I was brought up that way and I have always believed that it was a question for each man to settle for himself; but about three years ago I came to the conclusion that it was a matter of national policy, and I gave up liquor in any form.

"I have just been through many parts of the State, and I find an enormous sentiment in favor of the ratification of the federal amendment. I don't think the politicians realize this; those who usually make the most reliable predictions to-day fail to take into consideration how intensely the necessity of subjecting ourselves by compulsion to the same restrictions which all agree are necessary for our fighting men has taken hold upon the public conscience. I know innumerable striking instances of men who have always taken what liquor they wanted who to-day will not touch it, just because they do not regard it as particularly manly to accept defense from those whose individual desires in that regard have been ignored and to go on drinking in the safety of that defense bought by the other man's self-denial.

"Of course, that feeling does not logically lead to enforced prohibition, but when that sentiment becomes sufficiently powerful it is going to lead to a change in the law itself; and I have become convinced that there is no such thing as an inherent right when it comes to personal habits. The real question at any given time is whether the curbing of the nation's desires does not become a matter of national expediency.

"The war has had an enormous influence in the great growth of the desire for prohibition; there are, I think, three elements in this: First, the sentimental feeling that what the boys who are fighting have had to give up for us we ought to give up on our part; second, the growing consciousness of the absolute necessity for not spending any money on unnecessary luxuries, and, third, to some extent the still insufficient knowledge that the food staples have got to be economized. And it is my impression that a considerable amount of edible grain goes into the making of alcoholic drinks. * * *

"Those are all reasons why I, personally, am now earnestly for the ratification of the prohibition amendment."

The war would seem to produce not only some very wise sayings but also some very silly ones. Here is one of them, attributed to a prominent manufacturer who spoke last week at a great Eastern university:

"Latin and Greek have never made a man," he said. "They never will. In war time it is more study of a practical kind that gives a college self-respect. As a matter of fact, American colleges, particularly those in the East, would do well to put more study of a practical kind in their curriculum, even in time of peace."

We need efficiency in these days, it is true enough; but in the process of becoming efficient it is just as well not to follow the German spirit of putting on the scrap-heap all the refining things which do not happen to fit into some cast-iron materialistic plan.

To the editor of this column on the day when its material goes to press the mail brings a small leaflet which provokes thought concerning the practice recently of many kindly-disposed individuals and associations of sending quantities of tobacco indiscriminately to the soldiers abroad. The writer of the pamphlet recognizes the right of men who have been accustomed to smoke to have their tobacco, but objects to the present conditions which are promoting excess. He quotes as follows:

By the Associated Press, London, Nov. 4.—"Army surgeons display growing uneasiness on the subject of excessive cigarette smoking among the wounded and convalescent soldiers. Kindly people shower cigarettes upon men who are struggling back to health and by this means, say the doctors, retard recovery and even do permanent injury to health."

The report of a London military hospital superintendent says, "Nobody objects to an invalid smoking three or four cigarettes a day, but there is a grave danger in fifteen or twenty. A patient returning to the hospital after a day's leave is often found with an irregular pulse, due to his smoking. This interferes with sleep and leads to a general lowering of vitality. The public should remember that a convalescent soldier is more like a young boy than a grown man in his power to resist nicotine."

Christians of yesterday died for the truth; Christians of to-day live for it, and give their lives in service. Fidelity to purpose, to principle, to obligation, to trust, costs dearly.—Selected.

Easter.

The history of the Easter lessons in the past century or so in the churches of England and Canada and the Episcopal Church in this country is illuminating. The English and Canadian gave only Exodus 12 divided into two parts for morning and evening, with chapter 14 for an alternate. The American Church did likewise, except for 14. Later we cut out the second part of Exodus 12 and substituted first twenty-one verses of chapter 15, a great improvement, though the eliminating of all history leading up to the Exodus and proceeding from it seems a blunder. Later, the English (Canterbury) and Canadian revisions have enriched the readings for the day by adding Isaiah 51:1-16; 52:1-12 and chapter 12. The point to be noticed is that these new lessons from Isaiah add the historical fact of redemption from exile to that from Egypt as the background of the Easter message. And even before this was done, the American Prayer Book had already prepared the way for this in a measure by the use of Isaiah 43 and 48 on the first Sunday after Easter. It thus appears that the plan of the New American Lectionary, basing the use and arrangement of the Old Testament on these two fundamental facts of redemption, is only the logical development of a movement that has been going on for some time in the whole Anglican communion. Our first lesson Easter morning brings together in one view these same two redemptions (verses 9, 10, 15) and prophesies the Return: "The ransomed of the Lord shall return and come with singing unto Zion; everlasting joy shall be upon their heads; and sorrow and sighing shall flee away." Later on there will be given, in accordance with the historical plan, the story of the Return, reaching a climax in the re-establishment of the law, on Whit-Sunday (Nehemiah 9). For the second lesson, we have given the story of the Resurrection as told by the angels in St. Luke's gospel which we have been following through Lent. "Why seek ye the living among the dead? He is not here, but is risen. Remember how He spake unto you, saying, etc." For the first lesson, we have had recourse again to Isaiah (verses 11 and 12 should surely be included). It is God's appeal to the Church to awake and avail itself of its redemption: "Break forth into joy, sing together, ye waste places of Jerusalem; for Jehovah hath comforted His people; He hath redeemed Jerusalem." (The morning lesson contains an appeal to God to awake; the evening to the Church). St. John's story of the Resurrection is the second lesson; and we begin right away to prepare for the Ascension and for the Gift of the Holy Spirit (some might prefer to make this the morning lesson, which is permissible).

The week day lessons are determined, first by those passages of the Old Testament which belong in connection with the deliverance from Babylon, and this means the fortieth and following chapters of Isaiah, no matter whether written before, during or after the Exile. The other selections, morning and evening, are topically made, having reference either to appearances of the Risen Lord, or to previous deeds or sayings in either Testament which find their fulfilment in the Resurrection. A comparison of these selections with the week day readings of the Prayer Book (April 1-6) will show the appropriateness of the one set and the inappropriateness of the other, except for a single incident, and that is given in the New Lectionary as well: Luke 7:11-16, Raising of the son of the widow of Nain.

Easter Gladness.

Hallelujah! Christ is risen!
Of His triumphs let us sing;
Hail Him as the Lord victorious,
As our mighty conquering King;
Lift in waves of exultation
Notes of praise this Easter morn,
That shall as the sweetest incense
Upward to the throne be borne.

Hallelujah! Easter gladness
Echoes round the earth and main;
He who gave His life a ransom,
Conquers death and lives to reign;
Strike your harps, ye shining spirits,
Join with us in Easter lays,
Let there be one mighty chorus
To the mighty Conqueror's praise.

Hallelujah! Ours the blessing;
Since He died and rose again,
Now is our redemption perfect,
Life immortal we obtain.
So at last, when He appeareth,
Death shall clasp his chains in vain,
Tombs shall make their full surrender,
Saints shall their redemption claim.

Hallelujah! All ye ransomed,
Let your endless joy begin!
Now the gate of life immortal
Opens wide to let you in;
By and by shall angels sitting
At the tomb with open door,
Whisper to us, at our waking,
"Fear not; He has gone before."

An Easter Butterfly.

Janet Allan Bryan.

"Esther, are you going to service?" asked Mrs. Vinton, coming to the door of her daughter's room on Easter Even. "I can't go because Jim and Thomas are due in half an hour, and I must be here to welcome them home for their Easter holiday."

The girl looked up listlessly from the black crepe de chine dress on which she was pinning fresh white collar and cuffs. "Yes, I'll go, though, to tell you the truth, mother, church hasn't meant much to me, since—"

The mother looked sorrowfully at the sombre young face. "I've been afraid of that, dear," she said, "but I feel so differently: it is the greatest help I have in our trouble—if you and the boys could just find it so."

Esther rose silently and put on her hat. "No—it's no comfort to me," she said, "and this Easter season seems especially hard—all the talk about the Resurrection, and living again—and poor Alf gone!"

Mrs. Vinton sighed. The loss of the oldest of the three sons, who made the home a vital and delightful place for mother and sister, had settled like a pall over the spirits of those who were left. Alf had gone straight from the University to the front with an ambulance corps, and six months ago had fallen a victim to pneumonia at his distant post of duty. The mother's splendid courage and faith rose to meet the need, but to the two sons at a preparatory school in a neighboring town and the sister the memory of their loss brought only bitterness.

As the girl walked through the mild, spring twilight to church, her mind went over the well beaten track again. "What's the use in saying good comes out of ill—joy out of sorrow? Alf, taken just when he had come to his best development—nothing left of all that promise."

She slipped into a seat in a dim corner of the transept, and heard the familiar words with half attentive ears. The rector saw the lonely figure, however, and as soon as the service was over he hurried back to speak to her.

"I am glad to see you, my dear"—Dr. Owen had christened all the Vinton children—"because I want to ask a favor of you."

"Yes, sir," said Esther patiently.

"I've been trying during this week to go to see all the 'shut-ins' in the parish," continued the doctor, "in order to bring them a bit of the season's message. And this afternoon I planned to go from here to Miss Alison Grant's. But I am sent for to go to old Mr. Benson's—he's quite sick, I believe—and I wondered if you would go to Miss Alison's for me. I know it's on your way home, and that you have known Miss Alison many a year."

"Yes, but," began Esther, bewildered, "you spoke of a message—I haven't any message to give her, Dr. Owen; I have to try my best not to say bitter things these days."

The old man looked silently at his young parishioner. "Perhaps she may have one for you, my dear," he said gently. "At any rate, will you go?"

Esther nodded, and with a warm handclasp Dr. Owen turned away, while she lingered a moment to avoid the slowly moving throng of worshippers as they dispersed.

Miss Alison's little house was in the square next to Esther's home, and many a pleasant hour had she spent by the invalid's chair. Quite seventy years old was the lame woman, but her mind and heart kept their youthful tone, and her busy fingers had no time to grow stiff, as she sewed and darned for many poor neighbors.

Esther knocked, and then put her head in the door to call softly, "Miss Alison, it's Esther Vinton; may I come in?"

"Certainly, dear; I sent Molly to the book store just now, and am playing 'butler' myself."

Following the voice, Esther turned into Miss Alison's living room to find the little lady knitting vigorously. her wheel chair pushed up to the front window to catch the fading light.

"How nice to see you, child!" the hostess went on. "Come sit here and see how nicely I am getting on with the heel of this army sock."

"What, are you learning to knit for the soldiers?" asked Esther, thinking that Miss Alison's learning days must be over.

The lady gave her a strange, half sad glance. "Not learning, my dear, just remembering! In '61 we all spent every spare moment over our knitting needles—and our boys."

"But you were just a girl!" objected Esther.

"Plenty old enough to love—and suffer," answered Miss Alison softly. "As I sat here this afternoon, I was thinking of my own part in that suffering—" she hesitated a minute, and then went on. "I lost a young brother, too, you know."

Esther winced. "Did you feel the dreadful uselessness of it all?" she asked. "Oh, Miss Alison, I don't know what people mean when they say sorrow is worth while."

The knitter laid her needles down. "Just at first I felt as you do; but, Esther, before brother Harry had been gone a year I saw one of the blessed effects of sorrow—in my own family."

"Do you mind telling me?" asked the girl timidly.

"No, I am glad to speak of it. My dear father had been unhappily influenced in his student days in Germany, long, long ago, and had considered himself an unbeliever. But after Hal's death he began to reach out desperately for help and comfort where the rest of us found it, and he became a true and devout Christian."

Esther listened in silence. "I wish I could see any reason or any result to our loss," she said.

Miss Alison leaned down suddenly and produced an open pasteboard box from a low seat beside her. "Look what one of my Boy Scout friends brought me the other day," she said, showing Esther the odd, dusky oval of a silk worm cocoon. "He thought I might enjoy seeing the little creature emerge from its prison—but I will give it to you, if you like, as I have seen the pretty sight before."

"When will it come out?"

"I don't know exactly; put it in a warm, sheltered place, and you may expect it any time."

Interested and diverted, as the kindly old woman had intended, Esther rose to go, carrying the cocoon carefully in her gloved palm. "I have enjoyed coming, dear Miss Alison," she said gratefully, "and I am particularly pleased to have this bit of interest to carry home. Jim and Tom are back from school to spend Easter, and it's hard these days to make the house cheerful for them."

The mother and sons were sitting at the tea table as Esther hurried in, and after the brotherly hugs and greetings she produced the cocoon.

"My!" exclaimed Tom, the younger. "I hope it'll come out while I am here. I've an exam on Lepidoptera next month."

"Put it on the table in the bay window, Essie," suggested Mrs. Vinton. "and we'll all watch it."

The boys enjoyed the home supper, and talking of their ball team and its prospects, but afterward, as they gathered in the living room to inspect the mysterious little prisoner, Jim said gravely:

"I thought you'd like to know, mother, that there's a movement on foot to give a splendid memorial to Alf."

The mother looked up instantly. "What do you mean?"

"Our mathematics teacher was a member of Alf's class at the University, and he says the men of the class have subscribed enough to furnish an ambulance for work at the front, in his memory."

The mother could not speak for a moment, and Esther's tears overflowed, but they all felt a thrill of pride and joy in this beautiful evidence of love and admiration on the part of Alf's comrades. Details followed, and in the quiet talk which ended the evening Tom added his quota to the mother's comfort.

"I joined the Brotherhood of St. Andrew last week, mother," he said, shyly. "I thought as Alf had been a member of the chapter when he was at school, maybe you'd like me to be, too."

Esther awakened early on Easter morning, to the song of a venturesome bird outside her window and a gleaming ray of sunshine across her bed. Slipping into her dressing gown, intending to join her mother for the early service, she ran lightly downstairs to get hot water in the kitchen. The living room door was ajar, and remembering her cocoon dweller, she stepped in. As her eyes turned towards the table in the bay window, she uttered a little cry, and ran to see the winged creature beating its way to freedom through a rugged opening it had made in one end of the cocoon.

Breathless, Esther watched the struggle, half minded to try to help, but realizing that her clumsy fingers would probably injure the palpitating thing. She lost sight of time, and when a sound roused her she turned to see Mrs. Vinton ready for her early outing, smiling at her from the doorway. "You see!" cried Esther eagerly, "come in and shut the door, mother. Our prisoner is free, and I've been so absorbed I didn't know it was so late."

Mrs. Vinton looked closely at the fluttering moth, now quite free from her shell, and slowly fluttering her unaccustomed wings in the morning sunlight. "Never mind, dear, you will enjoy the later service with the boys. My heart was so full of gratitude for the news the boys brought last night—the wonderful memorial to Alf, which is an untold mercy, and Tom's effort to take his brother's place in the Brotherhood—I felt I must go and give thanks!"

Esther opened her lips to challenge the strange word, but changed her mind, and putting a gentle finger under the white butterfly, she raised it above her head and watched it flutter a moment toward the window.

"I begin to understand the Easter message," she said, very low, "of peace out of pain, light out of darkness; I believe I can sing today—

"Come ye faithful, raise the strain,
"Christ hath burst His prison!"

Easter.

A tomb within a garden lay
Where man had never lain,
And there they laid at close of day
The Lord so rudely slain.

Like leaves before the winter's blast
His loved ones fled in fear,
Their hopes had vanished, death at last
Had found their Master dear.

With grief and sorrow nigh forespent
Their vigil sad they keep,
With anguish keen their hearts are rent,
And love can only weep.

But on this happy Easter morn
The King of kings arose,
New gifts He brings to men forlorn
And conquers all His foes.

O grave, where is thy victory?
O death, where is thy sting?
He who in sorrow died for me
Shall be my Lord and King.

Easter Day.

"If Christ be not raised . . . ye are yet in your sins. Then they also which are fallen asleep in Christ are perished." So St. Paul sets forth the appalling, but logical, consequences, if the Resurrection of Christ be a mere myth; so, by implication, he suggests the glorious results of the sure and certain fact. Two things, in other words, are bound up with Christ's resurrection: they stand or fall according as that happening is fact or fiction—our deliverance from sin and our hope of a blessed immortality.

It is profoundly instructive to mark that the Apostle, even in this moving context, is absolutely true to his tremendous ethical convictions. The first result of the resurrection of the Lord is found, not in the believer's assurance of an endless life, but in a dynamic that makes holiness possible. The greatest gift of the Risen Christ is the power of a present victory over sin through His indwelling Spirit—only second to that comes the reward to the faithful disciple won by the Master's conquest of death—even the assurance of everlasting glory in the life of the world to come. Without righteousness endless existence would be, not a prize, but a punishment. Righteousness being assured, immortality becomes an exceeding great reward.

Many are the arguments which men have used to assure themselves of the reality of that hope beyond the grave, but most of us would probably agree with the Apostle that it was the Resurrection of Christ which brought life and immortality to light. In the certainty of that glorious fact the Apostle exults: "Have I not seen Jesus Christ our Lord?" About the middle of the nineteenth century it could still be said by a great scholar that "the Resurrection of Christ is the best attested fact in history." Since that date, however, the waves of criticism have tested the reliability of the Unique Event. The attack has been conducted upon two lines—an attempt has been made to discredit the evidence and to explain away the reality of the appearances. Has the attack succeeded, or may we still utter the triumphant cry of St. Paul, "Now is Christ risen from the dead, and become the first fruits of them that slept?"

Consider, first, the attack upon the credibility of the witnesses. Every apparent disagreement in the Gospel narratives has been magnified to the utmost. Much has been made of the fact that one Evangelist records only appearances in Jerusalem, while another recounts appearances in Galilee. But grant, for the sake of argument, all that critics have urged, two facts still remain unshaken—first, that the Apostolic Church, long before the Gospels were written, was convinced that Christ had indeed risen; and secondly, that in the power of a new and unprecedented spiritual dynamic, that same Church went forth to win the world for Jesus. Could such mighty facts be founded on a fiction? Could such tremendous results flow from an unreal cause? There can be only one answer to these questions—"now is Christ risen from the dead."

And the attempt to explain away the reality of the appearances? Here, too, grant, for the sake of argument, all that has been said—except only that the appearances were hallucinations of overheated brains. This we must rule out as absurd, for how could the regeneration of the world spring from the diseased imagination of hysterical patients and of madmen? But grant all other theories of the appearances, and it remains true that Christ proved Himself to survive in the power of an endless life. Your bias of mind may incline you to side with the Latin Fathers, who emphasized the fleshly character of the Lord's Risen Body. Or you may prefer to follow the Eastern Church, and dwell rather on the spiritual character of that Body. Its normal invisibility to human eyes, its difference from an superiority to our present vehicles of self-expression. You may decline to believe that flesh is essential to human nature, and prefer to agree with the Apostle when he suggests that flesh and blood are unsuitable to the new conditions—as, indeed, the cocoon of the chrysalis would be a burden to the butterfly. You may hold, as Chrysostom suggests (and this is practically the modern view) that Our Lord only appeared in material form, with the marks of the wounds, for the sake of convincing the Disciples. Yet, the one great fact remains unshakable—Christ had passed through death, not into nothingness, but into a condition exceeding the powers of this earthly life beyond all that we could have dared to hope or think. And so, conquering death for Himself, He has conquered it for us too. Christ has "become the first fruits of them that slept." There lies the pledge of the believer's immortality. "Now is Christ risen from the dead." Alleluia. —Canadian Churchman.

Volunteers Sanitary Corps, A. E. F., Offers Themselves in Fight Against Trench Fever.

The second most prolific cause of wastage from the line is trench fever—a disease unknown until this present war. As mosquitoes once were suspected to be the carriers of yellow fever germs so lice now are the suspected carriers of trench fever germs. This fact has not been proven, however. The American Red Cross is planning a campaign against trench fever similar to that employed against yellow fever in Cuba after the Spanish war. All the enlisted men of the Sanitary Corps who heard the call for volunteers offered themselves as subjects for experiment. Sixty were chosen. The following cablegram was received at National Headquarters from A. R. C. Headquarters in Paris and gives these interesting details:

"American Red Cross has just started to lead a unique attack upon trench fever—one of the most formidable enemies confronting the armies fighting in France. The plan of campaign is very similar to that employed against yellow fever in Cuba immediately after the Spanish war. Two members of General Pershing's staff who have authorized this experiment were intimately connected with the successful fight against yellow fever in Cuba.

"Trench fever, a disease unknown before the war, leads all fevers as disabling disease for soldiers and stands second on list of diseases causing wastage from the line. It has caused almost one-third of all sickness in some of the armies of northern France. The American Red Cross has set aside the necessary sum for conducting the scientific work in studying this disease.

"The primary purpose is to determine whether or not trench fever is transmitted by lice just as the primary purpose in the yellow fever study was to determine whether that disease was or was not transmitted by mosquitoes.

"All previous research by other methods having proved abortive a call was made among enlisted men of the sanitary corps of the American Expeditionary Forces for sixty volunteers who would undertake to submit themselves to exposure to the disease under such conditions as the doctors might prescribe. The immediate result was that out of 500 men attached to three field hospitals and four ambulance companies every man volunteered.

"All the sixty men selected came from New England. They are now quartered at the hospital which the British Army undertook to supply as a base for this work—the British offering to supply rations for the men while the experiment was in progress. Red Cross has provided a complete laboratory equipment for minute investigation of the infection in every phase of

A Queer Egg-Hunt.

"Oh, mother," cried Alice, running in her mother's room, "do you know that it is only four days before Easter, and I have not even thought of an egg-hunt!" and Alice in her excitement threw her hat on the chair and her books on the floor, while she began dancing up and down the room.

"It's just as well that you have not thought of it, miss," said her brother. "You must have forgotten all about Mr. Hoover and saving food. Egg-hunt, indeed; I should think you would be ashamed to mention it."

Alice's face fell; she looked as if she would like to cry.

"Oh, dear, will that make any difference?" she asked.

Bob was just about to answer her when her mother said:

"Suppose you go put your hat and books where they belong, little daughter, and then come back and we can discuss it."

When Alice returned she did not look as happy as when she had come in before, but she thought her mother would think of some way to have the hunt she had always had, and yet not do anything Mr. Hoover would think was not right. Alice had heard so much about that Mr. Hoover, she was a little afraid he would come in some day and see what she was eating and take it away for some soldiers. At least, she had dreamed once that that had happened, and she was afraid it would really be so some day.

Mother put her knitting aside and took the little girl on her lap.

"Now tell me," she said, "just what you wanted."

"I wanted to have an egg-hunt like I always do, and ask all the children and have ice cream and cake. Do you think if we were very quiet Mr. Hoover would ever find it out?" Alice looked hopefully up in her mother's face at this solution of the problem, but she did not find much to encourage her there.

"Now let's see," said her mother. "Why do you suppose we talk about Mr. Hoover's not liking us to waste food? It isn't really Mr. Hoover that has found out that we waste so much food that some poor starving people want, and the government has asked Mr. Hoover to take charge and see that there isn't as much waste as there used to be; but that is not the bottom of the matter. Do you think it would be right for all the little boys and girls who have a plenty to eat to use eggs just to play with, when there are thousands of men and women and little children across the water who can scarcely get enough to eat to keep them from starving? And then there are poor, sick children in this very town who need eggs to eat, but are too poor to pay for them. Of course you would not think it right to use lots of eggs just as playthings when they are so much needed."

"But, mother, if we can't send the eggs over there, why can't we have them? We can't pack them up to send away."

"No, but if we do not buy all there are the Government can get them and see that they are sent where they are needed. Besides, there are all our soldiers over on this side of the water who have to be fed and kept strong."

"Oh, let the kid have some candy eggs, if she has to have some," broke in Bob.

"You are not any wiser than she, my son. Indeed, you should know better than to suggest that candy, or anything that uses so much sugar, is the last thing to use as a substitute. Suppose we try to think of some plan by supper time, and maybe father can help us out then. Run on out and play now, Alice." And kissing the sober little girl, she put her down.

Alice went out thinking rather hard. She had boasted at school that she would have her egg-hunt as usual this year, and she did not like to go where Sue and Mary and Mabel were for fear of their asking her more about it. So she went up in the hay loft to think up a plan, or at least to try to. But she did not do very much thinking, for she found her paper dolls up there, and began to play with them, and soon forgot all about Easter eggs.

At the supper table her mother told her father all about the trouble, and asked him if he could think of a plan whereby the Easter party need not be given up. The only thing Bob could suggest was to hide peanuts instead of eggs, but Alice did not think much of the plan, so she waited for some one else to speak.

Finally father, who was a doctor, said: "I do not think it would be right to get the eggs for a hunt this year. They are rather hard to get, and people are saving all they can and packing them away for next winter, when they say it will be impossible to get any. Today I went to see a little girl who has been sick a long time and who needs a lot of nourishing food, but she could not get eggs because they were so high; then there is old Mr. Tompkins, who needs them, and he can't afford them, and a poor boy over in the downtown district needs them a lot. In fact, there are several sick people there who need them. I thought the eggs had gone down in price, but this poor boy Tom told me that they always went up at Easter time because people bought so many for their children's egg-hunts. So, little girl, I don't think we ought to buy them, do you?"

"Oh, I have an idea," said mother.

"Suppose we buy some eggs, but instead of boiling and dyeing them, see how fresh we can keep them and then let the eggs hunt the people who need them." We could go out in father's car the day before Easter and take some to all those poor people who need them."

"That will be fine," exclaimed father. "How many children do you usually ask to the hunts, Alice?"

Alice's eyes sparkled very brightly now, and her face fairly shone.

"Oh, how fine! Let me see; there's Sue, and Mary Anne, and Mabel, and the twins and Joe and Raymond and Walter and—"

"Hold on," said father, "how many do you think my machine can hold?"

"We can't take as many as that, honey," said mother, "but we will decide later who we can ask, and then the others can come here when we get back and have some games and ice cream with us."

And that is the way it turned out. Mother got some nice fresh eggs and some pretty little baskets and fixed them up for the poor people. Alice was surprised to see how many different shades the egg shells were without being dyed. Some very very white, and some were quite brown, while others were nearly yellow, or cream colored. These they mixed in the baskets and put some flowers in with them. Then three of Alice's dearest friends went with mother and Bob to the places that father had told them about and left the eggs. The sick people were not only glad to get the eggs, but were very much entertained when Alice told them the eggs were doing the hunting this Easter. When they got home they found five other children waiting for them, and then mother brought out some ice cream, not in bricks, as they were used to seeing it, but each saucer had a colored egg of ice cream on it, and how good it tasted. "So much better than a cold, hard-boiled egg, that has red or green or purple stripes on the white," said Alice. M.

Molly Rabbit's Nest.

Late on the Friday before Easter Mrs. Hanson found a row of excited faces waiting for her at the gate. Howard's was excited and amused, Lela's excited and wondering, and Tiny's excited and a little scared.

"We thought we'd clean the rabbit house tonight, 'cause we might want to go to grandmother's tomorrow, and we found a nest of eggs in it. Lela and Tiny think Molly Rabbit laid 'em," chuckled Howard.

"I don't," said Lela, quickly. "Not quite, but I think Tiny does."

"I'm soor se did," small Tiny answered.

"Do come and look at them, mother," urged Howard.

Sure enough, in one corner of the rabbit house, nestled deep in the straw, were six pearly eggs.

"You see, mother, they really are not like hen's eggs; they are so small and white."

"Lucky tomorrow's Saturday," cried Howard. "We can watch all day and see what does it. We'll take it turn about."

However, everybody wanted the first watch, and it was not a bit tiresome. From the back porch they had a fine view of the rabbit house. Molly Rabbit was on the move every moment, and whenever she hopped into the rabbit house and out again, Tiny ran to see if there was another egg, though the others told her Molly hadn't time to lay one. Howard and Lela were just beginning to wonder if it was any use to watch longer, when they thought they saw something outside the fence.

"What's that? Sh! Don't move," whispered Howard.

Yes, there was something white creeping through the tall grass along the fence. There was one place where the wires were pushed apart a little, and presently a tiny head poked through it. Two bright eyes looked carefully around a moment; then out stepped the tiniest, trimmest white hen the Hansons had ever seen. Howard didn't draw a long breath, and Lela and Tiny scarcely breathed at all as the wee Biddy edged her way across the yard. She didn't once look at the rabbit house. She stopped now and then to scratch and peck a bit, but all the time she was getting nearer. At last she gave a little run and popped through the door.

Then the children rose and stole noiselessly into the house.

"It's a bantam, and a bantam is a dwarf hen," explained mother when she had gathered the facts from the clatter of voices.

They took turns after that, standing at the kitchen window, and it was Howard that saw the wee hen come out. They watched till she crept through another fence up the road.

"It's the brick house on the corner where those new people moved in last week," said Howard. They rushed back to the house.

"Are the eggs ours, mother?" asked Tiny. "Did she mean 'em for us?"

"The eggs don't belong to the hen, but to the one who feeds her, dear."

"Why, of course," they have to buy feed with the eggs," Lela agreed. "We must take them home."

They did so, but came flying back, eggs and all. "Mrs. Brown says it is Molly Rabbit's nest if it is in her house, mother, and we're to keep the eggs. They have lots of hens and don't care for banty eggs. Won't they be sweet colored? Two apiece and one over. I thought Tiny ought to have the odd one 'cause it is tiny and so is she; then I had another beautiful thought. It popped right into my head. Can't Howard write about the banty on his typewriter and send the story and the egg to Mrs. Maloney's Jimmy that isn't getting well as fast as he should?"

"Aw, I can't write well enough," said Howard, sheepishly.

He did his best, though, and it was quite good enough; for Jimmy was so interested that he made up his mind to get well fast and see the little hen for himself. So, two weeks later, Mrs. Maloney brought Jimmy with her when she came to wash; and he sat on the porch and watched Banty creep up the alley and through the fence, and brought the egg in when she was gone.

"Bless every little white feather of her. She's been the making of Jimmy," said Mrs. Maloney, tearfully.—Sunday-School Times.

The Story of the Risen Lord.

Easter Day is the most glorious day of the whole Church year. Every one wants to shout with joy and cry to God out of very ecstasy of gladness; for on the first Easter Day our dear Lord's Spirit came back to His body (which had lain in the tomb since Good Friday), and He was alive again—"alive for evermore," the Bible tells us.

I always wonder if in heaven there is not a great celebration on Easter Day, too. I am sure there must be; and I am sure the angels sing more sweetly and more exultantly on that day.

You remember that our Lord died on the Cross on Good Friday. Now, the Jewish Sabbath (or day of rest and worship) fell on Saturday, and on that day nothing could be bought or sold. Bodies of the dead were wrapped in spices in those days (to keep them), and the three Marys were unable to buy any until after sundown on Saturday.

So, St. Matthew tells us, very early in the morning of "the first day of the week," these holy women hurried to the tomb of our Saviour so as to wrap His body in the spices. But there they found the great stone rolled away from the door of the tomb, and a glorious angel sitting upon the stone. The women were frightened, but the angel spoke gently to them.

"Fear not," he said. "For I know ye seek Jesus, which was crucified. He is not here; for He is risen. . . . Come, see the place where the Lord lay."

Think of being spoken to by an angel! Then he told them to tell the disciples that Jesus Christ had gone into Galilee, and they should go there and be with Him.

So they hurried away to tell the disciples; but on the way they met the Lord Himself. They fell down at His feet, and worshipped Him; and then He sent them on to tell the disciples.

While all this was going on, some of the soldiers who had been set to watch the tomb came into the city of Jerusalem, and began to tell what had taken place. You see, in a very wonderful and inexplicable way, our Lord had risen from the dead, and passed right through the stone sepulchre. Then came the glorious angel who rolled away the stone and sat upon it.

But those who hated our Lord, and had had Him put to death, told the soldiers to say the Lord's body had been stolen by His friends, and that He had not really risen from the dead; and they gave them money for saying it. And that is what the Jews are taught even now.—Shepherd's Arms.

Happy Easter Time.

The little flowers came through the ground
At Easter time, at Easter time;
They raised their heads and looked around
At happy Easter time.

And every pretty bud did say:
"Good people, bless this holy day;
For Christ is risen, the angels say,
At happy Easter time."

'Twas long and long and long ago,
That Easter time, that Easter time;
But still the pure white lilies blow
At happy Easter time.

And still each little flower doth say:
"Good children, bless this holy day,
For Christ is risen, the angels say,
At blessed Easter time."

An Easter Gift.

Kathleen Hay.

"I wish I had something to give for Easter, Granny."

A golden head rested thoughtfully on the old lady's knee, while a pair of earnest eyes looked up to meet those bent above her.

"Granny" smiled down on the small, white face brightly.

"Why, Beth, you have a cheerful disposition to give, and I'm sure that's a lovely gift."

The little girl smiled and laid her cheek lovingly against the old lady again, but her eyes were still troubled.

Suddenly her face brightened, and she clasped her hands together.

"Oh, Granny, why didn't I think before—why, my lily will bloom for Easter—I can give that."

The little old lady's face grew a trifle sad; as her eyes rested on the plant in the tiny window that lame Beth loved so well.

She had looked forward to its blooming for her. Then as the eager voice floated up to her again, the wistful look vanished, and she entered into her plan quite cheerfully.

"What a lovely idea, little one; your lily will be something beautiful to give."

"Oh, I'm so glad you think it a nice plan," said Beth happily, "and Granny, dear, maybe it will make some one happier for seeing it there."

Day after day passed, and Granny indeed, as she watched the pale little face, thought that Beth would be in the land where flowers never fade before her lily opened, but suddenly the little lame girl grew better, and began to talk eagerly of the small crutch that had lain in the corner so long, and of how, perhaps, she would be well enough to take the lily herself.

"And Granny," said Beth, as her eyes lingered lovingly on the white flower in the window, "isn't it too lovely that my lily has bloomed just in time for an Easter gift?"

The little old lady's eyes followed the direction of the child's bright ones, till they came to the pure white flower.

"It's very lovely, Beth, dear," she whispered, "and the Giver of all good gifts has seen fit to gladden my life, too, with one of His own bright jewels!"

An Indoor Garden.

"I should like to start my garden right away," said Paul. "See, here are some wonderful pictures in the seed catalogue."

"Why not start a garden now?" his mother asked. "It would be fun to see it grow."

Paul looked out of the window upon a snow-covered world. "What kind of garden could I possibly plant now?" he said. "Jack Frost has been sowing seeds."

"But you can have a green garden in a few days," his mother replied. "I will show you how. First, the seeds must be soaked in warm water."

Paul ran to get the seeds. When he came back his mother was covering a wide tray with a layer of cotton.

"After the seeds are soft," she said, "we will place them between two layers of cotton and wet them well. Then we will carry the tray to the sunniest window, and in a few days your garden will be growing."

Paul could hardly believe that seeds would grow unless they were planted in moist brown earth, but watched his cotton garden faithfully. After some days green shoots appeared. Paul was puzzled and delighted. His mother explained that each seed holds a store of food for the little growing plant, so that at first it does not need earth to nourish it.

Paul's plants did not grow to be big and tall, but they gave him much pleasure. He soon started other small gardens in sawdust and fiber. He found that by placing peas or corn or oats against the inside of a glass bottle and filling the bottle with moist cotton he soon had a garden where he might watch the growth of the roots as well as of the leaves.

These are only a few of the many things that Paul has learned about indoor gardens. His mother has told him that there are many more wonderful Little Boys and Little Sheep.

Joe came home with his clothes, and even his curly hair, all wringing wet. "Just knew the ice wasn't strong enough!" he grumbled.

"Then why did you slide?" asked Auntie.

"Cause all the other boys did," said Joe; "so I had to, or they'd laugh."

His aunt gave him dry clothes, set him down by the fire, and made him drink hot ginger tea. Then she told him a story.

"When I was a little girl, Joe, my father had a great flock of sheep. They were queer things—where one went, all the rest followed.

"One day the big ram found a gap in the fence, and he thought it would be fun to see what was in the other field. So in he jumped, without looking where he was going. And down he tumbled to the bottom of an old, dry well, where father used to throw stones and rubbish.

"The next sheep never stopped to see what had become of him, but just jumped right after, and the next, and the next, although father tried to drive them back; and Watch, the sheep dog, barked his loudest. But they just kept on jumping 'till the well was full. Then father had to pull them out as best he could, and the sheep at the bottom of the well were almost smothered to death."

"My! what silly fellows," exclaimed Joe. Then he looked up at his aunt and laughed.—London Sunday-School Times.

the disease, as it may affect the men under different conditions.

"Trench fever is not fatal in its effects and causes no permanent disabilities, but its effect upon the fighting power of an army is withering, and, of course, the disease involves great discomfort to the men while it is in progress.

"A unique feature of the volunteering of these men was that when they all offered to subject themselves to this infection they supposed they would be required to go into the trenches and expose themselves to the disease under the trying conditions prevailing there.

"When the experiment is completed the names of the men who will have undergone this service will be made public. The results from their sacrifice should prove of great value to every allied army in the field."—Red Cross Bulletin.

THOMAS GHOLSON WATKINS.

THOMAS GHOLSON WATKINS, attorney at law, Petersburg, Va., died at 8 o'clock A. M. on March 13th, at the residence of his niece, Mrs. Fletcher Monette, Greensboro, Ala.

Mr. Watkins was born on the 17th of June, 1852, in the city of Petersburg, Va.; graduated in law at the University of Virginia in 1873 and continued the practice of his profession practically up to the time of his death. Although an invalid for the past sixteen years, his cheerfulness, resignation and Christian fortitude during all of his ill health has, of course, in many cases been equalled, but none surpassed. Funeral services were held in Greensboro, Ala., and the interment took place in Old Blanford Cemetery, Petersburg, Va., about 11 o'clock A. M. Friday, March 15.

Mr. Watkins leaves surviving him his brother, John D. Watkins, his devoted and self-sacrificing stepmother, Mrs. W. L. Watkins, of Petersburg, Va., and his sister, Mrs. M. L. Wood, of Montgomery, Ala., and nieces and nephews in the State of Alabama.

ARCHIBALD MAGILL SMITH.

Near Houma, Louisiana, at the home of his daughter, Mrs. Jean L. Gallouet, entered into life eternal ARCHIBALD MAGILL SMITH, of Winchester, Va., the beloved husband of Mary Bolling Meredith.

The unseen messenger came to him after a very brief illness, on January 22, 1918, in the eighty-second year of his age. It was as though weary he lay down to rest "till the morning." The last evening he was up he read reverently and beautifully from the Prayer Book that he loved and which he has led so many others to love.

We look upon the passing of this servant of God as a triumph—an entrance into the joy of his Lord.

Many rise up and call him blessed. Men who knew him say the following. One writes, "His great qualities of character and of mind have always been a subject of admiration with me. No one could come in contact with his personality without being drawn upward toward the high plane on which he lived—his life was so complete not only in years but in accomplishment." Another, "I revere his memory and his lessons are on my heart." And another, "In the course of my life I have had the privilege of knowing many good and pure men, who have gone before us, but none better fitted to use those words of the Apostle, 'I have fought a good fight, I have finished my course, I have kept the faith.'"

Deaths.

The Rev. John W. Chesley, a retired minister of the Diocese of Washington, died at his home in St. Michael's, Md., on March 7, aged ninety-three years. The Rev. Mr. Chesley was one of the oldest clergymen of the American Church, and has been for a number of years the oldest living alumnus of the Theological Seminary in Virginia. Until very recently his health has been remarkably preserved. Nearly all of his long ministry was spent in lower Maryland.

The funeral services were conducted by his son, the Rev. J. Harry Chesley, of the Cathedral at Easton, assisted by a son-in-law, the Rev. Charles E. Buck, of Rock Creek parish, Washington. Mr. Chesley is survived by a widow and four children. The interment was in the St. Michael's parish churchyard. The Masonic Lodge of Easton, of which he was a member, attended the services in a body.

Who, hopeless lays his dead away,
Nor looks to see the breaking day
Across the mournful marbles play!
Who hath not learned in hours of faith,
The truth to flesh and sense unknown,
That Life is ever lord of Death,
And Love can never lose its own."
—Whittier.

CHURCH KNOWLEDGE AND NURTURE.

School Teachers and 46,619 Sunday School Scholars.

The Sunday School is the principal official educational institution of the Church. * * *

Teacher Training is the pressing need of our Church Sunday Schools of today. Many parishes have their own Teacher-Training Classes. Many of the Diocesan Boards maintain or promote Diocesan or Interparochial Teacher-Training Classes.

The General Board of Religious Education (289 Fourth Avenue, New York) has set forth a course of Teacher Training, which may be taken by correspondence.

There are maintained in the Province of Sewanee three Summer Conferences, in which classes in Teacher Training and other kinds of Church work are conducted:

St. Mary's Conference, Raleigh, N. C., in June (omitted 1918);

Gulf Coast Conference, Gulfport, Miss., in July;

Sewanee Summer Training School for Workers, Sewanee, Tenn., in August.—From the Bulletin of the Board of Religious Education of the Province of Sewanee.

Easter Greeting.

Out from darkness into light; from the sadness of Gethsemane and Calvary into joys of Easter; away from thoughts of suffering to hymns of victory; from the dark tragedy of Good Friday to the empty tomb—such is the great transition to-day in Christian thought, voiced in anthems and flowers, in carols and hymns, and emphasized in the message of joy proclaimed from

Christian pulpits. The news that encircles the globe to-day, and visits each hamlet and village and city, and makes hearts beat the quicker for joy, is the announcement made to the disciples of old, and repeated through all the Christian centuries: "The Lord is risen indeed."

The world itself keeps Easter Day. So strong a hold has the fact of the resurrection gained upon the hearts of men! As the centuries multiply, the thought grows stronger and stronger. Men and women are studying the fact from every point of view. Sentiment has laid hold of it. Reason has grasped the idea. The man of science finds the law of the resurrection capable of demonstration.

Who can express in language the hope with which it cheers and inspires the heart of one called to suffering and pain?

And who can find words to tell of the comfort which this thought gives to those who grieve over the loss of loved ones, gone before?

There is power in this central fact of Christian history. There is inspiration in this keystone in the arch of Christian truth.

Let us rejoice, then, as we look this day into the empty sepulchre. Let us weave the truth and fact into our lives. Let it give courage to the strugglers, hope to the discouraged ones, comfort to the mourners—joy in every heart because Christ has brought to us this day life and immortality.—Exchange.

Christ's prayer for His people is not that they may be taken out of the world, but that they may be protected from the evil of the world. The world is very much with us all the time, but a robust spiritual health can escape its infection. The presence of temptation is the Christian's opportunity to fight the good fight and to win out. We are to endure hardship as good soldiers of Jesus Christ. It is not to the interest of our souls that fiery trials of faith and endurance should be wanting. Opposition to the spirit of worldliness develops spiritual strength and character. Through Christ we can conquer every temptation to adopt a course of life which will induce us to forget or ignore God. To express our heavenly citizenship against encroaching worldliness invites the charge of oddity and opens life to scorn and persecution. But resistance develops the muscles of holiness, and in the purpose to be steadfast, the resources of divine grace are worked into the fibres of the soul. We may often wonder why it is so hard to be good and why so many inducements to evil and secularism are permitted. They are intended to minister to our sanctification. They are steps on which the soul rises to its native sphere. They furnish the field in which the triumphs of grace are displayed. When we by our faith conquer the world, we show forth the praise of Him who giveth us the victory through Jesus Christ the Lord.—Selected.

Freezing to boiling without breaking

Pyrex dishes are guaranteed not to break in the oven. They stand even the test shown above.

Those who use Pyrex say it is the most lasting of cooking utensils. It never flakes or crazes—never rusts, dents, burns out or discolors. Lasts a lifetime.

Ordinary pans waste two-thirds of the oven heat. Pyrex uses it all. It makes bread rise an inch higher, gives pies crisp under-crusts, makes meat more tender. Pyrex makes all food more delicious.

Dealers everywhere sell the many different Pyrex dishes. Buy your first one today. Like thousands of others you will never again use an old-fashioned pan.

Thoughts For the Thoughtful

There is no great religion without its great hope.—Van Dych.

We never worry except when we forget that God is good.—Ex.

The poorest people in the world are those who try to keep all they get.—Ex.

Faith rests and waits. Unbelief refuses to be quiet because it has no feeling.—Ex.

"Now hath Christ been raised from the dead, the first fruits of them that are asleep."

The man who is more than filling his place now, is on his way to a better one.—Ex.

As soon as we make God's word a lamp to our feet, we stop traveling in the dark.—Ex.

A man soon finds out how little he knows when a child begins to ask him questions.—Ex.

God is always looking for a better place in which to put the man whom He can trust.

The man who fears God is not afraid to walk in the dark, but he fears to walk alone.—Ex.

Patient suffering for Christ's sake is one of the highest possible tests of loyalty to Him.—Ex.

Too many Christians never expect any help—from God until everything else fails. Better count on Him from the beginning.—Ex.

The Christian prays as he lives, and lives as he prays. But Christian prayer is the prayer of faith, and not merely of form; it is prayer of the heart, and not merely of the lips; it is prayer which rests not in bodily posture, but in spiritual power.—James Hastings.

We echo oftentimes that cry of old.

Huge stumbling blocks confront us whilst we wait

And wonder, weeping, who will help afford;

But as we question, sorrowing, behold!

The stone is rolled away, though it is great,

And on it sits the angel of the Lord.

—F. I. Fowler.

This is the message of the Risen Lord to men. He has become the link between us and all that is highest and best. We know that He has overcome all evil and left it behind. We know that Christ must ascend to the highest, and yet we know also that He will not enter where we cannot follow. We know that His love binds Him to us as strongly as His rights carry Him to God.—Marcus Dods.

Sing, with all the sons of glory.

Sing the resurrection song!

Death and sorrow, earth's dark story

To the "former days" belong

Even now the dawn is breaking.

Soon the night of time shall cease.

And in God's own likeness walking,

Man shall know eternal peace.

—Irons.

There must be noble things in store for that race with which the Son of God is contented to have such patience. If the Great Husbandman waits so long for the feeble, springing blade, how precious must the full harvest be! There are ages for the world to learn in, and an eternity for the individual; and when the soul is able to bear full light, how many things will the great Teacher have to disclose. It is a token of the immortality of the soul that God has implanted in man a boundless desire of knowledge, and given him so limited a time to satisfy it—and it is ground for expecting all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge from Jesus Christ that He came into this world, possessed of them, and yet kept silence on so much we long to know.—J. Ker.

The world does in a certain sense admire Christ's character. Few eulogies are more eloquent, so far as language goes, than the eulogies which eminent unbelievers have pronounced on the Nazarene. But admiration is one thing; loyalty is another thing. There is a tremendous difference between aesthetic admiration and practical devotion; between assent to Christ's teaching and consent with Christ's character. And what the world needs is to have such a profound conviction of Christ's personal, conspicuous, distinctive righteousness as to yearn for it, crying, O Jehovah, be Thou my righteousness. And this conviction no power but the Paraclete can effect.—G. D. Boardman.

Oneness with Christ is not only characterized by seeing eye to eye, but equally in working will to will. To know the mind of God is one thing, and to will to do it is another. When will unites with will, there flows through both the self-same spirit. The soul must maintain an activity of positive obedience. The life of Christians not infrequently breaks down through being too negative. This leads to a certain flabbiness of will, which is disastrous. Fear is born and positive virile obedience gives place to expressions of doubt as to whether we can succeed. The devil is thus our victor before the attempt is made. Positiveness which breeds assurance both in the realm of physical health and business is absolutely vital in the things of the spirit concerning obedience. Did we stand alone, there might be room for fear. But we do not stand alone. Our wills are connected with the dynamo of His will, and anything they may lack in energy He supplies. The only thing devolving upon us is to see to it that our wills are in line with His, and in this even we are not unaided, for His Spirit dwells within us and it is in His strength that we set up our banners and go forward.—Episcopal Recorder.

Kind Words Plus.

It is easy to speak kind words. And they ought to be spoken. But sometimes it is too easy to stop there; and then our kindness does not amount to much. At one of last summer's conferences one of the visiting speakers was impressed by the difference between the two kinds of people one meets at such conferences. There is one kind who say to the visitor, "Now be sure to let us know if we can do anything for you." They say it heartily and genuinely; and they let it go at that. There is another kind—and a certain man there was a shining example of this—who not only say it but then they really do the thing. They are constantly on the lookout to do little things which are a genuine help, and which cost them some time and trouble. They do not stop with kind words, but they add the "plus" which is remembered long afterwards.—Sunday-School Times.

The Night Raid.

Rt. Rev. James H. Darlington, D. D., in the Harrisburg Telegram.

The Zeppelins came through the midnight sky,
Weep, weep for the pity.
They rained down death where they hung on high
You knew not whether to hide or fly,
When walls were falling, what use to try?
Best say your prayers and prepare to die,
Farewell to your friends, to all "Good-by,"
Weep, weep for the city.

Wee children had said their evening prayer,
Sob, sob for sorrow.
Mothers had also knelt with them there
And tucked them into their cribs with care,
Caressingly kissing each forehead so
fair,
But when like thunder bombs burst in air
In a moment all was changed to despair,
Sob, sob for the morrow.

In hospitals lay the ill and weak,
God punish the plotters.
Many so weak they could not speak,
With aching forms and pallid cheek,
Watched ever by the nurses meek;
Who woke to die, mid shell fire shriek
To gratify a monarch's pique.
God judge the rotters.

God bless the surgeons who stood to their post,
All lights forbid, even candles;
They were present where'er they were needed most
And would not flee though the flames might roast;
When invaders came from foreign coast;
But laughed with contempt at their cruel boast.
"The doctor heroes," I pledge you the toast.
God punish the vandals.

'Twas morning soon and the danger was past.
Thank God for living.
The harpies of blood had left our shore
With murders many to their score,
Our streets all splashed with children's gore,
E'en pirates would such deed abhor,
Make us forgiving.

Self-denial means submission of the will.

I heard the other night with profound gratification a simple story, told by a simple man, of the power of the Gospel in the wilds of the Soudan. Men had come to him here in America to tell him what a mistake it was to try to Christianize the savages. "First let them be civilized and let them be moralized; and then, when they have learned to clothe themselves and to live decently and decorously and have regard for the rules of right living (as we at any rate receive them, whether we conform to them or not),
then, and not till then, let the message of the faith come to them." And this wise, simple man, who knew so much more than the college presidents that prated to him, this simple missionary bore his witness to the futility of that method and to the power of the proclamation of the Name of the risen Lord to prepare the way effectually for the education and civilization and moralization which are all desirable, but which must follow after conversion, if indeed there is to be the

The Plain Life.

He passed in the light of the sun
In the path that the many tread,
And his work, like theirs, was done
For the sake of his daily bread;
But he carried a sword, and one by one,
Out there in the common light of the sun,
The sins of his life fell dead.

His feet never found the way
That leads to the porch of fame,
But he strove to live each day
With a conscience void of blame;
And he carried a cross whose shadow lay
Over every step of his lowly way,
And he treasured its splendid shame.

So life was a long, hard fight—
For the wrong was ever there,
And the cross ne'er out of sight,
The cross of a gay world's care;
But right through the day to the failing light
He carried the cross, and fought the fight,
Great-hearted to do and bear.

Night fell—and the sword was sheathed,
And the cross of life laid down.

The Daily Adventure.

Day by day we do actually and literally go out and come in. The phrase marks the ordered sequence of our ordinary existence—that daily life of the trivial round, and the common task of which we sometimes complain that nothing ever happens; that it is wholly commonplace. And yet the commonplaceness of it is surely in ourselves. The ordinary daily life is, if we be spiritually alert, far less certain and far more adventurous than we conceive. To the spiritually alert the street is as hazardous as the wilderness, and the office and the shop are to us as foreign lands. We meet, every day, men and women who surprise us with the revelation of unexpected possibilities, and of unhinted thoughts, and whose action is a thousand times more difficult to forecast. Spiritual gold may wait for us at the corner of any street, and the words that alter the destiny of a life be spoken in the clamor and rumble of a railway platform. We may meet spiritual adventures within a few yards of our own door. And God may come to meet us, supreme, in the street that our feet have trodden every morning. The path where we have enjoyed such quiet communions may be changed in a moment into the scene of temptation and disaster. Any morning and any hour may bring to us the opportunity either of denying or entering into, and sharing the larger and fuller communion of our Lord. Militant Christianity.

Those who are accustomed to think of Christianity as a milk and water affair will be interested in reports from the front. The Y. M. C. A. reports that the Bible is the most popular book in the trenches, and that the demand far outdistances the present supply. The trials and temptations of war make a demand on the spiritual stamina of men, and everywhere there is a turning toward old values and old virtues.

It is perhaps the emphasis on sacrifice, on the trivial value of life, as compared with great principles, which makes the Christian religion so comforting and sustaining to the man in the trenches. "He that loveth his life shall lose it," says the book; "And he that hateth his life in this world shall keep it to life eternal." Confidence in immortality, belief in a force stronger than ourselves, "which makes for righteousness," purity, courage and loyalty—these are the things which make armies formidable, preserve morale, win wars.

In a recent number the Literary Digest reports Admiral Sir John Jellicoe to have sent these words to the British Navy: "Be strong and of good courage; be not afraid, neither be thou dismayed; for the Lord thy God will keep thee whithersoever thou goest. Honor all men. Love the brotherhood. Fear God. Honor the king!"

Commander-in-Chief Pershing clearly recognizes the significance of religion as a force for the preservation of morale among the troops. "Hardships will be your lot," he writes to an American soldier. "But trust in God will give you comfort. Temptations will befall you, but faith in our Saviour will give you strength."

Men facing danger and death feel no flippancy about religion. Instead, there is everywhere a groping toward light, a demand for further understanding of life's paradoxes and sacrifices. If the Church can meet that demand, it will perform a service for the fighting forces of Uncle Sam not second to that which satisfies physical needs.—Maryland Churchman.

Chaplain's Prayer on the Bridge.

An officer related the following incident at a luncheon in Newcastle-on-Tyne a short while ago:

"Stories of the devotion of the Chaplains at the front continue to filter through. The following is certainly one of the most remarkable and encouraging, though, perhaps, if our faith were as strong as our profession, it ought not to be considered as remarkable. A certain bridge had to be crossed, and the enemy were pouring down such a murderous fire of shot and shell that for a moment the men hesitated to advance; but the Chaplain rushed forward and knelt in prayer on the bridge, and then all dashed forward as one man, and a miraculous thing happened; not a single casualty occurred in crossing that bridge."

What America needs supremely today—aye, what the world needs—is a new, profounder, more forceful and convincing preaching of the Gospel of Jesus Christ, and a deeper faith in that Gospel. For it is that Gospel alone that exalts the moral and spiritual values and ends of life above the material. It is only as we see the world and ourselves in the light of His revelation, it is only as we interpret the meaning of history and experience and the very riddle of the universe itself in that light—it is only so that civilization can stand, nations exist together in mutual respect and fellowship, humanity persist or our individual lives find significance and purpose. There is surely coming out of this awful experience a new craving for reality in the hearts of all men, a new demand for the spiritual interpretation of all things, a new searching for some eternal rock of faith upon which to build again lives that have been crushed and a world that has been shattered; that is, there is coming a new sense of spiritual need—and the religion and Gospel of Jesus Christ alone can meet and satisfy that need. This is the supreme task of the Church today in the face of this great world tragedy—to give that world again a faith and a God. Many are voices that are crying in despair through this night of doubt and terror, "Who shall show us any good?" Yea, many are the voices that are mocking the Church with the taunt, "Where is now thy God?" Let this be at once the prayer and the answer of the Christian Church, a prayer that shall rise persistently in trust to God and an answer that shall go ringing with confidence to men: "Lord, lift Thou up the light of Thy countenance upon us."—Bishop Williams in Witness.

The love that never speaks until it does it on a gravestone, keeps still too long.—Ex.

THE CHURCH PENSION FUND.

Because in one or more instances we think the argument of the Southern Churchman in discussing the administration of the Church Pension Fund has been somewhat misunderstood, we give a concise resume of the position we have taken and again beg to be corrected if in any particular we are in error in our statements.

1. We have not been interested in an increase of pensions for the Clergy retiring after March 1, 1917. We would object to their receiving more than the $600 per annum promised to them and given for them until the old pensioners, retired before that date, with their dependents, had their pensions raised to a corresponding amount.

2. Nor have we had in mind the old pensioners of the large and comparatively wealthy dioceses which had very considerable Diocesan Relief Funds, and have always been able to make tolerably generous provision for pension relief. These were assured, before any merger with the Church Pension Fund took place, that their customary pensions would be continued by the Pension Fund without cost to the diocese and without the use of the income of the Diocesan Funds, which were thus released to pay diocesan assessments. What arrangements have since been made with the dioceses which did not get into the system under these provisions we do not know. But there were sixty-seven dioceses and missionary districts, nearly all small and poor, which had no Diocesan Relief Funds at all, or had merged them with the General Clergy Relief Fund. Their pensioners were wholly dependent upon the General Clergy Relief and received only what that Fund could grant them. As a rule, we believe, they received about $300 a year as a maximum. It is for these that we have ventured to plead, on the following grounds.

3. The pensioners within the purview of the Church Pension Fund fall under three classes, namely:

A. The old pensioners, retired before March 1, 1917, with their widows and orphans; who were promised their former pensions.

B. The present pensioners, retired after March 1, 1917; who were promised so much from the "accrued liabilities" fund as, in addition to the pension purchased by assessments made for them during the remainder of their active ministry, would produce a minimum pension of $600 per annum, with a proportionate benefit for their widows and orphans.

C. The future pensioners, ordained after March 1, 1917, whose pensions will be fully provided for by assessments.

4. To meet the obligations assumed by the Pension Fund for classes A. and B. the Church was asked to contribute an Initial Reserve Fund of Five Million Dollars, with a few thousand dollars additional to meet interest on deferred payments, and was assured that this sum would be sufficient to meet all these obligations. With class C. the Initial Reserve had nothing to do. It was expressly stated that when all liabilities accrued for the clergy already in service had been met this Reserve Fund would be entirely exhausted.

5. But the Church, in its generosity toward these clergy of classes A. and B., whom alone they had in mind, gave nearly $4,000,000 more than was asked for or was necessary to meet these minimum obligations. The managers of the Pension Fund have never claimed or acknowledged that they made an underestimate when they said that the $5,000,000 asked for was sufficient for this purpose. After waiting for many months the Church naturally wanted to know, What are you going to do with the large surplus which we gave you in trust for the benefit of our pensioners? Mr. Sayre answers for the managers, with quite a flourish of trumpets, that two millions of it is "segregated" to meet the old grants of the General Clergy Relief Fund, and another million to meet those of the Diocesan Funds which they assumed. "The Church Pension Fund Trustees," he says, "have thus devoted three million dollars ($3,000,000) to make sure that the beneficiaries of the General Clergy Relief Fund and of the merged diocesan funds receive throughout their lives the grants that have been pledged to them." All of which, as an answer to the above question, is camouflage which would not deceive a child. For what then has become of the original

$5,000,000 which we were told was sufficient for these and all other obligations? What would have happened if we had not given the surplus of nearly $4,000,000? "Setting apart" this surplus for this or that temporary purpose already provided for is at most a mere detail of bookkeeping. It is there in your hands, no matter on what page of the ledger it is entered, and when all the grants of the old Relief Funds have been paid and their beneficiaries are dead it will still be there. All, or within a fraction of all, that for convenience may have been borrowed from this surplus will have been repaid. "Then," we are told, "it shall be expended according to the intention of the donors." But how can it be so expended when a large proportion of those for whom the donors intended it, all of class A. and very many of class B., will be dead? Why not expend it now, while they are alive and have such great need of it? But Mr. Sayre gives the whole case away when he tells us that after these great sums have been "set apart as a guarantee" for this or that, and "segregated" and "devoted" and "transferred" back and forth and otherwise juggled with for nearly a generation, "The $3,000,000 will then constitute a reserve in the hands of the Trustees, the income (italics ours) of which will then be used to extend the benefits of the Pension System to the clergy and their families."

We submit that this is distinctly not what the donors intended. No use to which this money could be put would be further from their intentions. They meant it to be used, and were promised that it should be used, for the benefit of the clergy now in orders, especially those who had retired or were nearing the age of retirement, and not to build up a permanent reserve fund for which there is no need and never will be any need.

6. We think we have shown that the old pensioners, those of class A., were not excluded from participation in the Initial Reserve Fund. Logically they must have been included, or there would have been no resources from which to meet a large part of the obligations assumed on their behalf; and certainly they were included in the intentions of very many of the contributors to the Fund. We have directly addressed the Pension Fund and asked to be corrected if our view in this matter is wrong, and have received no intimation to that effect. Therefore we have pleaded, and still plead, that out of the abundant means provided by the Church and entrusted to this, now, only pension agency that they have, something be added to the former pensions granted to the beneficiaries of the General Clergy Relief Fund, especially those who were dependent upon this Fund alone. We believe that even if there is no legal obligation resting upon the Pension Fund to do this, there is the strongest kind of a moral obligation. To limit their poor meed of relief to the bare number of dollars assured to them two or more years ago, when a dollar was worth nearly twice as much in purchasing power as it is now, would in any case be to "keep the promise to the ear and break it to the hope." To do so when millions of dollars are available for their more adequate support is to ignore every consideration of justice and suppress every instinct of charity.

7. We have insisted that the "General Convention of 1907 Fund," collected by Dr. Wilkins and his associates, be used as was intended by its donors for "Automatic Pensions at Sixty-four." By withholding the interest on this fund the Pension Fund is depriving many of the old pensioners of Class A, as well as others, of a part of the former pensions promised them.

These are the chief points which the Southern Churchman has maintained and urged. In doing so we have found ourselves speaking for a large number of clergymen and laymen of the Church, some in obscure places and others of the first prominence, who have written to us expressing their unqualified indorsement of every thing we have said. In addition to these there are, as we have opportunity of knowing, an untold number of silent but very indignant contributors to the Reserve Fund who feel that the money they gave is being withheld from those for whom it was intended and is to be used for building up a wealthy financial corporation for the benefit of future generations.

We regret that we have been thought by some of our friends to be antagonistic towards the Church Pension Fund. From its inception we have been its consistent supporter and advocate, and have urged its claims upon every occasion. But it has been with pain and apprehension that we have noted certain features in the conduct of its office and the apparent policy of its managers since the great Reserve Fund came safely into their hands, which have seemed to us calculated to undermine the confidence and alienate the sympathy of the Church. Shall the Church Pension Fund be a proper Church institution, controlled by that Christian spirit of sympathy and service which animates the Church, or shall it sink into a narrow, cold-blooded, money-grabbing, Wall Street corporation, without feeling or conscience, bent only on the accumulation of large funds, which is utterly foreign to the Church's true mind and sentiment? Not only the parsimonious course now being pursued toward the older clergy but many other facts which have come to our knowledge indicate that the latter description fits the policy which has been adopted, not, we believe, by its widely scattered Trustees, but by its Secretary and, unconsciously perhaps, by its smaller Board of Managers. In the name of the Church we would protest against it, and demand a more liberal, open and aboveboard method in conducting the Church's business and a far more considerate and sympathetic treatment of those whose interests have, by her, been committed to their keeping.

The Mount of Vision. Being a Study of Life in Terms of the Whole. By Charles H. Brent, Bishop of the Philippine Islands. With an Introduction by the Bishop of London. New York. Longmans, Green & Co. 1918. Pp. 160. $1.25.

The Bishop of London wisely congratulates himself on having gotten Bishop Brent to write his Lenten book for this year. We have as a result a fine example of the author's high idealism in a grave and thoughtful endeavor to throw light on the conditions of life today, which are, at last, but the conditions of life every day if only we understood them. Times of stress and danger clarify the spiritual eyesight, as he conceives, and are themselves the Mounts of Vision from which the clearest and truest views of God and life are to be had. He is searching for the ideal of harmony and completeness in life and finds it, of course, in the character of God; but especially in what he holds to be the groundwork of God's character—the Cross. "This leading idea, unlimited in suggestiveness, is developed, illustrated and confirmed in the earlier chapters, and applied to various aspects of the conditions and duties of living, both social and personal. The book is Bishop Brent at his best in thought and at his worst in style. But it is full of ideas which will be new to most of his readers and excellent starting points for long and fruitful trains of thought. It abounds in matter that should be useful for homiletic development.

Social Problems and Christian Ideals. Short Papers on Points of Importance in the Reconstruction of Society on Christian Lines. Edited by the Rev. E. S. Wesley, M. A., and the Rev. J. R. Darbyshire, M. A.; With a Foreword by the Bishop of Liverpool. Longmans, Green & Co. Pp. 139. $1.00.

These papers are the substance of reports made by selected writers, social or Church workers of the city of Liverpool, at the invitation of a Committee for the study of national and social issues in connection with the "National Mission of Repentance and Hope." They cover a wide range, dealing with the ideals, the problems, the obstacles of social welfare; and are short, terse and practical, discussing concrete evils and their cure from the viewpoint and experience of persons actually grappling with them. The problems are those which exist in all great cities; and in smaller communities as well, and persons everywhere who are interested in the bettering of social conditions or the study of them will find it valuable and full of practical suggestion.

Religious Training in the School and Home. A Manual for Teachers and Parents. By E. Hershey Sneath, Ph. D., LL. D., Professor, Yale University; George Hodges, D. D., D. C. L., Dean, Episcopal Theological School, Cambridge; Henry H. Tweedy, M. A., Professor, Yale University. New York. The Macmillan Company. 1917. Pp. 326. $1.50.

When three authors of such prominence and ability unite in writing, not merely compiling, a substantial work on a subject of such prime importance, it ought to be worth careful study at the hands of those for whom it is intended. After several introductory chapters on the importance, and aim and method of religious training, there follow the application of the principles laid down in connection with the bodily, the intellectual, the social and other aspects of the life of the child. The book is not a theoretical discussion or a treatise on pedagogics, but a practical handbook and guide, which many a mother would find to be an excellent investment both for herself and for the little ones for whose training she feels so heavy a weight of responsibility. To all such, as well as to all conscientious teachers, we recommend it very earnestly. To find that others have studied their small but perplexing problems from every viewpoint, even down to the stories the children should read and how they should play and learn their lessons, and that the result of very wide experience and investigation are at their command, will be a revelation to many parents and induce them to take their responsibilities more seriously.

The Life of Robert E. Lee. For Boys and Girls. By J. G. de Rouillac Hamilton and Mary Thompson Hamilton. Illustrated. Boston and New York. Houghton, Mifflin Company. Pp. 220. $1.25 net.

An important element in the training of children, and one of which parents are frequently neglectful, lies in the selection of books provided for their reading and of heroes suggested for their admiration. The former are frequently left to chance, the latter are supplied by the sporting pages of the newspapers or the screen of the moving picture. For both of these the book before us is an admirable alternative. It is written with a special view of these times when the highest ideals of Americanism are sought to be impressed upon the minds of the rising generation. No one has exemplified these like Lee, the greatest all-round character that illumines the pages of American history. The Life is written with the utmost fairness, and the facts presented in furnishing the setting for the scenes of Lee's career are those which have stood the test of candid examination from all sides. The beautiful and dominating religious character of the hero is sufficiently but not obtrusively presented. The character of Lee is one of the spiritual assets of the nation, and we hope this book will have the wide circulation which its subject as well as the treatment of it deserves.

The Bailey Twins, and the Rest of the Family. By Anna C. Chamberlain. Illustrated. Milwaukee. The Young Churchman Co. Pp. 240. $1.00.

Introducing an interesting pair of youngsters who found life anything but dull and did their best to make it lively for their betters. A clever and delightful book for children, not without its instructive features.

Religion and Social Service; a Diagnosis.

The Rev. Richard Wallace Hogue.

Now what has religion to do with such community work or social service? Absolutely nothing, if by religion is meant the cant of pious phrases, the presence of a proselyting sectarianism, the spirit of bigotry, the pressure of fear of the hereafter and the oppressive atmosphere of unnatural solemnity. Everything, if by religion is meant love, fellowship and brotherhood, the development of higher motives, purer hearts and finer character, dealing with the eternal verities of truth and faith and honor as well as with the external problems and needs, the rehabilitation of the spirit along with the upbuilding of the body; strengthening the foundation of hope, faith and courage while reconstructing the material and social superstructure.

We dare not close our eyes to the aspirations, the wants and the hopes of the life within as well as to the tremendous influence of the outward environment. Religion embraces life as well as living conditions, and any work of humanity that refuses to recognize this truth is only a half work, based on a half truth and will result in nothing better than a half success.

The French proverb tells us that we are all "like islands shouting at each other across seas of misunderstanding." This is undoubtedly true of many of our social workers and much of our institutional and religious work. Here is a class that pronounces with the dogmatic certainty of the self-righteous that "poverty and wrong arise out of the weakness and faults of individuals." From another class-ism comes back the angry shout that "Society is responsible for everything." Each is busy with its separate program and propaganda, while poverty and misery keep on increasing and will continue to do so until we embrace both the individual and society in the whole program of human betterment.

The same truth is needed in the relation and inter-relations of the material and spiritual. In other words, we have got to search out the full cause—search for the full truth—cost what it may to the individual and to society. Have we the honesty to admit and the courage to carry out such a policy? That is the one supreme question that must be answered by all who lay claim to the right to serve—by organized capital and organized labor, by individualist and socialist, by the materialist and the spiritual-minded, by the love-motivated social servant and the professional-minded social worker—by the comfortable classes in their privileges and the discomfited masses in their poverty.

Partisan reforms and passing phrases—these "have their little day"—but we shall "fight as one that beateth the air" unless we get together and stay together—though we meet, plan and work separately—in recognizing the constructive and inclusive spirit, the individual and the social causes, the material and the spiritual elements that go into the task of bringing in a better day and bringing out a better humanity than we found when we awoke to a sense of our responsibility.

In the last report of the Prisoners' Aid Association of Maryland there occurs this seemingly trifling item: Eyeglasses for prisoners, 143 pairs. Herein is a parable of the far-reaching importance of the many things to which slight heed is given by society (which means the average citizen in the aggregate).

There is an ex-convict living in Baltimore, whose seventeen years of crime and imprisonment had found first cause in poor eyesight. The parable of the unsuspected importance of apparently trivial things is vividly portrayed in his story, published in book form under the title, "Seventeen Years in the Underworld."

It is reported of John Knox that on seeing a criminal being carried to execution he exclaimed: "There goes John Knox but for the grace of God!" Certain it is that most of us who are classed as respectable and good would now be either much worse or worse off but for the grace of a good inheritance, a helpful environment, a fortunate turn of circumstances or other things for which we dare not claim original credit.

The first task, therefore, of those enlisted in Community Work is the "job" of fitting themselves for it—not merely in that overworked and over-estimated thing called efficiency, but in purpose and spirit—in short, in heart. There are too many so-called social service experts who substitute a text-book theory and a note-book treatment for that genuine fellowship which actually fills the heart and that passion for service which rests on a conviction of responsibility and not on a sense of professional interest.

"William" is a young fellow reared in a home of poverty and sacrifice, with little opportunity to indulge in the things a boy's nature craves. He loves books, is very silent about his unfulfilled wants and lends his life to the routine restraint and practical training which go to fit him to take his place with thousands of other young men in Baltimore, who are fastened to the typewriters, adding machines, counters and desks of the driving business world.

He is suddenly thrust into the midst of the things he has yearned for. He handles stocks, bonds, currency and checks as a child handles playthings—only they are not his. Before he gets his bearings, he is tempted beyond his unmaturing and unformed nature. It is just as easy to take much as little, and so William and twenty thousand dollars disappear. Nothing vicious or vile is done with the money. He buys some of the things which he sees others wearing and using and of which he has been deprived. He satisfies his craving to travel and see something of the world, as he sees employers and their sons do.

The inevitable happens. He is traced by detectives, brought back to Baltimore and faces the imprisonment which breaks or hardens the spirit and damns the future of so many. But right here the work begins of which this is the illustration; William's employer is an unusual Christian. He refuses to prosecute, and William is set free. But he is not free. His crime has barred him from employment, from society, from that sense of self-respect and self-confidence which are essential to any sort of success. These things must be restored to him and in him. Just how it was done is too long and too personal a story, but suffice it to say that William has passed creditably through the first year and a half of a great university and has been accepted into the navy.

Does any one doubt the value of such work as this? Whoever else may question or doubt it, the mother and father of William do not—nor does he. Multiply this instance many times and count the value to the future citizenship of the community. Reflect on the fact that the man who has found himself is worth more to himself and to society than the average fortunate and well-fed recipient of privilege or the commonplace specimen of contented mediocrity.

A VISIT TO CAMP LEWIS.

By Bishop Funsten.

Among all the cantonments there is probably not one whose situation is so unique as that of Camp Lewis. It is located about twenty miles away from Tacoma in a beautifully wooded country and with an unequalled climate. In my journey down from Tacoma I traversed a road which is one of the best samples of what is being done in highway building. The road took us away from the population of the great communities that border on Puget Sound. Indeed, this is one of the advantages of Camp Lewis, that its men are not subjected in such a large degree to the distracting influences and allurements of a great city. I understand that there are about 30,000 men in the camp and that there is the probability that before long provision will be made for 50,000. The local county government and business men, and perhaps also the State, have dedicated to the government about 60,000 acres on condition that it is made a permanent military training ground. The buildings are of a more substantial character than is usual, and it would seem to have every qualification to make it a very valuable and permanent part of our military establishment. The commanding general, General Green, is a man of distinguished ability and charming personality, and it is a great pleasure to know that he is an earnest Christian and communicant of our Church.

When I arrived in Tacoma I was met by the Rev. Herman Page, Jr., who has been appointed chaplain by the General War Commission of our Church. Although the weather was threatening and, in fact, occasional showers were falling, I got in the Ford runabout which the Commission has put at the service of Mr. Page, and we started on our journey to the camp. Mr. Page had to stop to take in a Canadian captain, who was going down to speak at the meeting of all the religious workers, which was to be held that morning. The captain proved a most interesting traveling companion and I was especially glad when I arrived at camp to be able to attend this meeting. It gave me an opportunity to note the personality represented in that especial department. I also heard an interesting address by a Y. M. C. A. secretary who had just come from the other side. One thing that impressed me about his address was his realization that the Y. M. C. A., excellent as was its work, could not under its present system do what it should in the spiritual field. He saw the need of earnest ministers who would administer the sacraments and emphasize the spiritual life as well as teach the simple truth of the gospel. He felt that sensible, earnest men ought to be sent by the various denominations to do this work, because a man without common sense would fail to accomplish what he is supposed to do. He felt that too often men got the idea of the Mohammedan that death in battle expiated all sin and they left out the thought of the necessity of repentance and the acceptance of the work of Christ.

The Canadian captain also gave a very stirring and humorous account of the religious work on the other side. He also emphasized the need of effective earnest chaplains, and while all recognize the value of the work of the Y. M. C. A., I was impressed with the tone of warning lest this great organization degenerate into a mere provision for the temporal needs of the men in camp. There were a good many other speeches by the various religious workers of the camp, and more than one confessed the great difficulty of the work, especially in the matter of reaching the men individually, or of having an opportunity of having them assemble in large numbers for religious instruction.

One thing impressed me quite forcefully, and that was the unity with which they worked and the apparent interest they took in having Good Friday and Easter services. They appointed a committee, of which Rev. Mr. Page was a member, to prepare suitable arrangements. I was very glad to be able to call on General Green. He was exceedingly gracious and expressed himself as most interested in all that pertained to the welfare of his men. He spoke of the desirability of having some inter-denominational co-operation, especially among the leading Protestant bodies, that would give them a building in which they might have apartments for the clergy that worked in the camp, and also a large, spacious chapel to promote their special work, it having been found that the halls of the Y. M. C. A. were not always available. The general is a West Pointer, and bears upon his person and in his point of view the indication of the splendid training of that great institution on the Hudson.

I went with Mr. Page to the large building erected by the Young Women's Christian Association as a hostess house, and I realized what a need is being supplied by this excellent organization. In fact, I do not see how its work could be dispensed with in Camp Lewis, because it furnished the only place where anyone could have an opportunity of getting entertainment even in the matter of getting food or meeting friends. I met a great many of my old acquaintances among the workers, and was very much pleased with the general outlook, both from the viewpoint of a citizen and religious worker. I must confess, however, that in the matter of religious work the thing that pleased me was rather the great opportunity presented to us of doing effective work than any sense of what had already been accomplished. The whole thing is so new and in such a fluid state that we must recognize that patience is one of the necessities of the situation. We must, however, not allow ourselves to be inert. Our chaplain, Mr. Page, is doing his work as well as anybody could, and a great deal better than many would under his conditions. He has no equipment, he has to deal with uncertainties and has to stay in Tacoma, twenty miles away. The Roman Catholic priest told me they had six priests at work there, and after looking over the situation I am convinced that our proper equipment would be one experienced and older man and two younger men, of whom Mr. Page should be one, as we could get no one any better to accomplish what he is doing so admirably.

I had a talk with Bishops Keator and Page, as well as with the Rev. Dr. Shaylor, of St. Marks, Seattle, and all of them realized that a work so vast and so important was beyond the financial power of our near by Diocese and missionary districts. We will have to look to the War Commission, appointed by the General Convention and representing the national Church, to meet effectively the religious needs of Camp Lewis. I came away impressed with the fact that the Church here has one of its greatest opportunities, and that to fail to meet it will mean a loss of mission and self-respect. This great war terrible as it is, is one of those flood-like periods of breaking up of existing things, and while it is on one side most destructive, on the other it affords an opportunity of rebuilding on better and more spiritual lines our national and individual life, which we all recognize has become too materialistic. Let us be awake to our opportunity and let us meet our responsibility at Camp Lewis and every camp where there are thousands of young men who are about to go forth to give their lives if necessary to maintain the freedom of the world. Surely it would be a very narrow and worldly conception of freedom if we think only of political liberty and worldly comforts, and forget to lead these young men to a vision of Him who came to bring that truth which if a man accepts will make him free indeed.

Manpower and Morality.

The Rev. Thomas C. Marshall.

One of the shocks of the war is the discovery of the large and disastrous part that vice and its attendant diseases play in army, navy and civilian life. It is startling to read the statements published by boards of health and other authorities, military as well as medical.

Oster puts one of the diseases attendant upon vice next to tuberculosis, pneumonia and cancer as a death dealing agency. Secretary Daniels says:

"There is not an army in the field whose effectiveness is not reduced by reason of immoral disease. The navy suffers likewise and business halts because these diseases destroy the manhood of workmen and fighters. During the last statistical year, men of the American Navy lost 141,378 days' sickness from a small group of absolutely preventable diseases, or rather diseases contracted by sin. This means that every day throughout the year there were 456 men disabled by this disgraceful malady. Add to that number those required to care for the disabled, and we have enough men on the non-effective list to man a modern battleship." Secretary Daniels, address Chicago, October 21, 1917.

A Canadian military authority says of this disease: "Its ravages today are more terrible for Britain and Canada than Vimy Ridge and Somme and Lens." General Gorgas says of it: "The greatest single cause of disability in the army today."

We had supposed that the dangers of war were wounds, the shot and shell of the enemy, bombs and submarines; now we learn that the greatest perils are moral ones, that we have to fear for our boys not an enemy that can kill the body, and after that has no more that he can do, but one that is able to destroy both soul and body in Gehenna.

The discovery is sickening and discouraging to the last degree, and now that the term "soldiers" means no longer strangers, professional fighters who have chosen warfare as their preferred occupation, but the young men of our own communities, ours and our neighbors' boys, the young men whose names fill the honor rolls in our churches and Sunday schools, the horror and the gravity of the situation are brought home to us with terrific force.

The one element of encouragement in the situation is the official as well as general recognition of the responsibility of the nation for the moral as well as the physical protection of the boys called from their homes into the service of their country, and of the possibility of attaining to higher standards both in the personal morality and in the social environment of the men of the Army and the Navy.

Certain points of dispute that for years have been battle-grounds in the campaign of social advance are now conceded officially to have been settled in favor of the advocates of uncompromising morality. Under the exacting demand of efficiency the ideal way has been found to be also the practical. Thus a great gain has been made for the interests not only of the Army and the Navy, but of society in general.

The battle against the attempted control of vice by restriction or regulation may be said to have been won. Segregation has been tried out and is being discarded. By the creation of the five-mile districts around camps and the demand for the obliteration of vice districts in towns adjoining camps, the government has reversed policies of the past. What is practically the verdict of social workers and of the best public opinion is well stated by Colonel Roosevelt in a telegram sent last summer to Bishop Thomas: "I emphatically disbelieve in it and disapprove of the creation of a segregated district. My experience as police commissioner and the studies I then made of the matter of handling the social evil convinced me that to segregate and thereby give it recognition and a half approval worked viciously."

The futility and the folly, even from the mere efficiency point of view, of trying to control this evil by medical inspection and treatment, without attacking the root causes, is being recognized by army officials. General Gorgas, speaking before the American Public Health Conference in Washington in October, said in substance: "The campaign against yellow fever had for this later campaign against venereal disease an important analogy. For even after they knew surely that the mosquito carried yellow fever, they thought they were doing much when they screened the houses. But the mosquitoes still got in and cases of yellow fever still occurred. And then they went for the mosquito swamps and breeding places, to the amazement and the incredulity of not a few people. And presently the cases stopped. So in the instance of immoral disease don't stop at 'screening,' go after the 'mosquitoes'; depend upon not remedial measures only, but upon education, public opinion and moral reform." "Go after the mosquitoes" represents a new standard in army morals.

The demand for a single standard of personal morality is being greatly enforced. Secretary Daniels, speaking to the Clinical Congress of Surgeons of North America in Chicago in October, said: "We know now by the testimony of science that there is no foundation for a double standard for the sexes. To preach it is to preach immorality and a lowering of manhood. The remedy? There is but one, continence. It must be preached in the home, in the school, in the marts of trade, in the pulpit, and in military camps and among shipmates afloat." Such doctrine from the head of the Navy marks a long step forward and must have a marked and wholesome effect upon the young manhood of the nation.

A new valuation is being affixed to those influences that can come only from the churches and the Christian public, the influences that make for the building and the preservation of personal character. The fortifying of the young people against temptation, through the Sunday schools and the influence of the Christian home; the preservation of the contacts between the churches and the young men who are going out from our communities; the surrounding of them in their camps with religious and moral influences, through the work of the Y. M. C. A., the Brotherhood of St. Andrew, the regular and special chaplains, the Church War Commission; all these as practical methods of moral conservation take on a new importance and indicate the lines in which the great strength of the churches can be exerted with distinctive and telling effect.

COMMISSIONER OF EDUCATION CALLS FOR RELIGIOUS IN- STRUCTION.

Dr. John H. Finley, Commissioner of Education for the State of New York, has emphasized the need of the Church teaching religion in close connection with the public school, and has proposed certain definite methods.

Dr. Finley's proposal is almost a challenge. It should be considered as a war-time responsibility, for the connection between the successful carrying on of the war and the work in public education is most direct. The war is for ideals, but factories, shops and commerce are calling, and boys and girls are quitting school, neglecting education and forgetting religion, the only enduring foundations for ideals of justice and righteousness.

Dr. Finley's proposals do not seek to establish any sectarian teaching in the schools. He says:

"A State giving welcome to all creeds, cannot in its public schools, which it taxes all to support and which it wishes the children of all to enter, impose any religious teaching without contravening the very principle of freedom that is at the foundation of this republic of diverse traditions, tongues and creeds."

But this does not prevent Dr. Finley from seeing the need of religious instruction. This is his position:

"With our varying creeds the religious teacher may not come with his or her particular creed into the school, but that should not prevent a co-operation between school and Church or between school and home which will insure the religious teaching of every child outside the school. The time has come for Protestant and Catholic and Jew and Gentile to co-operate to the end that every child may have his moral and religious inheritance."

"Some practical way for this co-operation we must find. We must not in this democracy assort our children by creeds. We must bring them together so far as we can in the study of those elements essential to the maintenance of a democracy, but we must find a way to see that every child does have outside the school in this land of freedom of worship, that for which many of our ancestors came to it, the thing which makes freedom of worship worth having."

Dr. Finley proposes the three following methods by which religious instruction may be co-ordinated with the public schools:

1. The preparation of a book of selections from the Bible by an Inter-denominational Commission appointed by the Legislature or by the Board of Regents, for use in the schools.

2. The formulation of a plan for non-proselyting co-operation between the school and the various denominations to the end that every child may have its democratical and its religious instruction.

3. The granting of Regents credits for serious work in Bible study outside of the schools.

No. 1 has been discussed frequently, but many are convinced that the reading of selections from the Bible gives the child only a portion of his religious inheritance.

No. 2 has passed beyond the experimental stage. In Gary, Ind., the General Board of Religious Education has maintained a religious day school with a salaried teacher for three years. This school has co-operated with the public school so effectively that Mr. William Wirt, the superintendent of the Gary school, writes:

"We believe that the Church school in Christ Church parish, Gary, is increasing in value each year and that it is a most important form of co-operation with the public schools."

No. 3 has been in operation successfully for several years in North Dakota, Colorado, Texas, Indiana, Michigan and other States.

In order that the Church may respond to public school leaders, the General Board made provision in its War-Time Education Fund of $45,000 for one or more persons to become expert in this new and important enterprise. These educational workers would be at the call of Bishops and rectors in the many communities that are preparing to act on this most important subject.

To-day not only armies, but peoples and nations are at war. Such a war can only be maintained by the minds and will of the people. In a democracy the training of the mind and the will of the youth exercises a quickening influence on the total national life. In the near future the work done in our churches and public schools to-day in leading our boys and girls to save and sacrifice, to study and train, may provide the balance of power that will win the victory in the critical hours of 1920 and 1921.

Subscriptions for the War-Time Education Fund of $45,000 should be sent to Harper Sibley, Chairman of the Finance Committee, 100 Sibley Block, Rochester, N. Y.

The Great Commission

A Recruit in the Peking Language
School.

A missionary's first year in China is almost invariably spent in constantly studying a baffling language. Its delicate shadings and sounds and complicated inflections put a heavy strain upon the ear and upon one's vocal cords. The written language is really a picture language, since there is no alphabet and every character stands for an idea. This makes it largely a matter of memory.

One of the recruits in the Hankow Mission who went to the Hankow District last summer and is now studying in Peking, writes:

"The methods used in these language schools are wonderful. Even my dull brain can grasp a few Chinese sentences already.

"Our language study begins at 8:45 A. M. and lasts until 3:30 P. M., with an hour for noon recess. We alternate from class to private teacher all day. The first period we are given the new words for the day, during which time our teachers sit in the back of the room busily taking notes. Then we disperse either into small class groups or into our private studies, where this new work is repeated until we understand it, and are able to construct sentences on it.

"Not a word of English is used, so if we don't understand the meaning of the word in one use, it is tried in another, and sometimes we may spend two days trying to get one word. We are not permitted to take notes nor consult with others in class about the words, and the first three months we are not permitted to use a text-book of any kind nor to know any characters. The object is to get us to speak as early as possible, and it is wonderful how soon we do speak.

"We also have a splendid course in phonetics during the first term, which helps us in learning how to get correct Chinese sounds. I am glad I did not spend any time in studying this subject last year, because this one has given me more help than I could possibly have had in New York. We have the Chinese with us to test conclusions drawn, which we would not have found in America.

"We are supposed to gain a vocabulary of one thousand words by June, which will be a splendid beginning.

"The Anglicans are doing such splendid work in Peking—under adverse circumstances at present on account of the war.

"We are constantly reminded of descriptions in the Bible here in Peking. Camels and donkeys are the usual beasts of burden, next to man. Then the water carriers and trades carried on the streets are decidedly Eastern. We are not near enough the coast to become foreignized here, so it is a delightful Chinese city. The legations are here, but no concessions—so the majority of the foreigners are missionaries or in the employ of some government."

Bishop Rowe Has Sailed for Alaska: He expects to make a trip into the interior from Cordova, going as far as Tanana Crossing, to visit the Indian Missions in that most isolated section. This trip is made at the urgent request of the Rev. F. B. Drane, missionary in charge of the Tanana Valley Mission, who writes him that the Indians have been eagerly anticipating his visit.

This journey will prevent Bishop Rowe from attending the special meeting of the House of Bishops in New York on April 10th.

The biggest business in the world is Christianity building the Kingdom of God. A recent writer in the World Outlook shows that Foreign Missions is the biggest business in the world. It was slow in starting, and at first gave small promise of universal conquest. Carey worked in India seven years before he made a convert, and Moffat in Bechuanaland eleven years to score the same result. It took fifty years in China to win the first fifty converts, and throughout the world it took ninety years to win the first million adherents, and twenty-three years to win the second million. But converts are now being added at the rate of a million in twelve years. Five thousand converts a month are now being gained in India, and three thousand a week in Korea. An army of nearly fifty thousand missionaries is employed. The annual amount spent by all the Mission Boards, including Protestant, Catholic and private agencies, is not far from $100,000,000. The cost of administration in all this vast enterprise is only about eight per cent. Some boards do even better. Besides the making of converts, Foreign Missions maintain thirty thousand schools, have one and a half million students under instruction at the present time, and give four million medical treatments a year. This is big business even from a financial point of view, but when viewed in its moral and spiritual significance, it is immeasurably the biggest business. Great things tend to impart to us some of their own greatness, and small things tend to make us small. If we throw ourselves into this world business and divine enterprise, it will lift us out of our little lives, out of our ruts and holes and little aches and complaints, which are largely subjective and would disappear if we would only forget them, into a large horizon and vast dome, into the life and energy, beauty and blessedness of God.—The Presbyterian Banner.

Church Intelligence

APPEAL TO THE HOUSE OF BISHOPS OF THE PROTESTANT EPISCOPAL CHURCH.

Dr. Newman Smyth Presents a Plea for Definite Leadership and Action.

Following the address to all the Christian churches, issued some weeks ago and signed by representatives of nine denominations, a paper signed by Dr. Newman Smyth and Williston Walker has been addressed to the House of Bishops, which is to assemble in New York on April 10. Welcoming this opportunity to address the American Episcopate in a body, they call attention to two features of the present situation so far as concerns the divided Christian Church; namely, the awakened spirit of unity, which requires embodiment lest it evaporate, and the lessening influence of the organized Church; and continue:

"These two prospects, either of triumph through united action or of tragic loss through divided counsels now lie before the churches; and between these two the decision must be made. At the forefront, therefore of our communication to your Episcopate we would put the paramount obligation of the churches to lift up above all, and at the cost of any ecclesiastical sacrifices, the Church of God as the visible embodiment in power of Christianity.

For this cause, deeming a definite answer urgent, we welcome the opportunity, which the responsive invitation of your Presiding Bishop affords us, of laying before the House of Bishops this appeal to our fellow-believers in all the churches for some act of unity.

We may ask for our communication your especial consideration because we must recognize the fact which we all alike deplore, that the inherited division between the Episcopal ministry and the ministries of other communions is one chief obstacle to the reunion of the churches of the Protestant Reformation. We do so the more hopefully because from all sides, of late, increasing efforts are made and common prayers offered for the removal from Christianity of the reproach of disunity. We welcome the co-operation in work which is attained by the Federal Council of Churches and through the efforts of War Commissions of the several churches; but we cannot hide from ourselves the fact that such co-operation, however successful, does not reach down to, or remove the fundamental cause and evil of our continued separation as churches. Moreover we earnestly desire to receive from you some more definite indication of what overtures and actual approaches towards unity in the ministry and the worship of the Church may be deemed in your Christian judgment now possible and desirable, that we may judge better what on our part should be contributed to this common end.

We do not seek immediately any proposals involving material changes in existing ecclesiastical polities, which might require considerable postponement for their consideration and adoption by different ecclesiastical bodies. However desirable such overtures for more leisurely consideration may be, the present crisis calls for definite measures of prompt and practical co-ordination of the forces and the resources of the Church."

The paper goes on to suggest "Acts of Unity Which May Now be Possible," stressing the possibility of Episcopal ordination being conferred upon non-Episcopal chaplains and others engaged in war service among men of all ecclesiastical affiliations; believing that such an act on the part of our Church might prove a precipitant which would crystallize the whole situation. The whole paper is written in the most admirable spirit, and cannot fail of having weight in the counsels of our Bishops.

By the action of the Board Gifts for Churches, Rectories and Parish Houses are now available, the scope of the work of the Board having been enlarged by permission of the Supreme Court of the State of New York.

The Church and Industrial Centers of the Future.

Churches report twelve centres wherein exceptional war work is to lead to tremendous demands for new houses and consequent demands for churches and settlement and recreation houses. According to the Church authorities, the greatest centre that is to come into existence in the immediate future is the Delaware River, with its bay, which is to surpass anything the world has yet known, the Clyde not excepted. The next is Newark and its bay. Six of the other centres are in Pennsylvania—Erie on the lake of the same name, Bethlehem and Allentown in the steel region, Coatesville and Elizabeth, not far from Philadelphia, and Johnstown, famous for its flood of some years ago. The remaining three centres are Bridgeport, Conn., Akron, Ohio, and Charleston, W. Va. Were the war to end at once the assertion obtains that ten years at least will be required to rebuild and remake the losses of the war.

Studies are being entered into by various religious bodies to meet these new needs with churches, well located and such division of types as will neither overlook or overlap. Settlement houses and recreation centres are parts of the plan. Attention is to be given to the training of ministers and lay workers to meet these unusual demands. Co-operation is being had with commercial bodies, and the Sunday school associations and various brotherhoods are being brought into the plans. Shipbuilding, air planes, chemicals, rubber, motor parts and steel are to be the basic products of these centres, and it is said that houses must be up to date else workmen will not stay. Almost all of the workmen expected in these vast plants have families.

Demand for Bibles: Makers of Bibles are selling their product faster than they can print and bind it, and yet express their conviction that American people are no more religious than usual. Publishers in Chicago, St. Louis and even San Francisco are applying to the American Bible Society, the Oxford Press and everybody else whom they think may possess them, for plates of the New Testament. One firm that neglected to destroy King James' version plates when Revised Version plates were made, and everybody supposed the King James was supplanted forever, has been able to dig out, duplicate and sell the old plates, so that from one Middle West publishing house King James' version of the New Testament is appearing. It is estimated that the usual sales of New Testaments has doubled at least over the same date last year.

Prices charged for these Testaments have advanced 60 to 70 per cent., owing to high cost of labor and materials, and yet profits are said to be considerable to the Bible makers. Where New Testaments are made by missionary agencies profits if any are going into Christian work. In other cases they go to private bank accounts. The reason for the big advance is that parents of boys going to France are rushing to book sellers, buying New Testaments, and presenting them to their enlisted men. Publishers say that some parents buying them may read them, as they did not before, but they are by no means sure they are, judging by the manner and method of the transaction governing the New Testament market. To some extent religious books have jumped in sales, but New Testaments leads all others five to one.

Armenian and Syrian Relief: The American Committee, Cleveland H. Dodge, Treasurer, No. 1 Madison Avenue, New York, announces contributions for the week ending March 26 of $309,845.09. Acknowledgments received show that money recently cabled to Persia, Palestine and different parts of the Turkish Empire has reached its destination and that the work of relief goes forward without interruption. At Teheran about twenty thousand are being supplied with food, and large numbers in neighboring cities where the appalling destitution still continues.

WASHINGTON.

Rt. Rev. A. Harding, D. D., Bishop

The Archbishop's Visit: The Most Rev. Cosmo Gordon Lang, Archbishop of York, was in Washington on Easter Day, preaching in the morning at the Cathedral, in the afternoon at St. John's Church, and in the evening at the Church of the Epiphany. Overflowing congregations greeted him at every service, including many distinguished officials from all branches of the government. In his sermon in the evening the Archbishop said:

"There came the element, the first and faint element of division and discussion, dispute and doubt, and then it was, at this time, that this great nation arose and said, in words spoken from this city, words so clear, so noble, so redolent of a proud faith that all the world must needs hear and harken.

"These things are so absolutely at stake and so vital to the future of the new world as of the old that we will forsake all our past traditions, abandon our prized security and cross the ocean and make the struggle of the free peoples of Europe our own.

"For that vindication of our faith, for that refreshing in the time of strain and of struggle, these nations and my own among them will never cease to thank the President of the United States for the unity with which they flocked to the standard thus set up in their midst."

 "The power inherent in the resurrection is peculiarly needed at this time of titanic battle which has now raged eight days. Since coming to America I have been deeply impressed with the stir of desire, unmistakably evident in your people, to play a major part in the struggle. The soldiers now fighting for us demand more from us than mere admiration. They ask a full measure of moral support and all which that implies."

Trinity Church Portsmouth.

A very large and interested congregation assembled last night in old Trinity Church to take part in the ceremonies attending the unfurling of the service flag of that church. The rector, the Rev. Newton Middleton, read the service and the Rt. Rev. Arthur C. Thomson preached the sermon. Immediately before the sermon the rector read the names of forty-six men connected with Trinity Church and now in the army or navy. The service was marked by an earnestness which impressed all who attended, and the music by Trinity choir was rendered with a spirit that added greatly to the occasion.

On Sunday night, March 24, the rector presented a class of fifteen persons for confirmation to the Rt. Rev. A. C. Thomson, D. D.

Beginning with the first Sunday in February, the Rev. Newton Middleton, in addition to his regular work at Trinity, assumed duty as rector of All Saints, a church in the suburb, Park View, of Portsmouth, and is doing a very encouraging work there.

Holy Trinity and St. George's Churches, Accomac County, have sent their rector, the Rev. Frank A. Ridout, to take part as their representative in the great work of the Y. M. C. A. among our fighting forces. They have given him leave of absence, with full pay, and stand ready to do all they can to make his work effective, and to hold the two congregations together so that no present organized work of their own shall suffer. Mr. Ridout leaves immediately to take up this work.

Rt. Rev. R. A. Gibson, D. D., Bishop.
Rt. Rev. W. C. Brown, D. D., Coadjutor

The vestry of St. Paul's Church, Hanover, Va., have adopted these resolutions:

Whereas, the Rev. William Byrd Lee, Jr., has tendered his resignation as rector of this parish, to take effect January 1, 1918, in order to serve his country with the 'War Work' Council in France, and, whereas, after due consideration it is deemed impracticable to grant Mr. Lee a leave of absence, as is customary in such cases, and as this vestry would much prefer;

Be it resolved, That it is with the greatest regret that the resignation of Mr. Lee be and the same is hereby accepted. In accepting the resignation of Mr. Lee the vestry desires to express its appreciation of the splendid work done by him in this parish.

In June, 1914, Mr. Lee came to the parish as a student. From June, 1915, to June, 1916, he had charge of the parish as a deacon, under the direction of the Bishop. In the summer of 1916 he accepted a call as rector. At this time Emanuel and St. Paul's Church were receiving $300 each year from the Diocesan Missionary Society to enable them to meet the minister's salary. Now, these churches are entirely independent of any outside aid, and are large contributors to missions. In fact, St. Paul's Church overpays its apportionment more largely, proportionately, than any church in the Diocese.

Aside from this great improvement in the financial condition of the parish, Mr. Lee has left behind him a considerable increase in membership and a new standard of earnestness and Christian manhood.

While we realize the loss and sacrifice in parting with this splendid young minister, we appreciate his patriotic spirit and desire to serve his country in a larger field, and are proud to have such a representative on the fields of France.

R. C. TAYLOR, Registrar.

St. John's Church, Richmond, the Rev. H. W. Sublett, rector, was presented on Palm Sunday with a pair of brass flower vases and brackets. These were given by friends in the church in loving memory of Mrs. Relee Mountcastle Schmidt, who was an active member for a number of years in church and Sunday school work.

Bishop Gibson, owing to sickness, was unable to keep his appointments on Easter Day, and will visit St. Andrew's Church, Richmond, on April 14, and St. Thomas' Church, Ginter Park, on April 21.

The Rev. S. S. Ware, rector of St. Peter's Church, Port Royal, has tendered his resignation to his vestry to take effect April 30. Mr. Ware will retire on account of disability. The vestry have accepted his resignation, but earnestly request him to continue such services as he may be able to give to the parish.

The Rev. Alexander Galt, rector of Christ Church, Brandy, has resigned to accept a call to his former parish, St. Margarets, near Annapolis, Md. The vestry of Christ Church have asked the Rev. H. B. Lee, D. D., of Charlottesville, to take charge of their parish as locum tenens, and he has consented.

In St. Stephen's Church, Culpeper, on Good Friday afternoon a community service was held for the fourth year. The congregation which filled the church was representative of all the congregations in the town. A brief service of worship gave opportunity for united prayers for our nation, government, soldiers, sailors, aviators, religious, benevolent and medical workers and helpers, those in special peril and dying, and our enemies. Addresses were made by the five ministers in the town, under Episcopal license, on Sacrifice, Its Nature, Christ's in Life, In His Death, the Disciples and the Secret of Winning Sacrifice. The usual service was held in the morning.

Bequest to a Church: The late Harris I. Chilton, of West Philadelphia, has left, by will, the sum of thirty thousand dollars to St. Bartholomew's Church, Baltimore, of which he was a member twenty-five years ago. Mr. Chilton died in Philadelphia on the 19th of last June, and was buried in Greenmount Cemetery, Baltimore, Rev. Edward H. Ingle, his former rector, officiating.

Dedication of Memorial Flag.

A service of unusual interest was held in the Church of the Advent, Spartanburg, S. C., on Sunday morning, March 17. The occasion was the presentation of a memorial flag by Mr. William H. Rowe and family, of Ossining, N. Y. On the 9th of December, 1917, Charles Watson Rowe, a member of Company I, 107th New York Infantry (the old 7th New York), died of pneumonia at the Base Hospital. The funeral service was conducted at the Church of the Advent by Major William E. McCord, Chaplain of the 107th Regiment, and Rev. W. H. K. Pendleton, Rector of the church. It was the first military funeral held in the church, and the interest and sympathy of the congregation were intense and manifested in many ways.

In recognition of this sympathy and kindness Mr. Rowe wished to present to the church a suitable memorial to his son, and gladly acquiesced in the suggestion of a flag, which is a large and handsome one. A plate attached to the staff bears the following inscription: "Presented to the Church of the Advent, in loving memory of Charles Watson Rowe, of Ossining, N. Y., private Co. I, 107th U. S. Infantry, December, 1917."

By order of the commanding general, certain members of Company I, including Corporal George Rowe, a brother of Charles Rowe, were excused from duty to attend the service. Major Mazet, in command of the 107th Regiment, was also present, with many other officers and enlisted men, and part of the regimental band.

Mr. Rowe desired that the service should be patriotic rather than sympathetic, and that it should constitute a call to other young men to serve the country for which his son had so early laid down his stainless life. This was the dominant note of the special service. Immediately after the lesson taken from the sixth chapter of the Epistle to the Ephesians, describing the Christian armor, the band played "The Lost Chord" with great effect.

The same bugler who had sounded "taps" over the young soldier's body stepped forward and sounded the call to the colors. In the stately building, accustomed to the quiet dignity of the service, the effect was thrilling. At the first note of the call, Corporal George Rowe appeared in the doorway bearing the flag. Reaching the chancel steps, he stood at attention. The band then played "The Star Spangled Banner," and the whole congregation, largely made up of soldiers, stood at attention. Rev. G. W. Harris, rector of Trinity Church, Ossining, N. Y., came forward, and in well chosen words, in behalf of the family of young Rowe, presented the flag to the church. The rector received the flag with appropriate reference to the meaning of the occasion, and while the congregation stood, dedicated the memorial in a brief service. The choir, supported by the band, united in the church's own hymn of rejoicing, the Te Deum, and the service, brief but full of meaning, was over.

In his address of presentation, and in the sermon which he preached, the Rev. Mr. Harris referred in touching terms to the young soldier who had been his parishioner, but always the dominant note was that of rejoicing in the very height and sacredness of the sacrifice that had been made. It is difficult to put into words the thrilling interest of this service. The meaning of it all was clear to the hearts of the people. To each one who had a son, a brother or a husband in the army, the service was sacred, binding together all hearts in a common service. The soldiers of Camp Wadsworth have long since been adopted by the people of Spartanburg as "our boys," and the high and sacred cause in which the nation has embarked binds all together in a deep and sympathetic fellowship. Mr. and Mrs. William H. Rowe were present, with their son, William H. Rowe, who, on account of physical disability, has been rejected for the army, but who has not yet relinquished hope of securing a place in the service. The beautiful flag will be displayed at every important service at the Church of the Advent in proud and grateful memory of the young soldier who gave his life for the great country which that flag represents.

Grace Church, Charleston: The vestry and congregation of this church have secured important amendments to their charter and constitution and by-laws, which bring the customs obtaining in this conservative old congregation into conformity to modern usage.

By virtue of the changes the rector becomes a member and chairman of the vestry, women pewholders are given the right of ballot and men are eligible for wardens and vestryman only if they are communicants. The recommendations were made by unanimous vote of the vestrymen, and only two votes of the congregation were recorded against it.

Church Building in the Diocese.

While there has been a general agreement not to press large church building undertakings in the Diocese at this time, some special plans are being carried out. The large and beautiful new Church of the Redeemer, at Morristown, is covered in and will be ready for use in a few months. The money for the building has been subscribed and subscriptions for an organ costing $15,000 are now being collected. Work upon the new rectory for Trinity Church, Arlington, has begun; the work upon a new parish house at Bergenfield, especially for the use of Camp Merritt, is now proceeding. A new rectory at Ampere has been secured and a disused armory at Montclair has been purchased to be made the home of Trinity Mission.

The Rev. Edgar E. Brooks, who has been in government service in western camps for some time, is stationed at Long Branch by the Government Commission on Training Camp Activities, the Fosdick Commission, for the oversight of institutional work in the forts and camps from Sandy Hook to Sea Girt.

The Rev. Howard W. Gernand has resigned the rectorship of Christ Church, Newark, to accept that of St. Stephen's, Millburn.

The Rev. J. Burnham Ashworth, of the Diocese of Easton, has taken charge of the church at Pompton; with the ministry in the section of the Diocese where the great powder works at Haskell has made a large increase in the population.

A notable confirmation of one hundred and seventeen persons was held at St. Matthew's Mission, Jersey City, on March 21, making two hundred and fifty persons presented by the Rev. William Martin, a graduate of Drew Seminary, within three years.

DALLAS.

Rt. Rev. A. C. Garrett, D. D., Bishop.
Rt. Rev. H. T. Moore, D. D., Coadjutor.

The Rev. J. H. Ellis, Archdeacon for the eastern part of the Diocese of Dallas, for five years ministering most faithfully at Greenville and a number of small places, has accepted St. John's Parish, Corsicand, and entered upon his new work April 1, 1918. Mr. Ellis came to us some five years since from the Diocese of Marquette.

Dean Randolph Ray, recently in charge of St. Matthew's Cathedral, Dallas, held daily services during Lent. The congregations were very good and the eloquent addresses of Dean Ray highly appreciated. The confirmation at the Cathedral was on Easter Day, in accordance with the custom of nearly fifty years. A new chapel (All Souls) has been provided for in the Cathedral. It is intended for Lenten and week-day services.

Vacancies Being Filled: Nearly all our important vacancies are being filled up with new young and active clergymen.

The Rev. Joseph Sherin, formerly of Massachusetts, but more recently of the Incarnation, Dallas, has returned to the Diocese, and is now rector of Christ Church, Oak Cliff, Dallas.

An Aged Communicant of the church, Mrs. W. J. Patterson, aged eighty-four, recently passed away. She was confirmed in 1861 by the saintly Bishop Gregg in Dallas. At that time there were only seven communicants there. She was a devout communicant and dearly beloved by all. The Rev. Charles Clingman, rector of the Church of the Incarnation, read the funeral service.

All Saints' Church, Dallas, has recently suffered the loss of a most devout communicant by death, Mr. Alex Sutherland.

The Rev. Edwin Wickens, founder of All Saints' Church, spent Palm Sunday with the people there, preached and celebrated Holy Communion. At night after service Bishop Moore confirmed a good class.

The Rev. A. W. S. Garden, the new secretary for the Seventh Department, visited St. Andrew's Church, Dallas, and preached for the rector, the Rev. J. C. Black. Mr. Garden starts out full of vigor in his new work.

Easter in New York.

New York saw in 1918 a serious but most delightful Easter. The weather was ideal in all respects. Great crowds filled the churches, all of them, and there were large Easter offerings, many of the big gifts for endowments. While Presbyterians and Methodists, Baptists and Reformed people are consolidating and giving up fields, there is grim determination everywhere in the downtown church parishes that advancement shall be made wherever possible, and that at least every inch of old ground shall be held. Hence the move to greater endowment and more extensive work.

Very little music that was new was heard in New York this Easter, for the reason that little is being brought from abroad, and churches and choirs are retrenching. But familiar music was never better sung. Easter flowers, scarce and high owing to the war and the lack of labor, were limited to potted plants, and the usual expense of $3,000 to $4,000 in some large churches was done away with. Decorations were restricted almost wholly to private gifts.

The Easter followed a Lent that was observed far beyond any other that New York ever knew. Presbyterian, Baptist and even Congregational churches announced and held Good Friday services at 11 o'clock—something New York never knew before. The great denominational preachers were heard in their own pulpits. One unusual church feature obtained at the Church of the Holy Communion, the Rev. Dr. Henry Motet, rector. The Rescue Missions, Salvation Army, War Camp Centres and even streets were canvassed in advance, and at half-past 8 the famous old downtown church was filled with all sorts and conditions of men. The plan is now to be followed by community service work.

The Archbishop of York, returning from a tour of the country, was welcomed back to New York by crowds. Everywhere are heard praises for the Archbishop's natural bearing, his splendid utterances and his country. On Maunday Thursday he spoke to Church clergy of the four Dioceses near to New York, together with some visitors from various parts of the country. Only clergy were admitted. The occasion was made possible by the Churchmen's Association, and the scene was St. Thomas' Church. On Good Friday the Archbishop conducted the three-hour service in Trinity Church, the number once more who were able to get in far exceeding the capacity of the famous church.

The Archbishop seemed depressed by the raging at the moment of the greatest military battle in human history, and yet he said he was cheered immeasurably by the optimism which he found to be entertained in America. He remarked that he had not realized to what depths of suffering England had sunk until he came here to drink in a different national life. He pleaded the cause of the Allies that troops be sent to France as rapidly as possible, without waiting for ships to convey food. He felt sure food and munitions can be provided by England and France.

The Rev. Dr. G. A. Carstensen, late rector of Christ Church, Riverdale, was instituted rector of Holyrood Church during Holy Week by Bishop Burch, succeeding there the late Rev. Dr. Stuart Crockett. At Easter there was used a new organ, or practically a new one, for it was the organ from old St. John's Chapel in Varick Street, rebuilt in every part. Through the generosity of Mrs. Crockett, and the devotion of Holyrood people, this parish is now splendidly equipped, and become one of the strong centres of Manhattan. It is the last but one of the Church parishes on the northern end of the island, the new Redeemer, still in the mission stage, being the very last. On Low Sunday is to be celebrated the twenty-fifth anniversary of the founding of the parish. Within the past few years membership and gifts of Holyrood have doubled, apart from gifts from the wife of the late rector.

The Rev. L. A. Edelblute, who is the new rector of Holy Apostles Parish on the West Side, comes from St. George's Mission at Williamsbridge, in the Bronx, where he has not only succeeded in local work, but from which he came to be one of the younger leaders in the Diocese. He has been especially interested in evangelistic work, with a good deal of attention to Sunday school work. Holy Apostles Parish was that of which Bishop Paddock was rector when elected by the House of Bishops to Eastern Oregon.

LONG ISLAND.

Rt. Rev. F. Burgess, D. D., Bishop.

The Social Service Commission of the Diocese, through the Rev. Dr. Robert Rogers, Chairman of the Sunday Observance Section, has memorialized the members of the State Legislature in regard to the danger of commercializing Sunday in the interest of business concerns and at the expense of the public welfare. The specious arguments of secular business which would deprive labor of its day of rest, and of the amusement business in various forms which seeks to be legalized in its violation of Sunday observance laws, are answered; and a strong plea made in behalf of working people for a strengthening rather than weakening of the laws on the subject. The memorial concludes:

"The Church has the duty of keeping the day holy by inciting the people to use the day for rest, worship, religious education and acts of unselfish kindness and brotherhood. But the State has the clear duty of protecting the day from covetous, avaricious and unbrotherly demands of business.

"As soul power is the most important asset which the United States has for the winning of the great war, we urge you to protect the American Sunday from the unholy greed of certain unscrupulous business interests."

HARRISBURG.

Rt. Rev. J. H. Darlington, D. D., Bishop.

Christ Church, Williamsport, the Rev. Charles N. Tyndell, rector, gave $1,235 for the War Commission Fund. It is also doing splendid work for city, State and nation, many of its members being extremely active on the various civic and national committees and commissions. In addition, there is a quickened spiritual life in the parish. The Bishop visited the church on the Fifth Sunday in Lent and confirmed a class of fifty-two.

WYOMING.

Rt. Rev. Nat. S. Thomas, D. D., Bishop.

General Pershings Name on Honor Roll.

The name of John J. Pershing is shown upon the Honor Roll of St. Mark's Church, Cheyenne, and a star has been placed upon the new service flag for General Pershing. The people of St. Mark's are deeply sensible of the honor done them in the following letter, just received by Bishop Thomas from General Pershing:

"France, February 15, 1918.

"Bishop N. S. Thomas,
"Cheyenne, Wyo.:

"My Dear Bishop:

"I regret very much to find that your letter of October 31, 1917, has not been answered, and wish to assure you that this was not due to a lack of appreciation, but through inadvertence.

"I should be very glad to have my name placed on the Honor Roll of St. Mark's Church, Cheyenne, and deeply appreciate your kind thought of me in this connection.

"With warm regards and very best wishes, believe me, as always,

"Sincerely yours,

"JOHN J. PERSHING."

General Pershing's letter, together with the envelope in which it came, has been framed and hung in the church beside the Honor Roll. It bears the address "France," and "Soldier's Letter" is written on the upper right-hand corner of the envelope.

The flag, which was unfurled and dedicated on the morning of Palm Sunday, is the gift of the Knights of St. Paul and the Junior Auxiliaries of St. Mark's Church. It bears twenty-eight stars.

Fiftieth Anniversary of the Church in Wyoming.

Christ Church, Douglas, Wyo., is to entertain the Eleventh Annual Convocation of the Missionary District of Wyoming, which will be held from June 21-24 inclusive. This gathering will mark the fiftieth anniversary of the entrance of the Church into Wyoming, and extensive plans are being made. Letters have gone out from the Bishop's office to all the clergy now living who have had anything to do with the growth and development of the work in Wyoming, urging them to be present on this occasion, and contribute to the addresses and recollections of this anniversary. It is hoped that a goodly number of the eighty-five to whom these letters went will find themselves able to attend.

The Rev. Samuel E. West, now in charge of the work at St. Luke's, Buffalo, has accepted the call to the rectorship of St. Peter's, Sheridan, and will take on his new duties on or about May 1.

The Rev. J. J. Bowker, of North Platte, Neb., has accepted the call to St. Thomas' Church, Rawlins, and will arrive in the District on May 1.

The Rev. Frank J. Chipp has been assigned to work at Riverton and adjoining missions. Mr. Chipp has been working on the Wind River Reservation, having had charge of the industrial work at St. Michael's Mission, as well as taking care of his clerical duties at Wind River.

Bishop Thomas is spending the two weeks preparatory to his tour of the District on confirmation visitations, in delivering series of lectures at St. Matthew's Cathedral, Laramie, and St. Mark's Church, Cheyenne.

St. Mark's Church, Casper, has been made the recipient of a bequest to be used in placing a permanent memorial in the church, for Casper Collins. A window will be purchased and placed at the earliest opportunity. Casper Collins was the young hero for whom Fort Casper was named, and the name has descended to the present town of Casper.

The Rev. Stanley S. Thompson has left his work at St. Thomas Church, Dubois, and has enlisted in the service of the country.

NEW MEXICO.

Rt. Rev. F. B. Howden, D. D., Bishop.

The Annual Convocation will be held, beginning on Tuesday, April 30. Owing to the vacancy in the rectorship at Silver City (the late rector, Rev. R. E. Browning, has gone as chaplain in United States Army), the convocation will probably be held at Albuquerque instead of Silver City.

Notes.

Several clergymen are now needed for vacant cures in New Mexico. The Bishop finds it necessary to transfer one missionary to a lower altitude, on account of the health of his family.

Marked improvements have been made at the church in El Paso, Tex., where the Bishop has recently been for confirmation.

The Bishop will attend the meeting of the House of Bishops in New York on April 10, and then return to make other visitations before the meeting of the Annual Convocation.

The first Convocation of the Church in New Mexico was held thirty-eight years ago (1880) at the same place, Albuquerque, and in the same month (May). Three clergymen of the Missionary District were in attendance, one of them an army chaplain, beside Bishop Spalding, of Colorado. One of that number, the Rev. D. A. Sanford, missionary at Gallup, is expected to attend this year.

Christianity and the Community

Thy Kingdom Come on Earth

Major Beith, widely known under his pen name of Ian Hay as the writer of some of the most notable stories of war experience, is now lecturing in this country, and the climax of the message which he is seeking to drive home is the need of a determined will that shall guard against an inconclusive peace. In his very thrilling account of the achievements of the British Army, he tells how that army says, "We know that we are better men and better soldiers than those men over there in the German lines. We know it, and they know it, and all that we ask for is to be given time to carry this thing through, and not to have some sort of inconclusive peace patched up behind our backs."

On the surface it might seem as though the hope of Christian people must of necessity be a speedy peace. We recognize the horrors of this war. We see its terrible destruction of human life, and its even graver consequences through its multiplication of the causes for hate and lasting antagonism. But there is a tremendous spiritual reality in the truth which Major Beith is trying to emphasize. If the allied cause is to mean anything at all of what we say it means, then it represents the struggle to fight this great conflict through until the spirit of brutal irresponsibility on the part of one nation toward the others is punished and discredited, and the ground cleared for a decent and permanent world order of justice and freedom. If we hold to these ideals, we are fighting to bring the kingdom of God a little nearer to the earth, and having set our hands to the plough we cannot turn back until the furrow is driven to its end. An inconclusive peace would leave all the sacrifices of the war in vain. This is not to be interpreted as meaning that we must go on to a peace of vengeance. Nothing could be more disastrous for the real ideals of the world than a peace so dictated by anger against Germany that we should lose sight of the larger vision that the settlement after peace must give to Germany, as well as to the other nations, the chance to see that her real life can find its fair place in an international order based on the consent of all. But with this recognized, the right kind of a peace does mean and must mean the discrediting of the present German military power. We must have the will and the strength to endure all the sacrifices that are needed until this end is accomplished. For the sake of coming generations, this struggle must be carried on to the point at which the heart of the German people becomes disillusioned and disgusted with the whole arrogant idea of world dominance which the German military masters have been trying to achieve in this war, and if not achieved now would only bide their time to achieve in another one.

The recent appointment of General Foch as commander-in-chief of the united French, British and American armies is another step toward a measure of international solidarity which would have seemed impossible a few years ago. The League of Nations to Enforce Peace is already having its essential elements demonstrated in at least a part of the world through the actualities of this war.

As a member of the British Parliament wrote in a recent issue of "New Europe":

"The doctrine of the single front is accepted at last. But even if we are victorious we shall achieve nothing lasting in this 'war to end war' unless, and until, we understand the parent cause of all war, namely, the existence of independent, untrammelled national sovereignties, each acting as an end in itself and recognizing no bounds to its ambition except those imposed by the limits of its own military power.

"The old antithesis between national and international is no longer so sharp because we are growing accustomed to the idea of a kind of European—or even world-wide—statehood, which shall embrace without stifling the old national States. The three great doctrines of the war—the League of Nations, Mitteleuropa and the Bolshevik idea—are different expressions of this feeling. Each of them presupposes a spiritual condition of Europe to which old frontiers no longer correspond. Each is, of course, so different from the other two that in purpose and effect they come into irreconcilable conflict; but all three have the same birthplace—in the uneasy world-wide sense of discontent with the purely national basis of the old European system.

"We can see the process at work in two profoundly interesting and sharply contrasted ways. At one end of the scale the Allies have laboriously reached certain conclusions which, on being translated into the concrete form of the Versailles Council, turn out to be a local and partial expression of the universal and general principle expounded by President Wilson in his League of Nations.

"In the military sphere and to a certain extent in the economic sphere also Versailles is the first embodiment of the idea of a supra-national authority controlling the actions of hitherto sovereign peoples in alliances. Thus the Allies in Europe, driven by bitter experience, have painfully and haltingly reached the conclusion at which the American President arrived by a process of political deduction.

"The statesmen of the Entente should make plain their intention to develop the Versailles police until it embraces all the functions which the league itself will discharge when it comes into being. And in particular the cabinets of London, Paris and Rome must show that they are now conscious of the significance of their own action at Versailles and are prepared to go forward with the enterprise just begun."

A recent appeal of one of the committees in charge of the third Liberty Loan Campaign sent out to a number of ministers says:

"Those who have won leadership among their fellows must now be sought to use the force of that leadership for their country's good. In no better manner could there be rendered service more patriotic than to so blaze the way that every man be concerned as to how best to serve his country."

This appeal has a much wider application than simply to the Liberty Loan. The ministers of the country can render a vital service now by constantly interpreting to their people the relationship of the present struggle to their highest loyalties, and the call upon them to express this loyalty in practical unselfishness.

"The world is more in need of practical Christianity, at this present time, than doctrine and ecclesiasticism.

"When we inject the spirit of controversy into the only organized force to conserve the moral conscience and spiritual vision of the nation we are traitors to our country.

"Surely we have enough to keep us busy in the constant changing social order, in the evil influences ever encroaching upon the better life of the nation, and in the dangers which confront us and the adversities which are so near at hand, instead of through controversy, arousing hatred and waking up all the fury in human nature and weakening the moral force and the spiritual power of the nation."—Rev. M. P. Logan, D. D.

There are various types of death. There is the death of the good, the death when the soul surrenders itself into the hands of God. There is another kind of death. It is the death of Gordon of Khartum, the death of the hero. There is a third. Literature has never forgotten. Socrates in the Agora of Athens. It is a beautiful scene. The Grecian sage has been sentenced to death on a false charge. He is to be his own executioner, and the great old man talks calmly to his disciples, settles his earthly affairs, says good-bye to one after another, then takes the cup of poison and drinks it, and all is over. Or yet, once more, yonder in a Chinese town a Chinese Christian sinks beneath the stones of a mob. "Are you sorry?" asks the missionary. "Sorry! oh, no," he says. "How glad! Only sorry that I have done so little for Jesus." These are the types of death as the world gives them. They are the deaths of the good, the heroic, the sage, the martyr. Christ's was not like any of these. Or, rather, it takes up and comprehends all these. There is one thing common to them all. They had to be. But Christ's was predicted. Christ's was foreseen. Christ's was deliberately accepted. Death did not choose Him. He chose death. He met it at the trysting-place where He and not death determined, and He went to the cross, though legions of angels were waiting to bear Him away from it. That makes His death unique in the world.—R. Waddell.

First Sunday after Easter: If the main thought of Easter is redemption—and the Church needs to be brought back to that truth on account of the passing of absurd and immoral theories of atonement—the teaching of the Sundays immediately following Easter is, consequences of redemption; or, redemption applied. If redemption is itself not made enough of with some, it is over-emphasized with others. Redemption is not salvation; and there does not seem any better way of bringing out both the nature and value of redemption on the one hand, and the relation of that on the other, to salvation, than by historical illustrations. Redemption from Egypt broke the power of Pharaoh; it did not of itself land the children of Israel in the Promised Land. In the same way Cyrus' decree made possible the return of God's people from Babylon; it did not plant them there; and as a matter of fact, many of them refused to avail themselves of the privilege of going back. So, all mankind are redeemed by the death and resurrection of our Lord. That does not save anybody; nor is justification equivalent to sanctification. This is the truth that is so clearly brought out in the Collect, one of the few collects, by the way, composed by our reformers and substituted for the old one in 1549 (Goulburn on The Collects, Vol. 1; page 362). The second lesson for the evening is St. Paul's discussion of this very topic, concluding with "that . . . grace might reign through righteousness." Note also (verse 10) that we are "reconciled" (not saved) by His death; and saved by His "life," through His Spirit poured into us and become the life-blood of our character and conduct. This is illustrated by the Old Testament lesson. It was by the grace of God that Israel had been redeemed; but this only made possible the Return, and inspired them with a glorious hope. The message is one that is fulfilled in the true Promised Land of the soul and ought to bring comfort to millions today: "Refrain thy voice from weeping and thine eyes from tears; for thy work shall be rewarded; and they shall come again from the land of the enemy (death)." In the morning, Historico-topical course, the first lesson follows up last Sunday's promise of return with the explicit prediction that Cyrus should act as God's shepherd and anointed, saying of Jerusalem, she shall be built and to the temple, Thy foundation shall be laid. And this promise being read, it is not left suspended in mid-air, but will be followed on subsequent Sundays with the record of fulfillment. Typically, this is also in accord with the teachings of the day and season. The experience of Israel, historically, illustrates as does the Resurrection of our Lord, God as providential ruler of the world, with its mingled light and darkness and good and evil; and it issues in righteousness (verses 5-8). The second lesson tells the story of what happened on this very day, the Sunday after the Resurrection—Thomas's doubt and conversion, concluding with the purpose of belief "that we might have life in His name."

For week days we continue in the morning selections from Deutero-Isaiah, paralleling them with sermons on the Resurrection. In the evening we fill in the week with Philipians, founded on the Resurrection (note especially chapter 3), and give for first lessons stories from Genesis, Exodus and 1 Chronicles, the point of which is man's need and God's promise of eternal life.

The Educational Secretary of the General Board of Missions announces that the subject for Mission Study during the coming year is "The Church's Mission in the United States." There will be only two text books published in connection with this course. The Senior book, entitled "Winning God's Country," is by the Bishop of South Dakota; the Junior book is being prepared by Miss Dorothy Giles, and will be published under the title of "His Star in the West."

Contrary to the custom followed in past years, only these two text books will be published, but the Suggestions for Leaders of Classes will be thoroughly and carefully graded. These Suggestions are now being prepared by expert teachers, all of whom are preparing to lead Normal Classes in the use of the text books at Summer Conferences this year.

It is expected that the text books will be published and ready for distribution by the middle of June. The series of Suggestions, however, will not be issued in their final form until later, in order that they may be thoroughly tried out at the Summer Conferences, and the writers thereby have the advantage of practical experience in putting the Suggestions into final shape.

Scatter the seed, and it will return a hundred-fold. Tell all you know, and in the secret chamber Christ will tell you things that are hidden from the wise, but revealed to babes. Nothing can hurt you more than hoarding, for then that which you seem to have will be taken away. What a conception of life is thus afforded. Our Lord had a profound knowledge of the Father's constant outpouring of His nature and gifts. He knew that God's nature was self-expenditure. Love is never so happy except as it communicates its stores of knowledge or wealth, and God is Love. It is "your Father's good pleasure to give." "How much more shall your heavenly Father give." Self-giving, therefore, must characterize us as children of God."—F. B. Meyer.

My Mother's Garden.

(By request.)

Her heart was like her garden,
Old-fashioned, quaint and sweet,
A wealth of buds and blossoms
Hid in a still retreat.
Sweet violets of sympathy
Were always opening there,
And lilies white and pure enclosed,
Each one a whispered prayer.

Forget-me-nots there lingered
To late perfection brought,
And there bloomed purple pansies,
In many a tender thought.
There hope's first snowdrop took deep root
And flowered because they must,
There love's own roses reached toward heaven
On trellises of trust."

And in that quiet garden,
The garden of her heart,
Song-birds built nests and caroled
Their song of cheer apart.
And from it still floats back to us
O'ercoming sin and strife,
Sweet as the breath of roses blown
The fragrance of her life.

For the Southern Churchman The House of the Friendly Light.

Eugenie Du Maurier.

It was a small, very modest, wooden farm house, hardly better than a shack. It stood by itself several miles from Duersville, the nearest little town. Travelers coming from the great city far away on the other side of it were often perplexed, especially at night, by coming to a spot where the road divided into two acute angles, one leading to Duersville, the other winding through endless fields and marshes to the entrance of a great wood. The only landmark to guide was the poor cottage, which stood a few yards from the intersections on the main road. Heavy trees further darkened the unlighted road, and many a stranger would have lost his way had it not been for the friendly light which always burned from dusk to dawn in the window of the little wooden house.

It was Ruth, the youngest daughter, who had thought of putting it there on the day she was confirmed. Her innocent, girl's heart, aglow with love and desire to do something for the love of God and of her neighbor, she had at first been despondent at the thought of their poverty and consequent inability to help others. Then it was she remembered how many travelers missed their way at the dividing road, and it occurred to her that a lamp at the window would act as a guiding star, especially on dark and stormy nights. So she persuaded her parents to allow her to burn a light there regularly. Of course, it was some little expense, but, poor though they were, the lamp had never failed to burn from that night on. Many were the travelers who had expressed their thanks, stopped for information, or occasionally for help, and uttered a fervent "God bless you" as they journeyed onward.

Years passed. In spite of the humble family's labors and prayers for help, calamity seemed to pursue them, and they became poorer as time went on. The old father and mother fell sick.

After a long illness they passed away to meet Him who does not leave a gift of a cup of cold water unrewarded. When they died they left only the little cottage to their daughters. Marah, the eldest, was good and industrious, but very nervous and rather embittered by their many sorrows and disappointments. Ruth, now quite a woman, had kept her sweet, cheerful disposition in spite of everything. Her love and trust in God had but increased as the years went by. Both did exquisite embroidery, but work was scarce and poorly paid. During the winter Marah caught a severe chill, followed by pneumonia. Their difficulties increased so much that they were induced to borrow a few hundred dollars at a heavy rate, giving for it a note payable at the end of a year. They hoped by that time to be able to save the money. On the contrary, Marah became crippled with rheumatism for a while, and work had been so slack for Ruth that they were at the very eve of the day on which their payment was due. Ruth had just given her last nickel for a little oil with which to keep their lamp burning that night in spite of Marah's protests that it would have been far better to spend it on food for themselves, as they would soon be both starving and homeless.

The cold was intense, and as Ruth wheeled her sister up to the brightly-blasting fire of dead wood, she felt thankful she had spent over an hour gathering it that afternoon.

"I call it like tempting providence to put that light in the window," grumbled Marah a few hours later. "Any tramp can look in, see that we are alone, and come in to kill us."

"No fear of that," laughed Ruth. "anyone could see with half an eye that we're as poor as church mice. There would be nothing to kill us for."

"Anyhow, it makes me nervous, especially to-night," said Marah, with a little shiver. "I keep fancying I hear shouts."

"God, our Father, will watch over us, never fear," answered Ruth brightly. "Let's say our prayers together before going to bed." The sisters were on their knees when, above the howling of the wind and beating of the snow, they heard the sound of approaching, stumbling footsteps. They clung to each other trembling with fright.

"I told you so! I felt it coming," gasped Marah.

Just then there was a tap at the door. An agonized voice called: "Please, do let us in! We've had an accident. My sister is dying."

Forgetting all fear, Ruth sprang to the door, and with difficulty took down the heavy iron bar which was always put up at night. When she had it opened, snow blew in like a whirlwind, and through it all staggered a young man, drenched, dishevelled, bleeding from a cut in his forehead. He almost carried a girl, who, when he laid her down by the fire, fainted. The sisters fortunately had a few simple remedies, and after getting the young woman to bed they chafed her numbed limbs, bathed and dressed a slight wound on her shoulder and arm and forced a little cordial between her clenched teeth. While Ruth attended upon the girl, Marah managed to hobble around and heat some bricks, which they put around the patient. Soon the girl's circulation was restored, and she opened her eyes and recognized her brother, who was bending anxiously over her. Before long she was able to take a little food, and after thanking the sisters effusively for their kindly hospitality, she fell into a quiet, restful sleep. Even then her brother insisted on sitting up to watch her for an hour or more. He had exchanged his wet garments for some old clothes of their father's, and now he sat by the fire talking in a low voice to Ruth, while poor Marah was only too glad to go and rest after her unusual exertions.

At first the young man told of the accident. They were staying for a few days at a neighboring town while on their way home from a Southern trip, and rather late that afternoon, in spite of the lowering sky, the sister had proposed they go for an auto drive. He had entirely lost his way, but they thought it fun until the storm had come on suddenly. The wind had with the snow nearly blinded him. Then the machine skidded, crashed into a tree and overturned.

"It is providential we were not killed," he added. "The wretched auto was so smashed up we felt there was nothing for us to do but to walk till we could get help somewhere. We did have a time of it! Poor little Amy was wearing black satin slippers and kept losing them in the snow, and she was soon so exhausted that she declared she could not go a step farther. I tried carrying her, but I could not do that for long. How I did pray, and the good God helped me, for before long we saw that blessed light in your window, and that gave us new courage. Amy managed to crawl on with my help, but she was almost fainting before we reached your cottage. I'd tried calling for help. But the wind drowned my voice."

"Marah thought that she heard shouts, and it made her nervous," answered Ruth, "but we little thought it was anyone calling for assistance. I'm afraid we have been able to offer you but very wretched accommodation, but we're so poor you must excuse it," she added humbly.

"Indeed you've been more than kind, and I don't know how to be grateful enough to you. Had it not been for your friendly light and more than friendly help, I feel sure I could not have saved my little sister. The cold would have killed her in her exhausted state."

Then, Ruth hardly knew how, he drew from her an account of all their troubles and money difficulties, and of her anxiety about the note due on the following day.

"It all seems hopeless, doesn't it?" she said at last. "But in spite of everything I trust in God's love, and I cannot believe that He will forsake us in our need."

"I'm sure He won't," the young man answered eagerly. "See how He helped us, through you, and as for that promissory note, don't trouble about it, I'll see that man to-morrow and make him give you more time. I feel sure of that."

The next morning it was still snowing, but the young man made his way to Duersville, and came back with a hired auto and a chauffeur who knew the country, and after warmly thanking the sisters again and again, their guests prepared to leave.

"I do not offer you pay for your hospitality," he said as he was about to step into the auto, "such devotion as yours has been to my sister cannot be repaid by a petty sum of money, but, believe me, we will always remember your true kindness to us. You will not find us ungrateful."

"It's all very well," sighed Marah, as the sisters watched the auto drive out of sight, "friendship, prayers and gratitude are very good things, doubtless, but a few dollars would have been mighty acceptable just now. They've eaten up pretty nearly everything we had left, and that's the sort of benefit we get from what you and everybody else calls our friendly light."

"Oh, Marah, dear! You don't mean your seeming selfishness and cynicism!" cried Ruth. "I know at least you are as glad as I am to have been able to help the poor, young things."

"Of course, I'm glad to help," grumbled Marah, "but I shouldn't judge they were poor by the look of that girl's clothes, all fur and silk and lace, and of the costliest."

"Well, if the young man gets us a delay for the payment of our loan, it will be a world of help," insisted Ruth. "Yes, if!" snapped Marah doubtfully.

But she changed her mind the next day when the postman brought a letter from their late guests. Not only did it contain fervid words of thanks and affection, but the receipted note from their creditor, besides five hundred dollars in bank notes, all of which the brother and sister begged them to accept as a very slight token of their gratitude for a benefit which they felt they could never repay.

"You can look upon it as a thank offering to God because of the service given by your little friendly lamp," they added. "May that lamp long shine as a help to weary travelers on their way, and may our Father in heaven who never fails those who put their trust in Him, grant health and prosperity to the kindly inmates of the house of the friendly light."

The Kid Enlists.

The Kid has gone to the Colors

And we don't know what to say;

The Kid we have loved and cuddled

Stepped out for the Flag today.

We thought him a child, a baby

With never a care at all,

But his country called him man-size

And the Kid has heard the Call.

He paused to watch the recruiting,

Where, fired by the life and drum,

He bowed his head to Old Glory

And thought that it whispered: "Come!"

The Kid, not being a slacker,

Stood forth with patriot-joy

To add his name to the roster,

And now we're proud of the boy!

The Kid has gone to the Colors;

It seems but a little while

Since he drilled a school-boy army

In a truly martial style.

But now he's a man, a Soldier,

And we lend him a listening ear,

For his heart is a heart all loyal,

Unscourged by the curse of fear.

His Dad, when we told him, shuddered,

His Mother—God bless her!—cried;

Yet, blest with a mother nature,

She wept with a mother pride.

But he whose old shoulders straightened

Was Grand-dad—for memory ran

To years when he, too, a youngster,

Was changed by the Flag to a MAN!

Business Principles in the Kitchen.

If one household can do it, another can. Here is an article that every housekeeper should read and reflect upon. It goes to the heart of home economics. It helps solve the high cost of living problems. It answers the question, can the home dining room and kitchen be run on the same principles that obtain in business? A New York engineer has answered this question with actual trial and gives the figures. He not only shows that he can manage his house by principles as carefully worked out as those he uses in his business, but also that these same principles help to offset the high price of living.

Many of us have accepted it that the kitchen cannot be put on an efficiency system, that accounts are too small, that purchases are too scattered, that conditions change so often, and no proper records can be kept. The great majority of us only guess what it is costing us to eat. We have a general idea that food is high in price, but we do not know how high in price. We guess we are trying to save, but we are not sure we are succeeding. Now, guessing is responsible for a good many big bills. And "don't know" doesn't develop bank accounts.

This New York engineer determined to know how much his kitchen was costing. It is his business to measure things, to keep accounts, to plan in such a way as to get results. Now that the world is talking about food, he determined to apply his business system to his food. His wife agreed from the start. It was not difficult to secure the co-operation of the cook. These records have now been kept for two years. And because the results are interesting he has determined to pass them on.

In the first place the engineer's family is the average good-sized American family, with about seven around the table, sometimes more and sometimes less.

Of course, with a family of young people some of the boys would be out now and then, and the girls would be invited to their parties. But they made up for the meals missed by having in their friends. So the number fed runs to about seven the year around.

In the second place we must notice that this family didn't need to skimp. The economy program was undertaken in line with a general spirit in the air, because economy is a good and reasonable thing, rather than in order to save money. They have always had enough to eat, and they continued to have enough, even after they began to apply efficiency to their kitchen program. They also continued to enjoy their meals.

The family began to keep a record in January, 1916, and completed their totals at the end of that year. The following year they kept records of the same kind under the different program of economy that they had adopted. Record was kept of everything brought into the house to eat, the amount purchased, the cost per pound, the amount and cost per capita—in fact, everything in which an engineer and efficiency expert would be interested.

Of course they found out first that the cost per pound of the things they purchased went up considerably between the two years. The cost of potatoes per pound had almost doubled, rising from 2.3 to 4.5 cents. Butter went up from 34 to 47 cents; eggs, from 40 to 53 cents a dozen; flour, from 4.3 to 7 cents a pound; and milk, from 8 to 11 cents a quart. The increases in prices ran all the way from about 10 per cent to almost 100 per cent.

Naturally one would expect that with such a showing of increased prices the annual budget would be greatly increased. Instead of this the food expenditure was $142 less in 1917, the year of high prices, than it had been in the preceding year. This was brought about entirely by increased economy in management, by better apportioning of food, by more efficient utilization, and by the elimination of waste. It was not accomplished by a substitution of lower qualities of food. This care in management accounted for a cut in kitchen expense for food from $1,544.14 in 1916 to $1,402.87 in 1917.

In showing as he does that even in war time with decreased stocks and higher prices the food of a large family can be so handled as to lead to a saving of both food and money, the New York engineer has done a service that is worthy of being spread abroad. His report shows that the per capita cost of feeding his family fell between 1916 and 1917 from 57 cents to 54 cents, while all prices rose.—U S Food Administration Bulletin.

What Thomas Missed.

I wonder where Thomas was that day? Trouble had been coming thick and fast to the followers of Jesus. Like a swiftly moving panorama, the scenes of the last few days of the Master's life had flitted by. The hosannas of joy had scarcely ceased to echo through the streets of the Holy City before the awful cry, "Crucify him, crucify him!" chilled the blood of the faithful few. Then the sham trial, then the journey up Calvary, then the cross, and then the tomb. It must have seemed like one long nightmare. What wonder that it struck terror to the hearts of the disciples and sent them away into hiding!

Just where the house was in which the heartbroken friends of Jesus gathered that evening when the door was shut and they were no doubt speaking in whispers one to another "for fear of the Jews," we are not told. It must have been some regularly appointed rendezvous, for they were all there save one. With his usual accuracy the sacred writer tells us that "Thomas, one of the twelve, called Didymus, was not with them."

Did any of them know where Thomas was? If it was for prayers they had come together, did they not say one to another, "Our brother has not come; ought we not to wait a moment for him"? But though they listened long, no sound of the well-known footstep came to their ears. Thomas was gone. Back home? Had something happened to him? Had he indeed given everything up as lost?

In the midst of their little company suddenly appeared a wondrous Presence. No rattling of the lock, no sound of the approaching visit. There he stood! If we could only have a true picture of that moment when they recognized the Christ! Surely never to their last day upon this old earth could they have forgotten that blessed moment! Think of what it must have meant to those sorrow-stricken men to have their Leader back with them again! How they must have pressed about Him, their arms clinging fast to His shoulders, their eyes wet with tears of joy, their hearts full to overflowing with happiness!

But Thomas was not there! What did he miss that day? He missed hearing Jesus speak those reassuring words: "Peace be unto you." Haunted by every shadow that fell across the room, trembling whenever any unwonted sound came at door or window, what a sense of relief it must have been to those distracted men to hear that calm, steady voice say, "Peace be unto you"! Nor was it the salutation of the passing traveler. It was the warm, sweet, tender greeting of the Christ of Galilee! Twice repeated, it must have brought a peace passing all understanding—lasting, precious, inspiring for all time to come. And Thomas missed this.

For the Young Folks

The Dusty Hill.

There was a little hilly hill
All over dusty dust,
So Mother Nature said one day:
"I think I really must"

"Take charge of that young scamp of mine
And wash his dirty face;
Because the state he now is in
Is simply a disgrace."

She brought a little cloudy cloud,
All full of rainy rain,
And squeezed it over the dusty hill,
Till he looked clean again.

And then she called a windy wind
From out the misty sky,
Who blew, and blew, and blew until
He blew the hill quite dry.

When this was done, old Father Sun
Came out to see his child;
And when he saw him look so nice,
He smiled, and smiled and smiled.
—Little Folks.

"Doubting Thomas."

The Easter story is so fresh in your minds that I am sure you will like to recall something that happened very soon afterward. Do you remember how at twilight on that wonderful day the apostles gathered in the upper room, shutting the doors for fear of the Jews? Very likely they came to worship. Some of their number had seen the risen Lord, so there must have been an air of suppressed excitement in the little company as they greeted one another.

And suddenly through the doors that could not shut Him out, came Jesus and stood in their midst. He held out His hands and showed them the nail prints and the wound in His side which the Roman soldier's spear had made. And they knew beyond a doubt that it was their Lord and Master. Yet in place of the human body, that had known pain and weariness, He had a new one which possessed wonderful powers. After the resurrection you and I will have bodies like our Lord's.

Do you think there was anywhere in the world such a happy group of people? Yet one of their number was missing. This was Thomas. What we know about him seems to indicate that he loved Jesus very deeply and that he was brave and fearless of danger. When Jesus said He would go to Bethany, Thomas said: "Let us also go, that we may die with Him."

Yet after the crucifixion he seems to have lost all hope. Even when the disciples told him they had seen the Lord he still doubted.

"Except I shall see in His hands the print of the nails, and put my finger into the print of the nails, and thrust my hand into His side, I will not believe," he said. So he had no share in the Easter gladness.

Sunday came again. Once more the disciples gathered in the upper room and this time Thomas was with them. Possibly he half believed Jesus would come again. Or he may have wanted to be perfectly sure that his friends were mistaken and that the dear Presence was only a ghost.

Then Jesus came again in the same mysterious manner. In the gentlest possible way He rebuked Thomas for his unbelief.

"Reach hither thy finger," He said, "and behold My hands; and reach hither thy hand, and thrust it into My side: and be not faithless, but believing."

We can be almost certain that Thomas fell on his knees as he answered, "My Lord and my God."

"Thomas," said Jesus, "because thou hast seen Me, thou hast believed: blessed are they that have not seen, and yet have believed."

That is all we know for certain about St. Thomas. Legends say that he went to be a missionary to the Parthians, Medes and Persians, and planted the Church among them. At last he went to India, where to this day there is a body of people who call themselves the Christians of St. Thomas. It is supposed that he was martyred at Sumatra.

That is all we know about St. Thomas. But his story has its own lessons of faith and trust for us. There are many people in the world to-day who say they do not believe in miracles, or that they cannot accept the story of our Lord's birth; but they will not go as Thomas did, into a company of people who do believe and there wait for the coming of Jesus. They lose that promise, "Blessed are they that have not seen, and yet have believed," which applies to you and me and everybody else who accepts the teaching of the Church.

Not long ago I read a story of an old Scotch woman which I think you will like to hear. She was poor and she lived all alone in her little house. In the summer she could raise vegetables in her garden, or earn a little money working for her neighbors. But there came a time in the bitter winter when her little store of food was all gone. She went to bed hoping that the next day she would be able to earn a little money. She awoke to find a terrible snow storm sweeping over the country. The lane that led to her little house was drifted full. She could not even go to a neighbor's to ask for food. She could only trust and pray.

So what do you think she did? She put a kettle of water on the fire and actually added the salt, just as though she was going to make oatmeal porridge. Then she went into the other room to tell her troubles to the Saviour. Presently she heard a knock at the door. She could not believe that the answer to her prayer had come so soon, but she went to see. There she found a farmer's daughter, who had struggled through the snow with a heavy bag of meal.

"I don't know what ails my father," the girl said, "but he would have me come, in spite of the snow, to bring you this. It was pretty hard work coming through the drifts."

Then she stopped, awed by the look on the old woman's face.

"He's just the same, Jeanie," she said. "Many long years have I trusted Him and He's never failed. Look at the pot on the fire. I put on the water and I put in the salt, but ne'er a grain of meal did I have. I was just asking the Lord to send me the meal when I heard you knock; so here comes the meal just as I was asking for it."

Of course God does not always answer prayer in just that way. But He does hear us when we ask and is glad when we trust Him. Let us try to remember this, especially in this season when the Easter music is still ringing in our ears.—Pearl H. Campbell, in The Young Churchman.

A Baby Seal's Bed.

Would you, little folks, think a floating cake of ice a warm or attractive bed in January?

No! no! I can hear you answer, most emphatically, and the mere thought of such a bed in cold winter weather makes you shiver.

That is the only bed, however, that some baby seals have.

There are a good many seals along this Nova Scotian coast, and we often see them on our boating trips in the summer, sunning themselves on the rocks or bobbing their heads up from the water.

Seals are very curious, you know, and they are strongly attracted by any musical sound. It is a great amusement to whistle a tune or play on a musical box and notice one little dark head after another popping up from the water to see what is going on, but Teddy and I never saw any baby seals until the other day when we were coming through the Strait of Canso in a steamer.

It was a clear, cold, sunny day in January, but the water was as smooth as in midsummer. There were a good many ice-cakes floating about and we saw a number of seals on them—basking in the sun. As the ship drew nearer the ice-floes, one seal after another slid off into the water. Teddy exclaimed in great excitement, "Look, look, Gertrude, there is one big seal that won't move; and see, it is flopping its tail up and down, as though it were frightened or something were wrong."

By this time all the passengers were leaning over the ship's rail watching the big seal that was making such frantic motions and yet would not jump into the water, as the others had done at the sight of the big ship bearing down upon them.

The ship drew nearer and nearer, until we were within a few yards of that ice-floe. Finally the big seal slid into the water, but kept close to the ice-floe with its head above the water, watching our ship eagerly—and before we had really passed it jumped back again. But during the few minutes that the seal was in the water, what do you think we saw? Two little baby seals on the ice-floe! Teddy was wild with delight.

"Oh! Gertrude," he said, "the mother seal was afraid her babies would get hurt, wasn't she, and that was why she wouldn't move?"

"Yes," I replied, "and that was why she was flopping her tail in such distress and why she kept so close to the ice-floe. I think she jumped into the water for a few minutes so we could see her babies, as much as to say, 'Now you can all see what I have, and please don't hurt them,' and then she jumped back on the ice-floe to protect her babies in case they should be molested."

"I wish the ship would go faster," said Teddy; "I can hardly wait until we get home to tell mother and father about those baby seals."

"Don't you remember, Teddy," I said, "that father told us once that the mother seals usually have one baby at a time; that very occasionally they have two—but never more at one birth? That mother seal must be very proud of her twin babies."

"Yes, yes," said Teddy; "won't it be fun to tell father about those twins; but did you notice, Gertrude, that the little baby seals looked white and they were about the size of cats?"

"Yes," I replied, "those babies were very young. I don't believe they were more than two or three days old. I remember that father told us, too, that when a baby seal is born it has a coat of very thick, soft, nearly white fur, and until this falls the seal does not usually enter the water. He told us that young seals at first do not like the water and have to be taught to swim by their parents, and this takes three weeks or more.

"Then that ice-floe will be the baby seals' bed and their home for some weeks, until they get new coats and until they learn how to swim," said Teddy.

"Yes," I said, "but their mother will never leave them. She will stay right there to feed them, protect them, and keep them warm until they are able to look after themselves. Mother seals love their babies dearly, just as our mother loved us."

"That's all right," said Teddy, "but I'm glad we have our mother and father and nice warm beds. Aren't you glad, Gertrude, that we were never baby seals and had to sleep on an ice-cake?"—Alice G. Whitman.

The Callers.

When anybody comes to call
My mother gives them tea,
And asks them how they are this fall,
And then begins on me.
She says I'm growing up so fast
She's lengthened all my frocks;
And that she's had to have, at last,
A pantry door that locks.

She says when I was seven or eight,
She thought my eye was crossed;
That now my hair is growing straight—
Its baby curl is lost—
She says that I get very bruised
In climbing neighbor's trees.
She asks them if they've ever used
Hot water for lame knees.

She says I like my teachers now,
But didn't much at first;
That school's a problem, anyhow;
She hopes I'm through the worst.
She says no little girl alive
Gets marks as odd as mine.
Because sometimes I'm sixty-five,
And sometimes ninety-nine.

I wonder why she likes to tell
About her little girl.
I'm very sorry I can't spell
And that my hair won't curl.
And I don't think it's hardly fair
To hint I take the jam—
I wonder if the callers care
How mortified I am:

For the Southern Churchman The Little Tin Box.

Lucy Landon Noland.

Five o'clock on a certain afternoon found Grandmother Pen seated on her porch. She looked very quaint in a soft black satin and dainty white lace cap. In one hand she held her Prayer Book, in the other a little tin box. Around her were gathered, six little girls with eager, expectant faces. They met on granny's porch every Sunday afternoon to hear some delightful story of by-gone days, which granny would relate in a most charming way.

"Listen, my dears," she said, "this is a very sad little story that happened to me when I was about ten years old and had not been at school long. My father had just returned from Europe, and the next morning after his arrival I found on my plate at breakfast the most beautiful wax doll I ever beheld. He had brought it all the way from Paris.

"Nobody can ever imagine my joy as I gazed at my doll, almost afraid to touch it. For some time I could not realize it was mine, and I did not even remove it from the box until after breakfast, when I carefully untied the ribbons that held her in place and lifted her out with trembling fingers. Never before had I seen such a beautifully shaped nose, such wonderful brown eyes and dark lashes, and, oh, those red lips and pink cheeks. I can see them plainly now.

"It was no wonder I was excited, for dolls of that kind were very rare in those days, my best being a rag affair.

"I went to school that morning thrilled to the bone, and it is needless to say regaled my schoolmates with the charms of my new prize. After school I invited three of my dearest playmates to come and have tea with me that evening and see my precious doll!

"Of course, I went into more raptures over my doll when I got home, and could hardly leave her long enough to eat my dinner.

"We were just finishing dessert when I heard Diana coming through the hall singing, 'I sutney is glad! I sutney is glad!'

"Glad of what?" I asked as soon as she came in. 'I sutney is glad sompen don hapen to dat doll o'r your'n what been setten you crazy; you run right squar inter me this mornin', you bee so wild, you done ebem look where yous goine and I ain't—.' But I waited to hear no more. Away I flew to the library, where I received the most awful shock of my life. I think, for while I had been at dinner the sun had shifted and now fell full on my doll's face, which had mysteriously flattened out and was now running through the cracks in the box.

"I will not try to describe my sorrow, but I remember that I did not get over it for weeks. Everybody in the house—everybody except Diana—shared my grief, including my three playmates who were deadily disappointed at not seeing a real wax doll.

"I scraped up the remains of my prize and packed it into this little tin box. But at least I had the compensation of knowing that my doll had gone where all good wax dolls go."

A Sail in the Air.

"When I grow up, mother, I'm going to be an aviator," said Jasper Dane. He had been looking at pictures of airships, and he pronounced the big word proudly. His mother laughed; she had often heard him wish for a sail through the air.

Jasper's home was in a Western State, where the wide prairies are dotted over with fine farms. One day it had been very hot; heavy clouds in the west promised a shower. Jasper looked up quickly when his mother, with the baby in her arms, came out and gave a little cry of alarm:

"Look at the clouds."

Mr. Dane glanced up, and instantly sprang to his feet. A strange, copper-colored cloud was coming straight toward them with the speed of a railway train, and the frightful rumble and roar grew louder every minute. Mr. Dane had lived many years in the West, and he knew what those strange clouds meant. There was not a moment to lose!

"A tornado!" he cried, and seized Jasper with one arm, while with the other he helped Jasper's mother along to seek refuge in the cellar. Suddenly, with a fearful crash, the world seemed to fall to pieces round them.

To Jasper it was very surprising to be picked out of his father's strong arms and carried up into the air like a feather; but it was still more strange to end his sail by coming down with a great splash into cold water. But that is what he did. He had been dropped into the pond!

But quickly as he had made the trip, his father was there before him, for he had gone down headfirst into the same cold water; and when he came up, gasping for breath, he saw Jasper floating on top.

Mr. Dane did not lose his presence of mind; but began at once to plan how to get out of the pond. He told Jasper to cling to his neck; and then, though it was hard work to swim with such a heavy burden, he succeeded in getting to the shore.

They ran wildly about in search of Mrs. Dane and the baby. They found them in the orchard; and they all shouted for joy when they found that the tornado had left them unhurt. The baby had not even cried! Bumps and bruises were their worst troubles. Jasper had his sail in the air, to be sure, but he never wanted another like it—
M. L. Ford.

Thy Kingdom Come.

Lord, when we pray, "Thy kingdom come!"

Then fold our hands without a care,
For souls whom Thou hast died to save,
We do but mock Thee with our prayer.

Thou couldst have sent an angel band
To call Thy erring children home;
And thus through heavenly ministries
On earth Thy kingdom might have come.

But since to human hands like ours
Thou hast committed work divine,
Shall not our eager hearts make haste
To join their feeble powers with Thine?

To word and work shall not our hands
Obedient move, nor lips be dumb,
Lest through our sinful love of ease
Thy kingdom should delay to come?

All Things Needful for All.

But more than the individual needs are the corporate needs. The "us" includes all men. So it is a prayer that all people shall have enough of all things needful, not that some may have luxuries while others want the necessities of life. It is really a prayer against cornering of food, against grafting, and against adulteration of all kinds. The extreme luxuries of our cities, the waste as well as the extreme poverty, is a contradiction of this petition. God has given bounteously of the things of the earth for the support of all men; it is we in our niggardness, our selfishness, that have made so much peculiar and individual. So when we pray this prayer we are praying that God will overcome our selfishness so that we shall live simply and aid others to get what they need for life.—Witness.

Oh, the fret of the brain,
And the wounds and the worry;
Oh, the thought of love and the thought of death—
And the soul in its silent hurry.

But the stars break above,
And the fields flower under,
And the tragical life of man goes on,
Surrounded by beauty and wonder.

Honest, Now.

Am I really and truly interested in my church—in helping it achieve its objects and ideals—or do I just think I am? What do I do to prove my interest—that it's half as vital, for example, as I think it is?

How do I look to the man on the outside? Could he tell I am interested by what I do? How do I look to him?

Am I a good example for anybody to follow? or do I just think I am? or do I think about my responsibility, in this connection, at all?

Do I attend church service as often as I think I do?

How often do I speak a word of encouragement or praise to the minister, or have a pleasant word and smile for his wife? Do I as often as I think I do?

How would the minister classify me? As interested? indifferent? cold? as a friend and helped, or just as—one of the congregation? Would he be justified by what I do?

Do I really give as the Lord hath prospered me, or do I just think I do? If I should add up my contributions to local church support and to missions, would they represent as large a part of my total income as I think they do?

Would a stranger think me as liberal as I think I am, even if he had all the facts of my other responsibilities?

Do I really care for missions at all? Do I ever really deny myself—a new suit, cigars, street car rides (when walking would be better for my health)—anything—to help forward the cause? Do I really ever deny myself, or do I just think I do?

Do I really believe it more blessed to give than to receive, or do I just think I do?

What kind of a church member am I, anyhow? Am I the kind I think I am, or do I just think I am?

Try a little introspection along these lines.—The Transmitter.

How to Represent Christ.

If heaven's joys are in our souls, they will often be on our tongues. If we live with Jesus, men will have knowledge of the fact. If the love of Christ be in our hearts, it cannot long be hid. If the Rose of Sharon be in our bosom, it will fill with its fragrance the atmosphere in which we move. If we are Christ's, men will know the fact by the tones of our voice, the grasp of our hand, the glance of our eye, and the dominant spirit of our entire life.

Our Lord teaches us not to shrink from the consequences which we may see to be involved in any course of duty which we have undertaken. He leads us to accept the results of any high choice as they open to our mind—to regard trustfully, in every act of self-dedication, in every resolve we are led to make, whatever possibilities there may be of coming trial, foreseen or unforeseen—to realize in calmness the future, whatever that future may be. If the calling of God is clear, if the sense of duty becomes the pillar of cloud by day and the pillar of fire by night, ever leading onward, the vision of the Cross ought not to hinder our going forward. For one who has put his hand to the plough, to look back is to become unfit for the Kingdom of Heaven. And equally so it must be to disobey God, if distrust of His upholding us in the course along which He would guide our steps, whatever trial may meet us in the path, becomes a stumbling-block or hindrance to our faith.—T. T. Carter.

In Christ.

In Christ I feel the heart of God
Throbbing from heaven through earth;
Life stirs again within the clod,
Renewed in beauteous birth;
The soul springs up, a flower of prayer,
Breathing His breath out on the air.

In Christ I touch the hand of God,
From His pure height reached down,
By blessed ways before untrod,
To lift us to our crown;
Victory that only perfect is Through loving sacrifice, like His.

Holding His hand, my steadfast feet
May walk the air, the seas;
On life and death His smile falls sweet,
Lights up all mysteries;
Stranger nor exile can I be
In new worlds where He leadeth me.

Not my Christ only; He is ours;
Humanity's close bond;
Key to its vast, unopened powers,
Dream of our dreams beyond.
What yet we shall be none can tell:
Now we are His, and all is well.
—Lucy Larcom.

The Watchman-Examiner wonders "if there is any other institution that has to put up with so much impertinent criticism as the Church, or whether there is any other class of men who show anything like the patience and toleration manifested by our ministers in not being exasperated to the explosion point. Every other institution is judged by its own ideal of what it is designed to do; the Church is too often judged by the ideal set for it by those who are utterly unsympathetic with its real purpose and mission. The difficulty with many of the criticisms of evangelical churches is that these churches would cease to be churches if they conformed themselves to the ideas of their critics. They would become more or less excellent social organizations and philanthropic societies, but they would cease to be evangelical churches."

"Innocency of life" is compatible with sturdiness and strength of body. Jesus loved good health, and spent much time healing the bodies of men. Not at all need "innocency of life" be interpreted to mean long-facedness and joylessness. Good cheer is ours if anyone's! "Cheer up," says George Wharton Pepper to the preacher in his recent Yale Lectures on Preaching. "Cheer up! If you are going to preach the Gospel, please do not forget that you are the bearer of tidings of great joy. If you are not going to preach the Gospel, we should have had warning so that we could stay away." Among the fruits of the Spirit Paul puts "joy." Fosdick tells us that a Boston newspaper once printed this item: "The day was dark and gloomy, but Phillips Brooks walked down through Newspaper Row and all was bright."—Selected.

No one long wants to oppose the man whom opposition never embitters. But the man who tries to overcome opposition by showing that he resents it, and by hurling himself against it, only builds it up the stronger. Keeping sweet in spite of opposition is never a sign of amiable weakness; only the strongest can do it. Therefore, such keeping sweet is an irresistible attack on the opposition, and will convert it to friendliness or agreement, if anything can.

Here are a few lessons that I have learned from the war: (1) The pettiness and unimportance of our everyday troubles, as compared with the terrible sufferings and the innumerable bereavements sustained by those engaged in, or directly affected by it; (2) the equality of all races of mankind in the matter of courage; (3) the absurdity of the cry of "national degeneration," especially as levelled at England, France and Belgium; (4) the comparative unimportance, except perhaps in a very few cases, of the individual leader; (5) the enormous capacity for self-sacrifice inherent in mankind; (6) the vast staying power of England; and lastly, the wonderful capacity for liberal giving in our people.—Ex.

Faith comes not by argument, but by inspiration. The flame of trust is kindled within us from the fire that burns in other souls. * * * Here is the true value of church-going. The primary purpose of the Church, of its preaching, of its Sacraments, of its philanthropic activities, is to increase the volume of faith in the individual and in society. The Church may be conceived of as a power-house, from which go forth streams of living energy. Hence the value of the Church in the modern world does not lie primarily in her intellectual power, or in her institutional services to the community, but in the amount of faith she is able to generate.—Dr. McComb, in "Faith."

Dry Bits.

A truly eloquent parson had been preaching for an hour or so on the immortality of the soul.

"I looked at the mountains," he exclaimed, "and could not help thinking, 'Beautiful as you are you will be destroyed, while my soul will not.' I gazed upon the ocean and cried, 'Mighty as you are you will eventually dry up, but not I!'"—Temperance.

IMMORTALITY

An Essay in Discovery, Co-ordinating Scientific, Psychological and Biblical Research.

BURNETT H. STREETER
and OTHERS

The first three essays, set forth in logical sequence the arguments for a belief in personal immortality. The next three deal with the nature of the after-life and discuss the meaning and value for modern thought of conceptions like Resurrection, Judgment, Heaven and Hell. The others deal with the elements of truth and error in Spiritualism, Reincarnation and Theosophy while the final one forms and epilogue to the collection. "Instead of the family physician the reader here goes to a group of competent specialists to have his doubts treated." "The Churchman."

Thomas missed also the inbreathing of the Holy Spirit, filling them with power to do wondrous things and fitting them for the mission given them in that sacred hour. "As my Father hath sent me, even so send I you." It must be that somewhere and sometime a special infilling and a definite commission was granted to Thomas, just as Jesus took particular pains to dissipate any doubts he might have had by showing him the prints of the nails in His hands and the spear wound in His side. But nothing of this came to him that blessed night.

For Thomas missed seeing the hands of the Christ and the red mark in His side when his fellow-disciples looked upon these sure proofs of the tragedy upon Calvary. We are told that the "disciples were glad when they saw the Lord." And when they saw their missing companion—when was it and where?—they made haste to tell him that they had seen the Lord and that He was the same, though not the same—more gentle, more intimate, more definite, and more positive in His great commission than ever in the past.

Because he was not in his place with the friends of Jesus, Thomas missed all these things that night. And what must have been his feelings during the eight days which came next! Surely his heart was racked with doubt. He could not believe the story told him of the risen Christ.

"Except I shall see in His hands the print of the nails and put my finger into the print of the nails, and thrust my hand into His side, I will not believe."

But would that blessed privilege ever be his? How he must have waited and watched for the longed-for revelation! Fancy must have given the figure of every traveler on the dusty road the form of the Blessed One. Hope must have lighted a new flame in the lonely man's heart with every sound that seemed like the step of the dear Companion. Eight days of waiting and trembling and watching and praying no doubt that he, too, might be granted one more opportunity of looking into the face of the Master! Eight days in which to be sorry that he had been overborne by doubt and turned his back on the men of the way, as we sometimes fear was the case! Eight days in which to learn that the place of privilege is the place where God's people hold communion! Eight days to realize that the Spirit's infilling comes only to those who are in the upper room where Jesus is wont to meet His own! Eight days in which to learn that the way to peace and power is the place where disbelief is dissolved in tears of faith and penitence!

But have not I been slower than this to come to the point where I could say with all my heart, "My Lord and my God"? Nail prints and bloody marks in the side have not sufficed sometimes to keep my faith alive! I have demanded that the dew should come and go over and over again on the fleece; that the number of just men for whose sake the city may be saved shall be reduced even until not ten remain. I have missed just where Thomas missed, by hiding away when storm clouds have lowered about our beloved Church and by shivering at the very mention of the failure of the Christ to keep His own unto that day when He shall appear and to win the world to Himself.

So, Thomas, let me sit down by thy side and learn of thee that God is very patient, that Jesus never tires of showing His hands and His side to us all, ever urging us to be "not faithless, but believing." Then let me rise up; like thee, with a glad cry of burning con-

Baked in old-fashioned pan Baked in Pyrex

Bakes bread an inch higher

These loaves were made from the same amount of dough and baked in the same sized pans in the same oven at the same time.

Try this test yourself with any ordinary pan and Pyrex. You will be amazed at the difference!

When you cook in an ordinary pan, only one-third the oven heat reaches the food. All the oven heat floods through Pyrex. Every food baked in Pyrex is more evenly, thoroughly, deliciously cooked.

Dealers everywhere sell Pyrex. Each dish is guaranteed not to break in the oven. It lasts a lifetime. Try your first dish today. You will say it cooks so much better, is so much cleaner, so much more beautiful, that you will never again use an old-fashioned pan.

There is not a single flower, not a distant star, not a murmuring brooklet, not a sound sweet or shrill; there is not a living creature, or a natural process, that may not serve us; not only by meeting some appetite of sense, but by teaching us such deep lessons as those which Jesus drew from the scenes around Him, saying, "The kingdom of heaven is like."—F. The Fellowship of Prayer.

Prayer is conscious fellowship with God—not merely communion with God, but co-operation with God. In the neglect of this truth lies the origin of most of our difficulties about prayer. Co-operation, not compulsion, is the secret of our true prayer. Often our first idea about prayer is that it means our strenuous effort to alter and change the direction of the Divine Will. We see what we need. We would impress that need upon the mind of God, and the intensity of our prayer is in proportion to our determination to bend God's will. But prayer calls us not to compel God, but to co-operate with Him, calls us into fellowship of will with Him. The proper understanding then of the relation of the divine will to the will of man is the first condition of true and faithful prayer.—F. W. Drake.

Joy lives in the midst of the sorrow; the sorrow springs from the same root as the gladness. The two do not clash against each other or reduce the emotion to a neutral indifference, but they blend into one another; just as in arctic regions, deep down below the cold snow, with its white desolation and its barren death, you shall find the budding of the early spring flowers and the fresh green grass; just as some kinds of fire burn below the water; just as in the midst of the barren and undrinkable sea here may be welling up some little fountain of fresh water that comes from a deeper depth than the great ocean around it, and pours its sweet streams along the surface of the salt waste.—A. Maclaren.

Harvest Every Month.

All through the year wheat is being harvested. In January it is cut in the great fields of the Argentine and in New Zealand. In February and March it is cut in the East Indies and Egypt. The wheat fields are harvested in April in Cyprus, Asia Minor and Cuba, and in May in China and Japan. June is the busiest harvest month of the whole year, for then Turkey, Greece, Spain and Southern France, as well as most of the Southern States of America, are all cutting wheat. Northerly States and provinces of America, as well as Austria, Germany and parts of Russia, do their harvest gathering in July. August sees the wheat crop gathered in Great Britain, and September and October for Sweden and Norway. Peru and South Africa are busy harvesting in November and December.

Some day the tangles will be all smoothed out,

The crooked be put straight, the rough made clear;

Poor foolish words, that had so little weight,

Yet weighed so heavily, be sweet and dear;

And friendship shut away—that might have been

A little help, a sunshine gleaming in Upon life's shadowy way—
Will come to us some day.

Some day the hands we once had scarce dare touch,

The eyes that shone too distant for our gaze,

Will stretch toward us with their eager help,

Will bend above us with their gentlest rays:

And voices now receding on the ear
Will nearer come and nearer, sweet and clear;

And dear things far away
Will be our own—some day.

—M. G. Brainard.

The danger of teaching the word of God in off-hand fashion is a real one. While appropriating its promises, we frequently disregard its precepts; and even when not consciously disobedient, we are all accustomed to satisfy ourselves with the minimum requirement of the Divine Law. To be really conscientious in regard to it does not at all mean that we must be morbidly introspective or perpetually condemning ourselves. It does mean, however, that we must be utterly sincere in consecration and in confession of conscious shortcomings, and altogether courageous in obedience. And as we keep His Law thus we find ourselves kept by His power.—J. S. Holden.

"Just in the measure in which we learn to live for spiritual and unseen things do we find contentment amid earth's trials and losses. If we live to please God, to build up Christ-like character in ourselves, and to lay up treasure in heaven, we shall not depend for happiness on the way things go with us here or on the measure of temporal good we have. The lower desires are crowded out by the higher. We can do without childhood's toys when we have manhood's better possessions; we need this world less as we get more of God and heaven into our heart."

Late Bulletins.

An editor in the Far West dropped into church for the first time in many years. The minister was in the very heart of the sermon. The editor listened for a while, and then rushed to his office.

"What are you fellows doing? What about the news from the seat of war?"

"What news?"

"Why, all this about the Egyptian Army being drowned in the Red Sea. The minister up at the church knows all about it, and you have not a word of it in our latest. Bustle round, you fellows, and get out an extra-special edition."—Tit-Bits.

"Better to stem with heart and hand

The roaring tide of life, than lie

Unmindful on its flowery strand

Of God's occasions drifting by.

Better with naked nerve to bear

The needles of this goading air,

Than in the lapse of sensual ease forego

The godlike power to do,

The godlike aim to know."

Gaining practical results calls for faith, not for understanding of mysteries.—J. F. Cowan.

Only Through Me!

Only through Me! . . . The clear, high call comes pealing

Above the thunders of the battle-plain;—

Only through Me can Life's red wounds find healing;

Only through Me shall earth have peace again.

Only through Me! Love's might, all might transcending,

Alone can draw the poison fangs of hate.

Yours the beginning! Mine a nobler ending—

Peace upon earth, and man regenerate!

Only through Me can come the great awakening!

Wrong cannot right the wrongs that wrong hath done;

Only through Me, all other gods forsaking,

Can ye attain the heights that must be won.

Can we not rise to such great height of glory?

Shall this vast sorrow spend itself in vain?

Shall future ages tell the woeful story—

Christ by His own was crucified again?

—John Oxenham.

The Church must interpret democracy at a time when democracy itself is on trial. She must show that without justice—full, free, essential—democracy cannot exist. She must preach in terms understood not only of the people but of them in the seats of authority a new doctrine of social righteousness. If war is to issue an outward triumph of democracy and an inner victory of injustice, entrenched in privilege and vested interest, autocracy will have won the day in other form. Right relations—between man and man, between class and class, are no less essential to an enduring peace than right relations between nations. The basis of peace is justice, and peace without justice cannot endure. Unless democracy insures justice, it must give place either to a triumphant autocracy or to something higher than democracy itself—an essential be-

PRAYER OF A FALLEN SOLDIER.

Found in the Pocket of a British Colonel After He Was Killed in Action in Flanders.

The prayer which follows was found in the pockets of a British colonel after he was killed in action in Flanders on October 11, 1917. It was sent to the New York Evening Post by one of his friends:

Father of all, Helper of the free, we pray with anxious hearts for all who fight on sea and land and in the air to guard our homes and liberty. Make clear the vision of our leaders and their counsels wise.

Into Thy care our ships and seamen we commend; guard them from chance sown mines and all the dangers of this war at sea, and as of old give them the victory.

To men on watch give vigilance, to those below calm sleep. Make strong our soldiers' hearts and brace their nerves against the bursting shrapnel and the unseen fire that lays the next man low.

In pity blind them from the sight of fallen comrades left upon the field.

May Christ Himself in Paradise receive the souls of those who pass through death.

Let not our soldiers ever doubt that they shall overcome the forces of that king who "seeks to wade through slaughter to a throne and shut the gate of mercy on mankind."

O God of Love and Pity have compassion on the wounded, make bearable their pain or send unconsciousness.

To surgeons and dressers give strength that knows no failing and skill that suffers not from desperate haste.

To tired men give time to rest.

Pity the poor beasts of service who suffer for man's wrong.

For us at home, let not that open shame be ours, that we forget to ease the sufferings of the near and dear of brave men in the fighting line.

O Thou, who makest human hearts the channel of Thy answers to our prayers, let loose a flood of sympathy and help for children and their mothers who wander desolate and suffering, leaving wrecked homes and fields and gardens trodden under ruthless feet.

With Thee who sufferest more than all, may we with reverence Thy burden share, for all are Thine and in Thine image made; they too are Thine who caused the wrong.

O Father, may this war be mankind's last appeal to force. Grant from the stricken earth, sown with Thy dead, an everlasting flower of peace shall spring, and all Thy world become a garden where the flower of Christ shall grow.

And this we beg for our dear Elder Brother's sake, who gave Himself for those He loved, Jesus Christ, our Lord. Amen.

The Indwelling God.

We have to treat ourselves as little children who are learning their A, B, C. The child makes hard work of it at first. He does not know A from B, or B from C, until he has seen them many times. It is a prodigious task for him at first even to spell m-a-n; but when he has mastered the alphabet, and knows the sound of the letters, and has learned to combine them in words, then what marvelous realms of knowledge are open to him! He can read the Bible and Shakespeare and Milton. The most abstruse thoughts of philosophy and metaphysics are in the books he can read. But first he must learn A, B, C.

So, as the little child learns to spell m-a-n, the Christian must learn to spell G-o-d. Over and over and over we must take time to think and to realize the alphabet of God. A, God is. B, God is within as well as beyond me. C, God is my loving Friend and Father.

Then, when we have really learned the A, B, C of the truth of the everywhere-present God, we can go on, step by step, to the highest reaches of the thought, until we can cry with St. Paul, "Thanks be to God, who giveth us the victory through our Lord Jesus Christ," victory over selfishness, over fear, over anxiety, over sickness, over trouble of every sort; for we shall realize that "neither death, nor life, nor things present, nor things to come, nor height, nor depth, nor any other creature, shall be able to separate us from the love of God," or from God Himself.—Rev. F. E. Clark, in Christian Endeavor World.

It seems to us a simple and purely elementary truth that God is holy love, but how could we have known anything about it without Christ and the revelation made by Him? Nature and history show us clearly the wise and mighty God, but where do they show Him as holy and loving.—R. Rothe.

BISHOP RANDOLPH PASSES BEYOND.

After an extreme illness of several weeks, following a gradual failing of his powers for a longer period, Bishop Alfred Magill Randolph, D. D., LL. D., D. C. L., fell on sleep at his home in Norfolk, Va., on Saturday, April 6, in the eighty-second year of his age, the sixtieth year of his ministry and the thirty-fifth year of his episcopate.

Bishop Randolph was born near Winchester, Va., August 31, 1836, the son of Robert Lee and Mary Buckner Thurston (Magill) Randolph. He was of that family line, descendants of the pioneer William Randolph, which is pre-eminent in America for the number of distinguished men which it has produced, including Marshall, Jefferson and Lee, to mention only the most illustrious. He graduated at the College of William and Mary and at the Theological Seminary in Virginia, and was ordained deacon before he reached the age of twenty-two. He was sent to assist the Rev. Edward C. McGuire, D. D., then nearing the close of his fruitful ministry at St. George's Church, Fredericksburg. Dr. McGuire died after only a few months, and Mr. Randolph served this important congregation alone, as deacon, until he arrived at the canonical age for ordination to the priesthood two years later. He continued as rector of St. George's until the bombardment of Fredericksburg in December, 1862, when his church was badly damaged and its congregation scattered. He then entered the Confederate army as a chaplain and served as such until the end of the war. In 1865-66 he was rector of Roanoke parish, Halifax County, and in October of that year became rector of Christ Church, Alexandria. After serving this church for about two years he became rector of Emmanuel Church, Baltimore. He was elected to a professorship in the Theological Seminary at Alexandria, but declined. His ministry of fifteen years in Baltimore was marked by every token of success. In May, 1883, he was elected Assistant Bishop of Virginia, the first of the three Coadjutors who served under the late Bishop Whittle, was consecrated in Emmanuel Church, Baltimore, in October of that year, and for nine years he ministered in his Apostolic office with truly Apostolic zeal and fervor throughout the undivided Diocese covering the whole State. Upon the division of the Diocese in 1892 he became Diocesan of the new Diocese of Southern Virginia; but the people of the older Diocese never ceased to look upon him as one of their own Bishops and no festal occasion or unusual function was complete without his beloved presence. For fourteen years he carried the burden of his large and rapidly growing Diocese alone, until in 1906 Bishop Beverley D. Tucker was consecrated as his Coadjutor. Six months ago the Right Rev. Arthur C. Thomson was consecrated Suffragan Bishop to assist these two in the work for which their united strength was unequal.

Such is the barest outline of the life of this great and godly man, so richly endowed and so fruitful in every good word and work. He had an eminently philosophical mind, enriched by a lifetime of close study and honest, reverent thought. As a theologian he had hardly a superior in the Church, and even in his old age he had few if any peers as a preacher. He wrote but one book, the Paddock Lectures for 1901 on the relations of "Reason, Faith and Authority in Christianity." He planned others, we believe, but his life was too full of the activities of his high office to allow leisure for such congenial tasks. The rich treasures of his mind were poured into his sermons and expended for those to whom he was immediately sent to minister. His masterly use of language, his facility in the choice of words, his incisive, sententious phrases so laden with meaning which stuck to the memory like burrs, have seldom been equaled; while with it all was the profound conviction of a great thinker and the warm glow of a devout and loving spirit. Bishop Randolph was at his greatest in the pulpit, but he was at his best in private converse when the sweetness and warmth of his genial mind and generous heart and the magnetism of his strong, winning personality could be felt in full play. To numberless souls the memory of moments of such intercourse are cherished among their spiritual treasures. Few Bishops have valued their office less for its dignities or more for its opportunities. Few have won the love of their clergy and people more completely or deserved it more fully. In the brilliant galaxy of Virginian Bishops he fills no second place, and his memory will long remain as a beacon and a benediction to the Church he served with such whole-souled devotion.

THE HOUSE OF BISHOPS IN SESSION.

The whole Church awaits with great interest the result of the deliberations of the Bishops who are meeting this week in special sessions. Besides the possible selection of one or more missionary bishops, and the subjects of less general concern which usually engage their attention, there are two matters of grave importance to come before them upon which very important issues may depend.

The Resignation of the Bishop of Utah.

The first is the case of Bishop Paul Jones, Missionary Bishop of Utah. Bishop Jones is classed as a Socialist, though that designation is so indefinite, and is claimed by men who are radical in such different degrees and probably from such differing views and motives, that it is as apt to misrepresent as to describe his position. An earnest, sincere and godly man, he is a pronounced pacifist not from motives of expediency but from profound conviction that war is always and everywhere absolutely wrong and opposed to the principles of Christianity and the teachings of Christ. As in conscience bound he has preached this tenet since the United States has been at war, not only in his own District but at organized meetings in other parts of the west promoted by men or organizations whose loyalty to the government was at least very questionable. This course created so unfavorable an impression in Utah that the Council of Advice laid the matter before the House of Bishops at their special meeting in October last, expressing the conviction that the Church in that District was being seriously injured by the course Bishop Jones was following and praying for relief. The House appointed a Commission of three bishops to look into the allegations and report upon them. This Commission held two meetings, heard the facts submitted by the Council of Advice and the defence of the Bishop himself, and published their findings with their judgment and advice that the Bishop of Utah ought to resign his jurisdiction. In accordance with a previous promise Bishop Jones offered his resignation at once, and it was primarily to act upon this that the present meeting of the Bishops was called.

As was to be expected, the report of the proceedings of the Commission, published by their authority, has met with much adverse criticism. It is not too much to say that in more than one particular it lays itself fairly open to such animadversions. It takes the form of an argument rather than that of a decision, and some of the points made leave much to be desired in the way of clearness of statement as well as relevancy to the question at issue. As we understand it neither Bishop Jones nor his opinions were on trial, nor yet his right to hold his opinions or holding to preach them. The question was whether, holding and teaching as he did, he ought to remain Bishop of Utah, or whether the welfare of the Church in that jurisdiction and a due regard for her consistency in teaching and harmony in action required his resignation or removal. The House of Bishops put him there and has full power to relieve him of his duties. We hope their decision will be announced very simply, with no discussion of the unwisdom of pacifism, the desirableness of reticence, the condition of public opinion or the limitations of Episcopal freedom of speech in time of war.

We have no doubt that Bishop Jones' resignation will be accepted; which will be a sufficient disavowal by the House of Bishops, and, so far as they can speak for it, by the Church, of the views in regard to the righteousness of the war which he has announced.

Episcopal Ordination for Chaplains of Non-Episcopal Churches.

Another matter, which the Presiding Bishop himself has signified his intention of bringing formally before the House of Bishops, is the proposal suggested in the Appeal to all the Churches to put forth some weeks ago by representative clergymen and laymen of nine denominations, which was published in our issue of February 2, and more definitely propounded in the letter addressed to the House of Bishops which we noticed briefly in our last issue, it having reached our desk just as we were going to press through the courtesy of Dr. Newman Smyth, from whose pen both of these communications doubtless came. He is well known as one of the leading ministers of the Congregational Churches in America and is in close touch with the movement towards Church Unity in all the religious bodies around us. His letter to the House of Bishops, covering nine pamphlet pages, is written in full knowledge and recognition of the position of the Episcopal Church in the matter of Episcopal ordination to the sacred ministry, and of the views held therein as to the necessity of such ordination for the regular or valid administration of the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper. This is the vital point to be met, and is thus stated:

"We ask for such declaration and action as the Bishops are at liberty to take on the assumption of the theory, commonly prevalent among you, of an Apostolic authority inherent in and continued through the order of the Episcopate, and furthermore, which is offered as a basis of reconciliation to other communions in the fourth proposal of the Lambeth Quadrilateral: viz., 'the historical Episcopate locally adapted in the methods of its administration to the varying needs of the nations and peoples called of God into the unity of the Church.' We are asking for some specific and acceptable adaptation of your administration of the Episcopate to the present needs of the nations. . . ."

The plea then is that our Bishops confer Episcopal ordination upon the chaplains of other Churches, in addition to that they have received.

"This is not a question as to what different views may be cherished among believers, or comprehended in a credal confession; it concerns deeply and vitally the assurance of grace which many believers would have in communing with their fellow-believers in different churches. It lies, in a word, close to the heart of Christian communion . . . At this point of communion where in spirit and intent all Christian believers are one, in our ecclesiastical requirements and habits of devotion we have fallen apart. . . . We recognize the fact that many devout Christians from their training and life-long habits would not feel well assured of sacramental grace unless the Eucharist were communicated to them by a presbyter who had been ordained by a Bishop.

"The practical question then reduces itself to this: can we join in some act which may manifest due regard to the scruples of many devout believers, yet without doing violence to the views and habits of many others?"

"This practical question of mutual Christian charity and comprehension may be put concretely as follows: some wounded or dying Episcopal officer or sailor on a battleship where a non-Episcopal chaplain is serving and where no Episcopal clergyman is available, wishes to receive the sacrament. No one not ordained by a Bishop can fully meet what he feels to be his need in extremis. Shall his own Church deny him in this extremity his last dying prayer? Shall it fail to make any possible provision for such emergency? Or shall any other Church refuse any act of possible compliance that would enable its minister to render this Christian service? This and similar needs of service our chaplains have to meet . . . Our navy is in action; our soldiers are already in the field; shall the Churches delay to provide from their united means a full equipment for every chaplain and to send him with all possible authority and grace which any communion may bestow?"

The letter discusses further the possible forms which such Episcopal ordination of chaplains belonging to other Churches might take. As to the ecclesiastical standing of such ministers to whom joint authorization had been given, they would remain as before, with the denominations to which they belong, and have no right to exercise their ministry in the Episcopal Church unless specifically licensed thereto. The letter continues with the expression of the belief that such joint authentication of chaplains would be a definite manifestation of the will to unity and would lead further in that direction. "We would have succeeded in making as a war measure a precedent for ourselves to follow after the war." It closes with this fine passage which must find an echo in the heart of every Churchman:

"In presenting to you this appeal for present action we are not unmindful of the fact that the reunion alone of the churches of the Reformation would form but a part of the reunion of Christendom. We too may share your hope that at some future time in the Divine fulfilment of history the Anglican Church may be found not merely acting in a mediating function, but much more rather in a representative position, comprehensive of all the religious forces of the ages of the Reformation, standing possibly in some future Ecumenical Council for the supreme faith and the guiding principles of liberty and loyalty which are our common heritage, and upholding the belief, which has never been wholly lost throughout our Protestant divisions and which all our creeds confess, in the one Holy Catholic Church.

"In the Appeal which we now submit we have urged that we take counsel not of our fears but of our hopes. For the history of former efforts for Church comprehension shows that the one often fatal obstacle has been the fears which different parties or communions entertained of one another. In mutual distrust they had not faith enough to believe that among them all the truth could take care of itself. . . . Shall we suffer Unity to fail again at this day, with the stupendous world-work to be accomplished by this generation, because there shall not be found among us that perfect love that casteth out all fear?"

We confess to a feeling of intense and anxious interest as to the response of the House of Bishops to this generous and noble overture. We consider it one of the most significant of the many indications which point to a truer harmony and more fruitful peace for the Church, the nation and the world as the result of the sore travail through which we are now passing. That our Church, through her Bishops, should confess to impotence or, far worse, to indifference in the face of such a challenge is inconceivable, and we await their answer with hope and confidence.

Christ came to bring man's spirit into immediate contact with God's Spirit; to sweep away everything intermediate. In lonely union, face to face, man's spirit and God's Spirit must come together. It is a grand thought! Let us aspire to this, to greatness, goodness! So will our spirits mingle with the spirit of the Everlasting.—F. W. Robertson.

Book Notices

(All books reviewed at any time in this column may be ordered at the publisher's price given, plus postage 15 cents, from the book department of the Southern Churchman.)

A Manual of Mystic Verse. Being a Choice of Meditative and Mystic Poems, Made and Annotated by Louise Collier Willcox. New York. E. P. Dutton & Co. Pp. 317. $1.25.

From the thirteenth century to the present the compiler of this goodly little volume has ranged in search of the best expressions of religious feeling in verse. A first edition was published seven years ago, under the title, "A Manual of Spiritual Fortification." While over-cumbersome, the old title was not an inapt description of the purpose of the collection. It has been made with great discrimination and contains many poems of excellent quality from obscure sources which would remain quite unknown to the general reader unless gathered in such an anthology as this.

Memoirs of Cardinal de Retz. Written by Himself. In two volumes. Pp. 440 and 357.

Taras Bulba, and Other Tales. By Nikolai V. Gogol. Pp. 311. Six stories of old Russia. Introduction by John Cournos.

Numbers 735, 736 and 740 of Everyman's Library, published by E. P. Dutton & Company, New York, at forty-five cents a volume; a series with which no one wishing for the best in literature of all description at a most moderate price can afford to be unacquainted.

Man's Supreme Inheritance. Conscious Guidance and Control in Relation to Human Evolution and Civilization. By F. Matthias Alexander. With an Introduction by Professor John Dewey. New York. E. P. Dutton & Company. Pp. 371. $2.00.

The shortcomings of the civilization of to-day are obvious. We do not boast of it as we did a few years ago, seeing the uses to which men are putting their achievements in the fields of science and material acquirements. The author of the work before us seeks to trace the reasons of our comparative failure and to suggest the remedy. Very broadly speaking, man has not gone too far in his evolution on certain lines, as some would have it, but not far enough on other lines to preserve his proper balance. Personally and as a society his control of himself has not kept pace with his conquest in other fields. The remedy proposed is the application of certain principles of "psycho-physical guidance by conscious control" which are elucidated at large and are doubtless admirable, especially in their application to the education of children. But we need more than this.

Books Received.

Under Fire. The Story of a Squad. By Henri Barbusse. Translated by Fitzwater Wray. E. P. Dutton & Company. Pp. 358. $1.50. Varied and virile narratives of war life as it comes to the soldiers of France, graphically told but not always pleasant to read.

To Arms! An Impression of the Spirit of France. Authorized Translation from the French of Marcelle Tinayre, by Lucy H. Humphrey. E. P. Dutton & Company. Pp. 302. $1.50. A story of the heroic days of the mobilization, when the soul of France shone forth with such splendor.

The Master of the Hills. A Tale of the Georgia Mountains. By Sarah Johnson Cocke. Pp. 327. $1.50. A Virginian author writes sympathetically this story of the Southern mountaineers.

Civilized Commercialism. By Ernest G. Stevens. E. P. Dutton & Company. 1917. Pp. 252. $1.25. A plea for the application of democratic principles to business, which stands, as the author asserts, as a Chinese wall across democracy's march toward full freedom and fraternity. "Democratic principles must drive business privilege out of business, or business privilege will drive democratic principles out of our political system." A most timely topic for consideration by business itself if it wishes to preserve its place in the scheme of things.

Booklets and Pamphlets.

Lord Teach Us to Pray. By Diana Ponsonby. Longmans, Green & Company. Twenty cents. An excellent little series of prayers, intercessions and meditations, prepared for a Study Week of a Girl's Diocesan Association, and well adapted for use on any similar occasion.

The Gospel of the Kingdom. An Outline for Missionary Study of the Bible. By Bishop Rhinelander. The John C. Winston Company. Philadelphia.

Conquering and to Conquer. A Mystery Play. Forty cents. And Suggestions for presenting the Play. Twenty cents. By Marie E. J. Hobart.

The Great Trail. An Indian Mystery Play. Twenty-five cents. By the same author. Published by the Educational Department of the Board of Missions. Mrs. Hobart is a well known writer of works of this character, and those looking for the best in this line would do well to examine these; missionary in purpose, Churchly in teaching and of fine literary tone.

An Epiphany Mystery Play. By the Rev. Carroll Lund Bates, Rome, N. Y., from the author. A shorter play, of the same character as the above; well conceived and written.

A PLEA FOR THE FREE CHURCH.

Mr. Editor: When practically all the world is fighting to the death for democracy, when the Church is taking so large a part in formulating thought, when men's hearts are failing them for fear, when to many souls faith itself seems dependent on the outcome of this terrific struggle between light and darkness, it seems strangely at variance with the spirit of the times that at any church edifice in this country one should feel embarrassed by the necessity of asking for a seat. And yet this is precisely what happens in any church that uses the autocratic, aristocratic anachronistic system of owned, rented or assigned pews.

Can the imagination conceive of ushers at any of the sermons delivered on the shore of the Galilean lake? Does any one believe that the publicans had all to be seated before the fisher folk could get a place? St Peter said, "Use hospitality one to another without grudging." Did he mean one kind for our own homes and another kind for God's house? Is there a single person who reads this letter who would ask guests to his house and then say, "You will please wait in the hall until my family arrives because each one of them wishes his accustomed chair. When they are all comfortably seated you may enter." Yet this is done, in effect, in every church that is not absolutely free. In my opinion a church should be so free that any individual of any stratum of society would feel comfortable and at ease in any seat therein.

The functions of the ushers should change and they should be no more than a reception committee, who should have power to say, with a wave of the hand, "This is God's house. You are welcome. Walk in and take any seat that meets your mood or suits your fancy." I know from years of experience just the effect on people's minds, particularly strangers, of a restricted sitting, and I grieve to say that in this respect this Church of ours is one of the chiefest offenders, and as a consequence one of the greatest sufferers. I have, however, seen great improvement in recent years. After this war is over there must follow general reconstruction, commercial, social and religious. Commercially we are going to be greater, socially we are going to be more democratic and religiously we are going to be more tolerant and charitable, and as I am convinced that one of the beneficent results is going to be a tremendous increase in real Christianity, so I hope that every church in this country will be as free as was the open air at the first sermons preached by Christ Himself.

The Pension Fund.

The Southern Churchman squarely challenges the Church Pension Fund to show cause why it does not provide for the aged and disabled clergy and their dependents, who became such before March 1, 1917.

Inasmuch as it declared $5,000,000 to be sufficient to provide for the accrued liabilities of the then active clergy and did so after figuring on the problem for the space of two years with the assistance of the best actuarial brains in this country, and inasmuch as it actually received $3,750,000 in excess of the $5,000,000 asked for, an explanation at least is in order and is the just right of contributors to the fund.

We gave our money with the understanding that all dependent clergy of the Church would be provided for; and if all of them are not provided for by this Pension Fund Commission, there is no other source from which any of them can look for relief.—Texas Churchman.

THE TESTIMONY OF NAPOLEON BONAPARTE TO THE DIVINITY OF OUR LORD.

If the first Napoleon was not a theologian, he was at least a man whom vast experience had taught what kind of forces can really produce a lasting effect upon mankind, and under what conditions they may be expected to do so.

A time came when the good providence of God had chained down that great but ambitious spirit to the rock of St. Helena; and the conqueror of civilized Europe had leisure to gather up the results of his unparalleled life, and to ascertain with an accuracy not often attainable by monarchs or conquerors his own true place in history.

When conversing, as was his custom, about the great men of the ancient world, and comparing himself with them, he turned, it is said, to Count Montholon with the inquiry, "Can you tell me who Jesus Christ was?" The question was declined, and Napoleon proceeded, "Well, then, I will tell you. Alexander, Charmagne, Caesar and I myself have founded great empires, but upon what did these creations depend? Upon force. Jesus, alone founded His Kingdom upon love, and to this very day millions would die for Him. * * * I think I understand something of human nature; and I tell you all these were men, and I am a man; none else is like Him. Jesus Christ was more than man. I have inspired multitudes with such an enthusiastic devotion that they would have died for me * * * but to do this it was necessary that I should be visibly present, with the electric influence of my looks, of my words, of my voice. When I saw men and spoke to them, I lifted up the flame of self-devotion in their hearts. * * * Christ alone has succeeded in so raising the mind of man towards the unseen that it becomes insensible to the barriers of time and space. Across a chasm of eighteen hundred years Jesus Christ makes a demand which is beyond all others difficult to satisfy; He asks for that which a philosopher may often seek in vain at the hands of his friends, or a father of his children, or a bride of her spouse, or a man of his brother. He asks for the human heart; He will have it entirely to Himself. He demands it unconditionally, and forthwith His demand is granted. Wonderful! In defiance of time and space, the soul of man, with all its powers and faculties, becomes an annexation to the empire of Christ. All who sincerely believe in Him experience that remarkable, supernatural love towards Him. This phenomenon is unaccountable, it is altogether beyond the scope of man's creative powers. Time, the great destroyer, is powerless to extinguish this sacred flame; time can neither exhaust its strength, nor put a limit to its range. This is it which strikes me most; I have often thought of it. This it is which proves to me quite convincingly the Divinity of Jesus Christ."

(The above quotation, sent us by a friend as most appropriate for these times, is from Liddon's Bampton Lectures on the Divinity of Our Lord. Canon Liddon gives the authorities, which seem indisputable, for accepting this as a true account of this well known testimony of the deposed emperor.—Ed. S. C.)

LETTER FROM THE WAR COMMISSION.

To the Clergy and Laity of the Church:
Your War Commission gratefully announces that the amount thus far received in money and pledges from various contributions and from the offerings of Sunday, January 27th, is about $600,000. The ministrations of the Church are now following the men and boys of the army and navy here and across the seas: Chaplains are equipped; voluntary chaplains and lay workers are in every large camp, in this country; our soldiers and sailors know that the Church is with and behind them, supporting, comforting and inspiring them.

Your Commission now ventures to send this additional message throughout the Church.

When the nation entered the war, one year ago, its object, as stated in the message of the President, was "to vindicate the principles of peace and justice in the life of the world, as against selfish or autocratic power." We gave this assurance to our sister nations, "We have no selfish ends to serve. We desire no conquest, no dominion." "We are but one of the champions of the rights of mankind. We shall be satisfied when those rights have been made as secure as the faith and freedom of the nation can make them." "To such a task we can dedicate our lives and our fortunes, everything that we are and everything that we have." When peace, justice and the rights of mankind are at stake, the Church's course is clear, her decision made. We have entered upon a holy crusade and for its consummation we have dedicated everything that we are and have.

A year has passed in preparation and action; our boys and men are upon the battle line. Now, and for the coming months, the coming years, if God will, the people of Christ's Church will bring into play every resource of physical strength, intelligence, and moral and spiritual force to carry the crusade through.

The exalted motive lifts every word and deed. If we keep our motive pure, our hearts true and our lives clean, nothing that we may do in this war is sordid or unworthy. Every command, contract and commission, every stroke of labor and forward step of invention, every charge of infantry and shot of artillery rises to the realm of spiritual warfare, lifting the souls of men above bitterness and hate to the heights of great duties and heavenly principles.

As your representative in war activities, we venture to remind you of these definite duties.

First. The third Liberty Loan makes its demand on every member of Christ's Church. The strength, the lives, and the victories of our boys and men depend directly upon their munitions, barracks, hospitals, ships and supplies; and these depend directly upon your economies and sacrifices in subscribing to the Liberty Loan.

Second. For the support of our Allies and for our own defense, the Allies and all our people must have nutritious food; the soldiers and sailors must have the best food on which to fight. The men and women of the Church will not wait for others to be frugal. They will lead in frugality; they will work upon the farms and gardens "for the vindication of peace and justice."

Third. To whatever demands the authorities make—the conservation of fuel and light, the restriction of travel, and of the comforts as well as the luxuries of daily life; to whatever call for service in the Red Cross, shop or factory, in the home, at the rear or the front, the members of Christ's Church will respond.

These are days for quick obedience and cheerful action, for self-discipline of those at home as well as at the front. These are days for a stout heart and a steady nerve. We have undertaken the crusade; in the steps of the Saviour we "must walk to-day and to-morrow and the day following."

Beneath and behind these great motives and high deeds, we have the support of a steadfast faith in God. He bids us to move forward. In the home, in the church, in the barrack, out upon the field of corn or the field of battle, every Christian will lift up heart and life to God. To every man, woman and child of the Church the command comes to take his part in the crusade. We will every one of us give answer to the challenge of our Lord, "He that findeth his life shall lose it; and he that loseth his life for my sake shall find it."

WILLIAM LAWRENCE,
Bishop of Massachusetts, Chairman of the War Commission.
April 6, 1918.

THE ARCHBISHOP OF YORK ON THE NEW LIBERTY LOAN.

"Come to England and France quickly with money, ships and food. There is a terrible strain upon my countrymen in the trenches. We are not whining and asking for sympathy, but you will be cheering us to new hope, if we know that all the power and resources of your country will be given to the future of civilization.

"You cannot send as many men as you wish, but you can send other things. Send money. Where men cannot go, money can. The ocean cannot stop it. Your dollars are the only bullets that will never miss their mark. You are going to have a great Liberty Loan soon. Put all the vigor into it that you can. Don't delay. We are asking you as brothers and partners, to come and help us. Every man, woman and child can help in this fight, to free the world from the menace of German domination.

"We have to settle whether the spirit of irresponsible autocracy or the spirit of freedom is to prevail among the nations of the world. So vast and fundamental an issue naturally draws all the free nations of the world together. It must be settled now and forever, cost what it may. The world must decide whether it will submit to the domination of a spirit which, if it were to prevail, would plunge the nations of the world into a long, rest-such an issue there can be no such death and destruction were more ramthing as compromise. We must be worthy of our task. We must recover for the world the atmosphere of freedom."

ARMENIA'S TRAGEDY.

Samuel T. Dutton.

Since 1914 the world has witnessed its surfeit of tragedies. There has been the wanton, heart-breaking tragedy of Belgium, shorn of its splendors and robbed of its industries; the war-torn tragedy of Poland, with conquering armies sweeping one after another over its beautiful fields and through its stately old towns; the tragedy of Serbia, invaded from the north by the barbarians and ravaged from end to end. But of all the tragedies of the war, that of Armenia is the most harrowing. Here the cup of bitterness flows over. As if the history of this afflicted people were not gloomy and unhappy enough, this latest page has surpassed everything before it, in horror and despair.

The Armenian race scattered all over Asia Minor, Syria, Palestine, the Russian Caucasus and Persia has for centuries been subject to suffering. The terrible plight of these people to-day beggars description. They have not only suffered from invading armies, and been driven from their homes by the conquerors, but they have been set upon by their own neighbors; they have had to bear again the fearful persecution of the Turk, sustained and strengthened by the thorough-going co-operation of his German superiors; they have been massacred and deported and tortured.

In the Orient, where initiative and efficiency are often lacking, the Armenian has shown a remarkable industry. He has loved learning and has set up, with the small funds at his disposal, schools for his children throughout the Ottoman Empire, when the government has flagrantly neglected to provide for the education of its own people. The Armenian has kept tenaciously to his religion, which has symbolized to him his national unity. He has developed industries and has shown unusual ability at finance and commerce. He is pre-eminently law-abiding. For all these things he has been hated and persecuted and last of all this greatest of afflictions has fallen upon him. The Syrian, too, equally a victim of this same wholesale deportation, has suffered untold persecution. It is said that in the region of the Lebanon death and destruction were more rampant than anywhere else.

It is difficult to grasp the purpose of a government in this twentieth century, which has attempted to annihilate a whole people. For many years previous to the war, hatred and distrust existed between the Turks and the Armenians. Add to this the new idea of Turkification of the empire which has taken possession of the Young Turk leaders, and perhaps it is possible to understand in some degree how the idea of the elimination of the Armenians, as unfit for complete Turkification, was conceived. The idea has been carried out with primitive barbarity. Deportation, massacres and disorganization, with the natural results of starvation and disease have been the methods. What makes it all the more appalling is the fact that it was organized by a so-called government and put through by government officials. It is generally agreed that Germany will be held ultimately guilty in this crime.

The Armenian and Syrian Relief Committee in America, six thousand miles away from this pitiful scene of devastation and pain, is trying to stem the increasing tide of human suffering by every means in its power. The history of the growth of this committee, with the self-sacrifice of its workers at home as well as in the field, and with the co-operation of generous Americans, makes fascinating reading. To-day centers of relief have been organized in scores of cities throughout these desolate lands. Constantinople, Tiflis, Jerusalem, Teheran, Bagdad, Cairo, Tabriz and Beirut each is a nucleus of a whole region of relief numbering scores of small towns and villages in a radius of many miles. With the occupation of parts of Palestine by the British, opportunity for relief is growing. Armenians and Syrians are daily escaping to the haven of the Russian Caucasus of the British conquered territory, begging for bread and clothing. Missionaries and consuls work in out of the way places, risking, indeed some of them giving, their lives for this splendid work of the good Samaritan. They constantly write for more funds;

We must not only take heed for the present but must look to the future. America has taken up in some measure the burden of Armenia. The freest of the nations holds out its hands to the most downtrodden. In the future there will be more and greater work to do, the constructive work of rehabilitation, so that properly speaking we might say that our interest in Armenia has only begun. It is to increase with the years and be of a wide and permanent nature. Already we can see that time coming. And let us hope that out of the depths, the broken people of the Bible lands, which have given to the West the precious heritage of its religion, these people may be raised again to a life of peace, to a sense of security, to an assurance that their terrible trials and afflictions and sufferings are over for all time.

GIRLS' FRIENDLY SOCIETY.

Sir H. Rider Haggard, speaking to the English G. F. S. at its Imperial Conference last year, said of the changed conditions that will prevail after the war: "A great Veiled Face sits before us, and the Veil is going to be torn away. What the Face beneath is none of us know . . . what it is will depend largely upon the wisdom or unwisdom of the women of the country."

Many forces are shaping this Face. Political power is being fast given to women, industrial opportunities, undreamed of a few years ago, are already open before them, and will be so more and more as the war goes on, while on the other hand the continuation of it will make homemaking and motherhood the lot of the few instead of the many; what effect these and the other conditions prevailing will have upon the Face of the woman of the future we can picture in a dozen different ways; it may be terrible with the frenzy of social unrest and class hatred; sorrowful and stern from an unduly heavy burden of sorrow and work; wild and dissipated from the mad search for forgetfulness in pleasure and amusement, cold and hard from selfish effort to escape care and responsibility; cruel and relentless from the struggle for money; or, tender, trustful, resolute and strong from faith that God is mighty and will prevail, and the belief that all things work together for good to them that love Him.

We must believe that such a beautiful Face is behind the Veil, and we must teach others to realize such a possibility.

The Archbishop of York, speaking to the G. F. S. in New York, told us that we must give our girls a high sense of honor. "If that sense fails, nothing will succeed. If it succeeds almost nothing else is necessary. The only way to make them rise to the height of the occasion is to link their sense of honour with the memory of the victorious Jesus Christ. . . . The supreme lesson to be taught is that for men and women there is only one sovereign remedy against temptation. 'Put ye on the Lord Jesus Christ and make no provision for the flesh to fulfil the lust thereof.'"

As Bishop Perry said at the same meeting: "The excitement in the hearts of the women of our country is capable of a great danger, it is capable of a great good. Is it not possible for us to give it spiritual direction, to lay down deep the foundations of honour and truth and purity? Let us create a new spiritual sense in our Church, strengthened by forces of friendship and love which will result in a new spiritual awakening among the men and women of our land. St. Paul wrote from the front to the rear as he was carrying the line onward to the West from Jerusalem to Greece, from Greece to Rome, and from Rome onward through Europe, to those who had position in the lines of reserves: 'We live, if ye stand fast in the Lord.' It is the message to the supporting line, to those who are to work for the moral and spiritual power of the country. They will live indeed, whether they have to lay down those lives of theirs or not; they will live, if we stand fast in our faith."

This is the lesson that we, as a religious Society, have to teach; this is the faith by which we must hold, and by which we must live if the work of the G. F. S. is to mould the Face of the Woman of To-morrow, whom we, as Associates, touch now in the Girl of To-day.—G. F. S. Associates Record.

Presbyterians of the North discussed for a time the holding of no General Assembly this year, owing to the war. Finally, almost wholly because of their own war plans, they determined upon holding it, and fixed upon Columbus as the place. Friction developed over their War Commission, in some part because of men put in to manage it, so it is admitted, but in great part because of alleged duplication of the work of others. In common with practically every body, Presbyterians are this year saying war time is no time to duplicate efforts, certainly not with a sectarian spirit. The Columbus Assembly will, it is said, reorganize the Commission, put it into better working shape, and stop criticisms that are now coming from pastors in the Middle West. Those who seek the remaking of the Commission acknowledge that much good work has been accomplished, and will ask the Columbus Assembly to endorse it to that extent.

Presbyterian missionary finance will come out better than was at one time expected, so conditions indicate at the very moment of closing the books. The foreign work will close the year with all appropriations met, and about $400,000 in excess, raised to meet unusual conditions of money exchange and high prices. It was sought to secure an excess of $500,000, but it is not believed that goal has been attained. The home work is likely to fall $150,000 into debt unless late returns pull up the figures. Presbyterians say that upon them falls a very large share of the burden of European relief, and that a most remarkable feature of the war times in America is the extent to which Christian people give money to all causes.

The Great Commission

The Church of England and Her Missions: A Splendid Example.

The Church of England still maintains its marvelous record for missionary giving in spite of the heavy drains of war. During 1917 the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel received $70,000 more than during 1916. There was a gratifying increase from every source except legacies. The fact that these fell off $10,000, as compared with 1916 emphasizes all the more the splendid giving of the living donors. The total income for the year was $1,215,000. Only in three other years has the income risen to a higher level, and in each of these some specially munificent bequest raised the total beyond comparison. Never in any previous year have the offerings from parishes and the gifts from individuals been so large as during 1917. The year, with all its difficulties and disappointments, its trials and sorrows, will stand out on the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel records as a period remarkable for devotion to the great cause which the venerable society has for two hundred and seventeen years so successfully promoted.

"We begin our new year's work," says Bishop Montgomery, "in a spirit of thanksgiving and hope. It is easier now than ever before to plead the cause of the Church beyond the seas. Only those who do not care to have a part in Christ's final victory can venture to refuse to respond to His command, 'Go ye therefore, and teach all nations!'"

The Missionary Schoolmaster.

Thirty-two years ago a steamer anchored at Woosung, at the mouth of the Yangtse, to discharge passengers for Shanghai. One of them was a young American by the name of Hawks Pott from New York, a missionary sent out by the Episcopal Church to join the staff of St. John's College. But the college was no college at all; it was only a boarding-school with sixty boys, all of whom were on a charity basis. Even their shoes were given to them. The prospects for a real college must have seemed rather dim.

However, about that time the Chinese of Shanghai began to wake up to the necessity of learning English. The foreigners were coming there in large numbers to do business. They had not the patience to learn the language of the Chinese; so some of the wealthy Chinese merchants of the city went to St. John's to ask that their boys be admitted to learn the foreigners' language. "Of course, you understand that St. John's is a missionary school?" Yes, they understood that, and were willing to take the chances of their sons being converted. "Very well, then; they may come if you are willing to pay for the teaching." The day those boys entered the school as paying pupils marked a new stage in the history of the institution.

Recently I had the privilege of calling on this missionary who was put ashore at Woosung thirty-two years ago. I found him in the president's office, the director of a university which has 468 students, 42 teachers, and as attractive a campus as I have seen the world over.

"Let me see," said Dr. Pott, running through the pages of the St. John's alumni catalogue; "of course, you know Wellington Koo. He is one of my boys. Then there is Alfred Sze, the Chinese minister in London, and W. W. Yen, who has been the Chinese minister in Berlin; they also are graduates of St. John's."

Not a bad record, that, for a single missionary college to have tutored the three foreign representatives of China upon whom has fallen the heaviest burden of Chinese diplomacy during these last few critical years!

Dr. Pott modestly continued through his alumni lists, mentioning a score or more of names of his graduates who are now occupying places of trust and great responsibility; men like Dr. Tsur, president of Tsing Hua College, where the "indemnity" students are selected and prepared for America, and the president of the Hanyang Iron Works.

This story suggests something of the general character of the background out of which the last three decades of missionary education have come, not merely in China, but elsewhere in the Orient. Most mission colleges were, in the beginning, colleges only in name. In fact, they were charity boarding-schools. Their primary purpose, like that of our American colleges in the early days, was to raise up and train a literate clergy. They had to take their pupils unprepared, wherever they could find them. They drew largely from the coolie, outcast and servant classes. But to-day if you were permitted to attend the alumni dinner at the Doshisha in Kyoto, or to visit Peking University, or the Anglo-Chinese colleges at Foochow, or Singapore, the American College at Madura, the Christian College at Lucknow, or Forman College at Lahore, you would meet some of the most distinguished and influential men of the entire Orient.

The Orient now wants, more than anything else in the world, better educational facilities. Ask a citizen of any Oriental country what three things he most desires for his people. Two of the answers may vary according to the local conditions, but one is uniformly the same from Sapporo to Hyderabad: better schools. Not all schools are so favorably situated as St. John's in Shanghai. There are hundreds of millions of people in Asia whose entire family income is not equal to the $220 Mexican (approximately $150 American currency) which St. John's is able to charge for annual tuition. It is not the aim of every school to become self-supporting. The glory of the Christian ideal has always been that its primary care is for the poor and unfortunate. But every year the mission schools are able to shift their work more from the purely charity basis toward one of self-respecting independence. Western education is now so highly prized that pupils and parents alike are willing to make superlative sacrifices to acquire it. Indeed, the graduates of mission colleges, and even natives who have not had the privileges of such education, are already beginning to make large gifts for purposes of endowment. Only last year Mr. Katsuka, of Tokyo, gave $100,000 to the Methodist Aoyama Gakuin of that city. The missionary schoolmaster is now sailing, not against the current, but with it.—Tyler Dennett, in Asia. Journal of the American Asiatic Association.

A Beautiful Humility.

A remarkable story comes from the Church in Japan. In order to make way for the election of a Japanese bishop, the English Bishop Cecil Boutflower, Bishop of South Tokyo, has resigned his See. But he is not expecting to retire from work in Japan. Leaving one of the most dignified of its bishoprics to be filled by one of the Japanese race, Bishop Boutflower intends to stay on, if he be wanted as Suffragan to that Bishop, with charge of work among Europeans in that Diocese.

Here is a Christian humility such as must challenge the admiration of the world. Voluntarily to give up his Diocese, and then humbly to serve as assistant to a newly consecrated Bishop much his junior and of another race, is one of the noblest things recorded in modern missionary annals.—American Messenger.

To give life for a worthy end is what we all want to do. A brief service, if it be concentrated, is more full often than a long service. The great lesson of the moment is that men must not, cannot live for private interests. They must contribute themselves to the well being of the social whole, if they are going to taste the full flavor of life. No one who fails to live for the whole could be happy in the multitude which no man could number, toward which we are all speeding with unflinching certainty.—Bishop Brent.

Church Intelligence

Armenian and Syrian Relief.

A private letter just received from the American Committee for Armenian and Syrian Relief says:

"You will be interested to know that reports just received assure us of the continued effectiveness of relief distribution throughout Western Asia in spite of many political complications. Our workers are all reported well and enjoying the increased confidence and, in instances, the co-operation of officials in their distinctly humanitarian work.

"While scores and perhaps hundreds are dying every day of starvation and malnutrition, we have the satisfaction of knowing that other thousands are being kept alive by the funds which we are able to send."

MARYLAND.

Rt. Rev. J. G. Murray, D. D., Bishop.

The Archbishop of York Visits Baltimore.

The Archbishop of York spent Wednesday, April 3, in Baltimore, motor-ing over with the Rev. Dr. Birchhead and Mr. W. Cabell Bruce, who had gone to Washington to bring him to Baltimore. He made a brief address at the noon day service at Old St. Paul's Church, and after luncheon went to the Fifth Regimental Armory to the exhibition, "Over There," where he also made a brief address. He expressed his amazement at the wondrous beauty and appeal to the imagination of the exhibit, and his appreciation of its spirituality, and its significance. After his short address at the armory, he planted an English elm on the grounds of the Pro-Cathedral. The principal address of his stay in Baltimore was made at a large mass meeting held at the Lyric on Wednesday evening, just before his departure for Pittsburgh.

In St. Paul's Church, Baltimore, the Rev. Arthur B. Kinsolving, D. D., rector, the attendance at all the services on Good Friday numbered about two thousand. The Three Hour Commemoration of the Passion was taken by the rector with the largest attendance in ten years, the church being filled, with many standing. On Easter Day and Maunday Thursday six hundred and sixty persons received the Holy Communion in St. Paul's Church and five hundred and fifty at St. Paul's Chapel, making twelve hundred and ten.

Bishop Murray recently confirmed seventy-three persons in St. Paul's Parish, of which forty-three were at the chapel. The Rev. Frank H. Staples is in charge of the chapel, which has about two hundred men working in munitions factories. There are one hundred and twenty men in the army and navy from the parish.

SOUTHERN VIRGINIA.

Rt. Rev. B. D. Tucker, D. D., Coadjutor
Rt. Rev. A. C. Thomson, D. D., Suffragan

Death of Bishop Randolph.

The Right Rev. Alfred Magill Randolph, D. D., LL. D., D. C. L., Bishop of the Diocese of Southern Virginia, died Saturday morning, April 6, at 9:15, at the Norfolk Protestant Hospital, where he had been critically ill for the past two months.

The funeral service was held on Tuesday morning from St. Luke's Church, Norfolk, and was conducted by the Rt. Rev. B. D. Tucker, D. D., the Rt. Rev. A. C. Thomson, D. D., the Rt. Rev. Joseph B. Cheshire, D. D., the Rev. David W. Howard, D. D., rector of St. Luke's, and the Rev. C. Braxton Bryan, D. D., of Petersburg. The body was taken to Richmond on the eleven o'clock train for interment in Hollywood Cemetery.

The funeral party was met in Richmond by Bishop Robert A. Gibson, D. D., Bishop William Cabell Brown, D. D., the Clergy of Richmond, and many others from Petersburg, the Theological Seminary, and elsewhere, and a large concourse of sorrowing friends. Proceeding at once to Hollywood, the service at the grave was read by Bishop Tucker. Interment was made in the midst of a violent storm of rain and wind which, however, could not deter those wishing to pay their last tribute of respect to the beloved dead.

Bishop Randolph is survived by his widow, Mrs. Sallie Hoxton Randolph, and two sons and three daughters.

Opening of Christ Church, Roanoke.

Christ Church was opened for its first service on Easter Day. The Rt. Rev. B. D. Tucker, D. D., who, with the rector, the Rev. George Otis Mead, conducted the service, was unstinted in his praise of the beautiful, substantial, well appointed church and parish house. Both are built of blue and stone, trimmed with white Indiana cut limestone. The church is finished throughout in oak, which is stained a soft-toned gray. Pews, choir stalls and chancel furniture in oak to match. The vestibules, choir and sanctuary are laid with Scotch brown tile, with dark blue marble for border and steps; hardwood floors, windows of Cathedral and antique glass set in stone mullions; a handsome two manuel organ of splendid volume and tone. The parish house is of two stories finished in clear pine. The first floor is for assembly, with class rooms forming a part of the assembly room. In connection is the library and secretaries' room. Upstairs is the primary department of three rooms, graduate department of three rooms, ladies' parlor, robing rooms for the choir and a kitchen. Then a large attic over all, which is so necessary for a parish house.

The choir of thirty-six voices, directed and trained by Mr. Gordon H. Baker, a vestryman of Christ Church, rendered the service magnificently. The Bishop preached an inspiring and hopeful sermon from St. John 2:19, "Destroy this temple, and in three days I will raise it up." After the sermon, the Bishop confirmed a class of thirty-two persons.

The total cost of the church and parish house is about $55,000. Add to this the cost of the ground and the rectory, which is next to the parish house, the whole church property cost $70,000. It is to be noted that during the years of planning and building, Christ Church paid every assessment, paid in full or over-paid all apportionments and responded to all the appeals sent out by the Diocese and general Church. The Easter offering was $3,300. The Sunday-school mite box offering was $400.

The Rev. J. W. Canteay Johnson, who has not been well during the past month, has gone to Charleston and Rock Hill, S. C., to recuperate.

Hollins College: The Rev. G. Otis Mead, who is the church chaplain at Hollins, maintained a weekly service at that institution during Lent.

Bishop Tucker had an interesting service and confirmation at Toano in James City County in "Old Hickory Neck Church," Blissland parish, of which the Rev. E. Ruffin Jones, of Williamsburg, rector of Bruton Parish, is the minister. This is the first Episcopal visitation this church has ever had. Built in colonial times, when we had no resident Bishop, the old church fell into decay and disuse before Bishop Madison's time, and it has been in ruins for over a hundred years. During the past year the Rev. Mr. Jones has effected a complete restoration of this old church, and the Bishop preached and confirmed; the first service of its kind since the foundation of Old Hickory Neck was laid one hundred and fifty years ago.

The Central Convocation of the Diocese will meet in Boydton, Monday, April 22, in St. James Church, the Rev. H. N. Tucker, rector.

The following program has been arranged and contains one or two corrections of the copy recently mailed to members of the Convocation.

Mr. Savage's labors will be among the coast people in general, the Coast Guards in particular, having received recently especial permit from Secretary of the Navy Daniels to preach to the men of the service on the isolated coast of the Seventh District, United States Coast Guard, with headquarters on or in the vicinity of Roanoke Island.

All-Day Prayer Service.

On March 20th the people of the various churches of Hertford united in an all-day service of prayer for peace. Services were held in the Episcopal, Methodist and Baptist churches in the morning and afternoon for women particularly, and in the evening for all members of the different churches. Several interesting addresses were made, appropriate prayers said and militant hymns sung, and the services, which were largely attended in spite of bad weather, were greatly enjoyed by all.

The Rev. F. B. Wentworth, Winchester, Ky., Archdeacon for financial and educational work in this Diocese, and President of St. John's Collegiate and Industrial School, Corbin, Ky., has been unanimously elected by the Standing Committee of this Diocese to membership in that body. The Archdeacon was also elected Secretary of that body to fill the vacancy created by the resignation of the Rev. J. M. Maxon, now of the Diocese of Kentucky. All communications for the Secretary of the Diocese should be addressed accordingly.

BETHLEHEM.

Rt. Rev. Ethelbert Talbot, D. D., Bishop.

The annual Summer School, under the auspices of the Diocesan Board of Religious Education, will be held at Bishopthorpe Manor, Bethlehem, from Monday, June 24th to Friday, June 28th. Dean Fosbroke, of the General Theological Seminary, will deliver a course of lectures on II Samuel. Mr. Albert Edward Bailey, A. Mr. George McKinley, formerly a postulant at Leonard Hall, Bethlehem, who has been in training in the Ambulance Corps at Allentown, left on March 19 with several hundred men to enter the Sanitary Corps training camp. Upon arrival at Washington Mr. McKinley with about fifty others was temporarily quartered in the parish hall of Trinity Church, whose rector, the Rev. George W. Van Fossen, was the first warden of Leonard Hall.

A number of memorials were dedicated at St. John's Church, East Mauch Chunk, by Archdeacon H. E. A. Durell on Easter Day.

Rt. Rev. F. F. Reese, D. D., Bishop.

Work Among the Soldiers.

The Bishop and clergy of the Diocese are fully alive to the opportunity for work among the soldiers. The Bishop has a list of all the communicants of the Diocese who have enlisted, and has written personal letters to them.

One of our clergymen, the Rev. R. N. MacCallum, rector of Grace Church, Waycross, has recently become a Civilian Chaplain at Camp Wheeler, in Macon, in the Diocese of Atlanta. The local clergy at Augusta, the Rev. G. S. Whitney, the Rev. William Johnson, the Rev. F. W. B. Dorset, and the Rev. P. T. Prentiss are doing fine work at Camp Hancock, Augusta. Camp Suther, an aviation now in process of construction, will be completed in about six weeks. This camp is situated at Americus and is to have 1,500 aviators in training. Here will be a fine opportunity for work.

In Augusta the Bishop has administered confirmation several times to officers and men of the division at Camp Hancock. He has already confirmed twenty-six who were presented by Chaplain McFetridge, of the 108th Field Artillery; Chaplain Houghton, of the 103d Engineers, and by the Rev. N. B. Groton, Civilian Chaplain, supported by the War Commission of the Diocese of Pennsylvania and also by the rectors of the parishes in the city. Another confirmation class was presented to the Bishop on April 3d.

The Bishop has also preached several times at regimental services in Camp Hancock, at the 103d Engineers, the 108th Field Artillery and the 112th Infantry. Not only are the chaplains doing faithful service, but in most cases the line officers are most cordial in their co-operation with the chaplains.

St. Thomas' Church, Thomasville: The Rev. William H. Higgins has just issued the Directory of St. Thomas' Church for 1918. There is report of much good work done. Mr. Higgins completed seven years as rector February 26 last. In this time there have been fifty-four confirmations, thirty-five baptisms, fourteen marriages and twenty-three burials. There are one hundred and thirty-nine names recorded on the parish register.

The Ninety-sixth Annual Convention of the Diocese will be held in St. John's Church, Savannah, April 17. On the evening before the convention the Episcopal Church Club of Savannah will hold its spring meeting. The speakers will be the Rev. G. Sherwood Whitney, rector of St. Paul's Church, Augusta, and Mr. Robert G. Tatum, of Sewanee. Mr. Tatum will tell of the ascent of Mt. McKinley by Archdeacon Stuck, of Alaska, whom Mr. Tatum accompanied on the trip.

At the Missionary Meeting on the night of the 17th the first speaker will be the Rev. William Johnson, rector of the Church of the Good Shepherd, Augusta. The second address will be given by the Rev. N. B. Groton, Civilian Chaplain at Camp Hancock, Augusta. The next speaker will be Mr. Tatum. The Hon. J. Randolph Anderson will speak of Diocesan Missions from a Lawman's standpoint.

LOUISIANA.

Rt. Rev. David Sessums, D. D., Bishop.

The Rev. Robert S. Coupland, D. D., rector of Trinity Church, New Orleans, has been commissioned as Chaplain and will sail for France on May 1.

NEW YORK.

Rt. Rev. David H. Greer, D. D., Bishop
Rt. Rev. C. S. Burch, D. D., Suffragan

The Rev. Dr. Manning, rector of Trinity, utilized the noon hour service on April 6, the anniversary of the entrance of the United States into the war, to speak on conditions in America to-day, in part military, in part religious. Of the former he said:

"We are still a long way off from realizing what this war must mean to us, the sacrifices and sorrows we must endure before the end. But the last two bloody weeks, with their horrors and perils, will help. If that heroic line on the west front should give way, if the hordes of the enemy should be able to break through, we would begin to see this would mean suffering and self-sacrifice of which few of us have dreamed.

"The situation demands that we who cannot go must put all our resources into the struggle. We must put our means into these Liberty Bonds. Every one who thinks knows this. God can be trusted. He who rose again stands to-day to tell us the right shall not go down to defeat. God bless our boys over there now in that terrific battle that is raging to-day, the sound of whose guns seems to ring in our ears. May He give us the victory and show us to be worthy of their sacrifices. May we now gird ourselves to stake our whole might in this fight for right and freedom, side by side with our gallant allies, until the infamous Prussianism has vanished from the world and we shall have peace through a victory won for the right."

In an address at the consecration of the Huntington Memorial Chapel of the Cathedral Bishop Greer paid high tribute to the life and services of the late Rev. Dr. William R. Huntington, long rector of Grace Church, chairman of the Cathedral Committee on Fabric, and Christian leader. Especially did the Bishop commend his vision, and plead that other men in the Church might cultivate the faculty. The chapel in question is the one farthest west on the Epistle side, corresponding to that of the late Bishop Potter on the Gospel side. It is of pure English fourteenth century Gothic architecture, and like the Potter Chapel, is far larger than the other five which surround the sanctuary, and will seat some three hundred persons. It is dedicated to St. Ansgarius. The cost considerably exceeded the original estimates, and there was delay in securing the funds. The dean and others took part in the consecration service.

Conferences of men serving as chaplains at the various cantonments are being held in different cities, among them Atlanta and Fort Worth, and they are to be held in Chicago and on the Pacific Coast. One just held in New York brought together more than one hundred including Y. M. C. A. war secretaries who are ministers, and the verdict, following discussion of methods, was that there is such unity and harmony as never before obtained among religious bodies. At the same time the ministers, knowing the enlisted men intimately, paid exceedingly high testimony of their character. A message was read from the commandant at Camp Upton praising the work of the chaplains, and of the visiting preachers.

PITTSBURGH.

Rt. Rev. C. Whitehead, D. D., Bishop.

Bequest to the Church Home. In accordance with a request left by the late Mr. Reuben Miller in a letter to his children, they have lately given to the Church Home of this city $20,000 to be added to the Endowment Fund of the institution.

Memorial: On Easter Day there was unveiled at the Church of the Ascension, Pittsburgh, an exceedingly handsome painting of the Ascension, which fills up the rear wall of the chancel above the reredos. The altar and reredos were given by Mr. Reuben Miller as a memorial to his wife, and this painting is given in memory of Mr. Miller, by his children, two sons and two daughters.

The Archbishop's Visit: Thursday, April 4, was made memorable in Pittsburgh by the visit of His Grace, the Most Rev. Cosmo Gordon Lang, D. D., Archbishop of York. Coming from Baltimore to Pittsburgh, his train was met by the Reception Committee, composed of the Bishop of the Diocese, and the Reception Committee of the Diocesan Church Club, who had arranged for his coming, Mr. Hill Burgwin, President of the club; Mr. Robert Garland, a member of Council; Mr. C. E. E. Childers, British consul, and Messrs. H. D. W. English and Herbert DuPuy. At eleven o'clock at the Hotel Schenley there was held a reception for the Clergy of the Diocese, which was largely attended. The Archbishop made an address, had prayers with those present, and gave them his blessing.

At noon Archbishop Lang attended a luncheon given in his honor in the Chamber of Commerce building, and at one o'clock made an address in the auditorium to the large body of citizens there assembled.

He had for his subject, "A Nation at War." Mr. H. D. W. English presided at this meeting, being introduced by Mr. Robert Garland, President of the Chamber of Commerce. The Archbishop was accorded a most enthusiastic reception by the large number of men assembled, to hear him.

The Church Club dinner was given at six o'clock in the Hotel Schenley, presided over by Hill Burgwin, Esq., President of the club. About three hundred guests were present, consisting of the Clergy of the Diocese, members of the club, and invited guests. Archbishop Lang again spoke with great acceptance.

The most imposing occasion in connection with the Archbishop's visit was the mass meeting held in the evening at Syria Mosque, the largest auditorium in the city. It was filled from pit to topmost gallery by a representative and enthusiastic audience of men and women. The mayor of the city presided. When introduced by Mayor Babcock, Archbishop Lang was given an ovation, the audience rising as one man and applauding to the echo. He spoke of the greatest needs of the Allies, which they looked to America to supply, men, food and ships in which to transport both across the ocean. He commended the American navy. He complimented General Pershing as well as the President in forsaking the traditions of military service, and brigading our men with the British and French armies to hold back the enemy. The primate closing words were: "Moral strength comes only to those who join their purposes with the will of God. I cannot tell you how much may depend upon whether the soul of America will really uplift itself to God. That would bring us the strength we need. We ask no more than that you will make good what you, through President Wilson, pledged us when you entered the war." The meeting closed with the benediction by the Rt. Rev. Cortlandt Whitehead, D. D.

Proposed Summer School for the Clergy.

The prospectus has recently been issued of a summer school for the clergy, the first of its kind under directly diocesan management, to be held at Ruth Hall, Asbury Park, June 17th to 22d. The appointed place is ideal for the purpose, and the plant of this new school for girls, known as Ruth Hall, will afford all essential accommodation.

The General Committee of Arrangements comprises the Bishop of the Diocese as Chairman and the Rev. Messrs. Hamilton Schuyler, Vice-Chairman; Francis H. Richey, Secretary, and Morgan Ashley, Treasurer. There are appointed also Sub-Committees on Publicity and Enrollment, Lecturers and Schedules, Finance and House Arrangements.

The total charge for attendance, including enrollment fee, board and lodging for the five days, is fixed at ten dollars per person.

The program of instructions has not yet been fully arranged, but there are already promised for the faculty Bishop Kinsman, of Delaware; Dr. F. F. Kramer, Warden of Seabury Divinity School, and Dean Fosbroke, of the General Theological Seminary.

It is proposed to map out a course of study along the lines of the subjects dealt with at the school, which may be pursued privately throughout the year and thus stimulate definite and systematic intellectual effort.

How a Church Is Going to Help With the Third Liberty Loan.

Resolutions Passed by the Vestry of Gloria Dei (Old Swedes') Church at Their Easter Meeting.

In view of the urgent request of the National Government, that every possible association and agency should join in making the Third Liberty Loan a success, the campaign for which is to be started on April 6th, the first anniversary of the entry of the United States into the world war; and in view of the practical feasibility of combining the patriotism of members of the congregation and other friends of the parish with their interest in the general endowment of the Church, so that Old Swedes' may in a special manner render service to the Government by emphasizing and encouraging participation in the Liberty Loan;

"Be it resolved, That the rector be authorized in behalf of the vestry to call the attention of the congregation on Sunday next (April 7th) and at other times which may prove convenient to the following suggestions:

"1. That any person wishing to endow a sitting in the church, whether in their own name or in the name of another, at the stated figure of $200 for each sitting, may do so by subscribing to a Liberty Bond for that amount, and making it transferable to the rector, wardens and vestrymen of Old Swedes'.

"2. That if a sufficient number of the members of the congregation, who may become subscribers to the Liberty Loan, or who hold Thrift Certificates in smaller or larger amounts, join together by making their bonds or certificates transferable to the church, to the total amount of $1,000; a pew in the back of the church shall be set aside and named the Liberty Pew, and a suitable plate shall be prepared and placed thereon."

A list of those subscribing under the above plan is to be posted in the vestibule during the progress of the Campaign.

IDAHO.

Rt. Rev. James B. Funsten, D. D., Bishop.

St. Michael's Cathedral, Boise.

On Monday evening, April 1st, a large and representative gathering of the communicants and supporters of St. Michael's Cathedral, Boise, the Very Rev. Alward Chamberlaine, Dean, met at the Bishop Tuttle Church House to receive reports for the past year. Bishop Funsten presided, and after the singing of America, Dean Chamberlaine made his annual report, speaking of the splendid work done by the various departments of church and Sunday school.

The Finance Committee's report showed $6,306.13 received in church offerings; independent of amounts raised in the various organizations; the disbursements amounted to $6,122.32. Over $1,000 has been given for missionary, Red Cross, Indian, hospital and other philanthropic purposes.

The special Easter offering of $6,700 will be used in cancelling a long standing mortgage in the church and other local indebtedness. This will allow the consecration of the cathedral, and it is the purpose of the Bishop and the dean to invite Bishop Tuttle, of pioneer days; the Rt. Rev. Ethelbert Talbot, Bishop of Idaho from 1888 to 1898; Dean Deuel, and all other former rectors and deans to be present on that joyous occasion.

An announcement of special interest was that a handsome new pipe organ is soon to be presented to the cathedral by members of the Davidson family in memory of the late Charles O. Davidson.

A recent confirmation class at the cathedral was the largest on record, and the Sunday school has doubled in attendance and offerings.

If there be no fruit, then is everything a failure. The garden itself is a garden for this. For this it was bought and walled about; for this it is dug and dressed. The gardener works and watches for this. For this the seed was sown, the tree was planted; for this, weeding and pruning and everything else has been done. For this the rains have fallen, and for this the sun has shone. The seasons have succeeded each other for this. For this, all the life of the tree has been at work; roots have grasped the earth; leaves have drunk the dew; the sap has crept up, and blossom and bud have all been for fruit. If there be no fruit, then everything is a failure—everything.—W. G. Pearce.

Christianity and the Community

Thy Kingdom Come on Earth

Few things in connection with the Army can touch so immediately the concern of Christian people as the question of the opportunity of the troops to be ministered to by an inadequate number of chaplains. As matters stand now, the number of chaplains is not adequate. There are bodies of troops who have no chaplains at all, and there are chaplains who have so many troops to be responsible for that they cannot come into real and personal touch with these men.

This fact need not be something which we merely regret, and do nothing about. The readers of this page can help correct the present lack. The following letter from the General War-Time Commission of the Churches states the situation; and what every one who really believes that religion is worth something to the Army ought to do is to sit down quickly and write to the chairman or one of the members of the House of Representatives Committee a letter urging special action on the chaplains' bill.

The existing law provides for one chaplain to a regiment. This was passed when there were 1,200 men in an infantry regiment. Now there are 3,600, but only one chaplain.

In the Navy there is one chaplain to every 1,250 officers and men.

In the British Army there is one chaplain to every 800 men, and this is not considered enough in the case of detached units as in the artillery.

On September 25 the bill to restore the proportion of chaplains to the original ratio was introduced into the Senate and into the House.

On September 27, 1917, the Federal Council and the Catholic authorities presented a memorial to the President and Congress asking for the passage and approval of this measure.

Early in October the Senate passed the bill.

On January 18, 1918, General Pershing cabled a recommendation "that the number of chaplains in the Army be increased for the war to an average of three per regiment."

Secretary of War Baker has endorsed the bill.

The House Committee on Military Affairs has approved it.

The House Committee on Rules has the power to make a special rule bringing the bill before the House for immediate action. The House Committee on Military Affairs has asked the Committee on Rules for such a special rule. The latter are considering the question.

The members of the House Committee on Rules are Edward W. Pou (of North Carolina), Chairman; Finis J. Garrett (of Tennessee), Martin D. Foster (of Illinois), James C. Cantrill (of Kentucky), Pat Harrison (of Mississippi), Daniel J. Rioridan (of New York), M. Clyde Kelly (of Pennsylvania), Thomas D. Schall (of Minnesota), Philip P. Campbell (of Kansas), Irvine L. Lenroot (of Wisconsin), William R. Wood (of Indiana), Bertrand H. Snell (of New York).

The number of the bill is H. R. 6326.

Because that gathering plays so large a part in the constructive social effort of the nation, we give space gladly to this letter, which sets forth the aims and purposes of this year's National Conference of Social Work, which is to meet in Kansas City from May 15 to 22.

Will the Church stand by and see war wipe out, in the words of Edward T. Devine, "the hard-earned program accomplished by decades of conscious organized effort to reduce poverty, disease and crime and to improve social conditions? Slowly, patiently, hopefully, through the years of peace," this mind tells us, "by one infinitesimal gain after another, mankind has tried to diminish misery and increase well-being. We write our triumphs in the statute books and constitutions. War comes, such war as this in which we are engaged, and in a few months all seems lost. By all the tests of social welfare which we are accustomed to apply Western civilization in four years has plunged into a whirlpool of destruction which mocks at the ideals and efforts of the nineteenth—and as we thought—the twentieth century. The destruction and devastation which appalls us are but incidents in a stupendous evolution—most regrettable incidents in progress toward an end with which they seem incompatible. Somewhere and somehow there is—there must be—a reconciliation."

Never before has the Church borne such a vital relationship to the welfare of communities. Never before has there been such a program at a national conference meeting bearing on this relationship. Church workers cannot afford to miss the opportunity for Church and welfare history will be made in these few days replete with virile measures. "The subtle disorganization of family life, the emotionalism and unrest which affects young men and women, the noticeable increase in juvenile delinquency, the presence of new dangers to public health and vitality owing to inadequate food and fuel, the danger of lowered industrial standards, the undermining of family economic well-being through increase of prices beyond wages—all these tendencies must receive most alert and constant attention." So says Robert A. Woods, President of the conference and head of South End House, Boston. Surely these are dangers that affect the Church, that the Church must feel and shall have to reckon with. Nothing more than this next meeting of the conference can point the importance of showing how we are forming these battle lines at home, our second line of defense.

Brass bands, booming artillery and khaki do not figure so prominently in the fight here at home—in fact, it is quite lacking in spectacular features which spur one on to great achievement, but the cause is there and the workers are there as surely as in our great war activities here and abroad.

A reflection of this spirit is seen in this quotation from Frederic Almy, Secretary of the Buffalo Charity Organization Society, "In our fight against poverty, we are none of us pacifists, and there is as good fighting in this war as there is in Europe."

The National Conference of Social

Work is the one great nation-wide medium of exchange between individual social, health, prison, recreation, industrial, relief and other workers and between organizations and communities all over the United States and Canada interested in the "how and why" of community well-being. The meeting and the program are both most interesting, timely and complete. If there is one thing lacking in this democratic and cosmopolitan gathering of workers, it is exclusiveness. Everybody with any interest in social, economic, civic or industrial problems, whether from town or country is invited to attend the lectures and engage in the discussions. The program is broad and virile.

War topics occupy a considerable section. War Neuroses (shell shock) After the War is the subject in the Mental Hygiene Division under Dr. Frankwood E. Williams, medical director of the National Committee for Mental Hygiene, New York. Five parts in this section are devoted to mental hygiene, both with reference and without reference to the war.

"Are foreign born citizens political assets? Are they being properly assimilated? Are they a menace or a benefit? What should be done about their future?" These questions and others like them are likely to be answered in the division on the Local Community, the chairman of which is Charles C. Cooper, head of Kingsley House, Pittsburgh.

Did anyone ever hear of a poor farm or a correctional farm that practically paid its way? Of course they exist, but nearly always the farming is the sort that seems a sort of side issue that is almost never profitable and the inmates, left largely to their own devices, seem to rust into fixed positions from which it is difficult if not impossible to dislodge them. The Kansas City Municipal Farm, for misdeameanants, is one of the most interesting of the many places of interest that delegates to the conference will have opportunity to visit. It is one of the exceptions to the rule of non-profitable correctional farms. With an average population of three hundred last year it cost the public only two dollars per inmate to operate. There are two hundred and one acres, from which last year $12,000 worth of products were harvested.

The war has stirred the mind of the country to thought on very great and very living themes. The very subjects proposed for discussion at representative gatherings now are full of stimulating suggestions. Consider, for example, this program advertised for the Southern Sociological Congress, which is to meet in Birmingham, Alabama, from April 14 to 17.

Second Sunday After Easter: The first lesson Sunday morning records the fulfilment of the specific prediction given in last Sunday's lesson that Cyrus, king of Persia, would decree the rebuilding of Jerusalem and the temple. Much is made by the biblical writers of this fact. Cyrus was, in their view, the shepherd and anointed of God for this express purpose. The return, predicted and accomplished, was to them an outstanding proof of the providential ordering of the world by Jehovah; that is, by the God who had been continuously revealing Himself to His chosen people, as the God of Creation, History and Redemption. Indeed, the history of this people became such an evidence of God and of Providence, that we to-day can look back upon it and strengthen our faith. It would seem, then, that the Sunday public reading of the Scriptures should make more of this marvelous history; and that is what the New Lectionary tries to do. There is room for discussion as to whether to put the return (Ezra), where we have it or on Whit-sunday; but it was decided to put on the latter, the renewal of the covenant of the law, after the joyful completion of the temple. Certainly the return belongs somewhere after Easter. The New Testament lesson, St. John's account of the re-instatement of St. Peter in the apostolic office and the symbolic teaching of the draft of fishes contained in the unbroken net, was selected, not as correlative to Ezra 1, though there is a certain congruousness between the two, but as a continuation of the record of the great forty days; a portion of Scripture teaching ignored in the present Prayer Book Sunday lessons. Even the admirable Epistles and Gospels for this season are inadequate. The second lesson for the morning supplements the Gospel for the day, the Good Shepherd by the undershepherd. The closing verses, about St. John's tarrying until the Lord should come, are of particular interest and value as helping us to understand the so-called second advent as beginning with Pentecost, and also as explaining how St. John could write his Gospel.

In the evening the leading part is taken by the second lesson; St. Paul's discussion, in continuation of last Sunday evening's lesson and in line with the two Collects for these two Sundays, of the divinely intended results of justification, viz., a new and risen life, in union with the Risen Conqueror of sin and death. (Note: Justification may be fruitfully studied in connection with the morning historical course, to-wit, the re-establishment of an erring and forgiven people in Canaan as an act of free grace. (See Ritschl in loc.) This carries out the teaching of Gospel and Epistle urging the following of the Christ, as opposed to the notion of "resting in a complete salvation." The Old Testament lesson from Jeremiah, continuation of last Sunday evening's lesson, on the new covenant, though recently uses, seems justified for a Sunday reading at this time.

The week day lessons are (1) Old Testament, morning, continuation of the prophet's discussion of topics related to Exile and Return, Redemption and life; (2) New Testament selections bearing on Resurrection, and Eternal Life; (3) afternoon, Old Testament, True Shepherds and the New Covenant; (4) afternoon, New Testament, practical conclusions from the Death and Resurrection of our Lord, as regards the Christian life here and hereafter. Text-books: The Church Hand-book for Teacher Training Classes. Caley and Burk. ($1.25.) The part of this book teaching the life of our Lord is published separately by George W. Jacobs & Company. Philadelphia, Pa., at twenty-five cents. Rhee's Life of our Lord.

Note: John's baptism was unto repentance and preparatory to a new covenant. The Christian Church had not yet been organized for members to be born into her fold. Her baptism was and is in the name of the Trinity. Christ's baptism became a consecration to His life work; and an opportunity for the Father to acknowledge, and the Spirit to ordain Him to that mission of atonement. Isa. 61:1.

Life.

Were we asked to name the three greatest words in Holy Writ, we would probably say they are Love, Light, Life. Love is the great law of human conduct, light is the great revealer of truth, and life is conduct and creed in character. There was wonderful harmony in our Lord's teachings. He was far removed from fanaticism, which arises from placing a wrong emphasis upon doctrine. When undue emphasis is placed on conduct, the result is materialism; when placed on belief, or creed, fanaticism ensues; and here is the essence of ritualism. Christ teaches us that out of conduct and creed will spring inevitably the abiding element which we call character. And so conduct and belief find their value in character.—Bishop Thomson.

In a Christian home the discipline of children is not so much a work of exhortation as of contagion. The prevailing climate of unaffected idealism strengthens the moral constitution of the child. Thus the Christian family gets its unity and stability, not by outward regulation, but by the natural processes of its inner life. It has its troubles, and they draw hearts together. It has its joys, and they are multiplied by being shared. When, finally, the children of the family grow up to hear of larger truths—truths of the kingdom and of the Father in heaven, and of the son for whose return the Father is waiting, then they interpret these great mysteries of the eternal world, as Jesus prompted them to do, in the language of their own loving and united home.—F. G. Peabody.

I Will Not Doubt.

I will not doubt, though all my prayers return
Unanswered from the still, white realm above;

I will believe it is an all-wise love
Which has refused these things for which I yearn;
And though at times I cannot keep from grieving,
Yet the pure ardor of my fixed believing
Undimmed shall burn.

I will not doubt, though sorrows fall like rain,
And troubles swarm like bees about a hive;

I will believe the heights for which I strive

Are only reached, by anguish and by pain;

And though I groan and writhe beneath my crosses,

I yet shall see through my severest losses

The greater gain.

I will not doubt. Well anchored is this faith,

Like some staunch ship, my soul braves
every gale;

So strong its courage that it will not quail

To breast the mighty unknown sea of death.

Oh, may I cry though body parts with spirit,

"I do not doubt," so listening worlds
may hear it,

With my last breath.

The Awakening.

Had there been a positive quarrel between Roberta Denton and her mother-in-law, there might have been a definite reconciliation, with the usual tears, explanations, and self-censurings on both sides and the subsequent charitableness, tolerance and being "to-her-faults-a-little-blind" attitude toward each other that would have spanned the dangerous places and have kept hearts warm while a better understanding between the two women was germinating and ripening under the skillful touch of old Father Time's healing hand. There was nothing, however, half so helpful as the "spoken word" to clear away the mists of hard feelings—just a hopeless, aggravating incompatibility which had grown and grown to monster proportions because of the presence of that little green-eyed imp, jealousy, in the lives of the two women, though either would have denied such a charge vehemently, being utterly unaware that such a commonplace, malevolent, not to say vulgar, cause was at the root of all their trouble.

And so the years of Roberta's married life passed until three had gone by without any perceptible change in the cool, detached, albeit polite, behavior to each other of these two who might have been drawn by their common love for one man into a close and friendly comradeship. Roberta failed to see that; being the younger and, so to speak, the "prize winner" in the game, she might have more graciously and fittingly made the advances and necessary sacrifices in the domestic peace movement that was essential to the happiness of three persons, for the man in the case was, though neither woman would have been willing to admit it, the greatest sufferer of the three from this growing estrangement between the two he loved best on earth.

But this little wife had ideas and theories of her own; and, as we all know, there must be a lot of elasticity about them to make ideas and theories into good, every day working principles. Perhaps it was in this lack of adaptability that Roberta erred; she couldn't see that to let Jim's mother have a little share in the loving and serving of her only son was not to lessen her hold on the affections of the young husband she adored. On the contrary, such a fair and yielding disposition on her part would have endeared her immeasurably more to the man of her heart and left her time to make herself and her home pretty and attractive and cultivate her music and her hobbies that would have made her all the brighter and more desirable companion while Jim's mother had a hand in doing for her boy's comfort as had been the habit of her life. But let us not blame the young wife too much; older and wiser heads than hers have committed worse crimes in the name of love, and there is much for youth and inexperience to learn.

There came a time when Roberta and Jim forgot the difference between the two women, that was wider than the narrow street that separated them from the home of the lonely mother across the way, in the thought of the advent of a new wonder and joy into their own lives. And when the baby came, all else dwindled into insignificance before the mystery and majesty of this supreme event in their lives. The young mother would sit for hours with the tiny tendril fingers wrapped around her own in triumph, wonder, fear at her heart. It was such a stupendous undertaking, such a transcendent privilege, and withal so fearsome a business—this being a mother.

One quiet Sabbath morning as she sat thus the village church bells called their message to her in vain. The baby, now six weeks old, had been ailing the night before, and she could not bear the thought of leaving him to alien hands for a minute. She could hear Jim softly whistling an old, familiar hymn tune downstairs, and, raising her eyes to the window, she beheld her husband's mother fitting the key to the front door of her little house across the street preparatory to her departure for the morning services. Something in the sight smote her. Conscience whispered that if all had been well between them the stately old figure would not have gone forth alone this morning, a pathetic, lonely picture of unloved old age. But for her (Roberta) Jim would have been at his mother's side, accompanying her, as he had done before their marriage, to the little church at the foot of the hill instead of idling away the beautiful morning in an effort at consideration for a wife whose happiness depended on his constant presence and attention. A feeling of shame at this state of affairs quickly gave place to one of renewed interest in her boy. He had opened his drowsy eyes for a moment and smiled unmistakably. Although her recently acquired fund of "baby lore" enabled her to interpret correctly that smile, there was something altogether wonderful in the novel sight. She gave herself up to the ecstasy of the hour. How earnestly she longed to meet the demands of this new life! For his needs her ignorance should become wisdom. She saw their life together as along a sunlit path. She saw him emerging from infancy, calling her and Jim by name, running to her with all his baby troubles and hurts; she could feel the little curly head (his hair must be like Jim's, of course) in the hollow of her arm. Then came in rapid sequence the picture of the school boy, studious, mischievous, big-hearted, and brave; now a gawky, overgrown fellow whom no one but his mother thought interesting and handsome. Then a college boy; this thought was too terrible to dwell upon. For his good she must bear the separation; nothing else would give her the strength to endure it.

Then at last he'd be home forever and ever. No, not forever; an unnamed fear gripped her heart. Her motherhood must end with his manhood. Wasn't that the way of the world? It was right for Jim's mother to give him up, body and soul, to her. Yes, that was the position she had taken, and she must be consistent, sincere at least with herself. She must give him up to another woman when the time came, as she had expected Jim's mother to do. Not all the agony she had borne for him, not all her sacrifices, her love could make him hers for any longer than those years before his manhood. Just when her labors would bear fruit she must turn him over to another.

The thought hurt unbearably. Jim's mother! She no longer thought of her with bitterness. With wide, staring eyes she saw her in the lonely house, making an occasional visit, coldly formal almost, because of her daughter-in-law's aloofness, to this dear son that had once been, and was still, her all in all. What was her pride in the face of this tragedy? Nothing certainly worth fostering and upholding. She would make reparation. True, Jim's mother had not always been kind or tactful, but, as she now realized the loss that she had been called upon to suffer, these things were forgivable. She was a woman of sterling character and worth, Roberta knew, and that she would readily do her part in sustaining a new and lovelier relationship between herself and her son's wife, if given the chance, she also felt certain.

Roberta was not one to do things by halves, and her convictions were always upheld by immediate action, no "taking it out in thinking" or mere words for her. Accordingly, acting upon the impulse to right this thing at once, she left her sleeping son and ran quickly in search of her husband. She found him in the cool, home-like living room. "Jim," she said, making herself comfortable in a low rocker opposite his chair, "why didn't you go to church this morning with Mother Denton?"

The cloud on her husband's boyish face lifted, and a look of surprise took its place. "I didn't like to leave you, dear," he answered; "and then you haven't seemed to like my being over at mother's much lately; so I thought I'd better stay as I always do," he concluded lamely with a man's directness.

And then this amazing little wife did an unexpected thing—she began to cry, and in less time than it takes to tell it the young husband had her in his arms and was demanding to know if she were sick or hurt or any one had dared to offend her or—

To all of which she answered with a flow of incoherence, out of which the only intelligent part of the answer was something about his having once been his mother's baby, and it was all her fault; her own baby had made her understand.

But to Jim Denton these seemingly foolish and disconnected sentences brought a great light—the light of understanding and the light of hope; and when his Roberta was able to make a fuller explanation of her morning's reverie, and her consequent plans for the future, happiness and gratitude to the generous little woman at his side enveloped him as with a mantle. He saw the future ahead free from the dark shadow of estrangement that had been the one blot upon his life's happiness.

After a moment's silence in which both were thinking of the changes in their lives that the future would see, Roberta spoke: "Jim, dear, have we decided on a name for the baby yet?"

"I'll like whatever you select, Bobs. Shall it be for yourself and father? 'Robert' has a fine, manly sound. Why not that?"

"Of course not, dear boy: he was to have been Jim, Jr., if I did the choosing; but a great deal has just come to me. You remember your mother has often said, having no other sons, she regretted not naming you for your father?"

"Sure," replied her husband. "She has never gotten over his death or the fact that I was not called 'Richard.'"

"We'll let her name the baby, then," Roberta declared with decision. "That will make up to her for the past years and make her feel 'one of us' from now on. Don't you think so, Jim?"

"Nothing in the world would please her half so well, Bobs. You're a perfect witch for thinking up the right thing." Her husband's radiant face was reward enough for the sacrifice she had made.

"And, Jim," urged the flushed, happy little woman, "go right over after church and bring mother home to dinner." Tell her the baby smiled this morning, and she must come over and see for herself her grandson's latest accomplishment."—Maude Lawrence Westcott, in the Christian Advocate.

Reality in Worship.

"Before thou prayest prepare thyself, and be not as one that tempteth the Lord."

I am sure that some preliminary work of a private nature is necessary, some brief exercise such as the reading of a short Psalm, which will serve to detach us from the world, and remind us of the solemn nature of what we are going to do. I know that in these days the cares of life flow almost up to the altar steps, still there is surely some little space that we can snatch for recollection. Few of us may be able, like George Herbert, to use the churchyard for this purpose, yet all of us may find some place in which to say, "While that my soul repairs to her devotion, here I entomb my flesh."

It does seem unthinkable that persons who hurry late to church or arrive only just in time, and come talking up to the door, should be under the impression that they are about to worship. I well remember the chorus of gossip kept up by the members of a house party in a country parish on their way to church about the chance of the next day's sport or the details of last night's bridge. Every one of them had a keen sense of incongruity in other matters, yet they seemed quite unaware that they were making themselves ridiculous in the sight of heaven. As well as the joy in devotion, we want the seriousness of it. In one word, we want reality. If only people would come to church prepared and intent on what is before them, what a joy worship would be, and what a power the Church would be in the nation's life. Until we get back the piety of worship we cannot be equipped as a Church. The world is waiting the appearance of real religion. Outwardly, of course, it scoffs at such, inwardly it respects it—I had almost said reverences it. The indifferent quality of our worship is one of the greatest hindrances to the spread of the Kingdom. In this respect, the very fact that it is the public witness to the existence of God, open to all sorts and conditions of men, ought to put us on our honor to make it real. An indifferent worship is worse than an inconsistent life, for the latter is remarked by few, the former is a stumbling-block to many. Let us see to it that by preparing ourselves, and invoking the Holy Spirit's aid, we "shew forth His praise" as those who have been "called out of darkness into His marvellous light."—The Treasury.

Woman's Part in Conservation.

By the President of the General Federation of Women's Clubs and of the Woman's National Council of Defense.

We are becoming very familiar with the oft-repeated statement, "You women should do this," or, "take up that task."

This may be variously construed; as an expression of confidence in our ability; as a spur to greater activity; as an insinuation that we are not wide-awake to opportunities; that there are crying needs yet unheeded; or, it may simply be the desire to place responsibility somewhere.

Whatever the inspiration, the fact remains that there is a task ready at hand for each one. The simplest, most commonplace domestic duties have taken on highly patriotic phases. One does not need to go far afield, seek a foreign land, journey to a distant city, or leave home and kindred in order to respond to our government's call to service.

There are great tasks, but these can only be accomplished by each individual doing his or her full duty. When we are asked to save, or substitute, articles of food in order to aid in feeding our allies, then every loyal man and woman should cheerfully accede. Suppose this does necessitate doing without some particularly toothsome dish or learning to like some hitherto scorned edible? What is this compared with the sacrifices our brave boys are making?

The conservation of food, fuel, clothing; the intensive cultivation of garden plots; the preservation of educational standards; child welfare in all its ramifications and the maintenance of existing social agencies offer endless opportunities for constructive work.

With all the work, the gifts, the sacrifices, yes, even the heart-breaks, we must keep courageously at our tasks, present a united front and smiling faces, sing as we work, and do all in our power to keep the morale of our own volunteer home army. Our nation is at war, and we must, by thought, word and deed, aid in making the world safe for democracy.—Ione V. H. Cowles.

For the Southern Churchman Subscriptions to the Church Paper.

Deaconess May Shepperson.

How can we increase the circulation of our Church paper? The editor has already asked for a list of friends to whom to send sample copies. Let us send our lists promptly. Then, cannot we send copies, when we have finished reading them, to other friends who we know have not money to subscribe? Some one unknown to us may see the paper on their tables and send in a subscription.

In a little country village one summer I found one of our Church papers had been taken for years by a leading member of a church of another denomination. It was passed on to many other people of all denominations. That one copy was doing good work for Christ and the Church. The subscriber, it seemed, had had a copy given her one day, which had contained an article that appealed to her. There was no library in the town and reading matter was scarce. A weekly visit from the paper was well worth the price.

I recall finding the Southern Churchman once in the home of a widow with three children to support, who told me that she could not remember when she had not subscribed for the paper, as she found it indispensable in its spiritual uplift for her, and its influence on her children. "We read every word of it," she said, "and I don't think the children would let me give it up, even if I wanted to do so. By economizing in one way or another we will always find money for it."

In a large New York church it was the custom to leave the church papers at the door for strangers or the poor to take away. Many times a member of another denomination has said to me: "I usually come here when in the city for one reason, because I like to get a copy of your Church paper to read while I am traveling."

Some have compared our Church literature favorably with their own; others have said that ours is better than theirs. In one tenement house I was told: "Yes, we have the Churchman regularly, now, the same as though we paid for it. With seven children, all trying to get it for me first, it would be strange if we missed a copy."

I have found Thoughts for the Thoughtful and similar clippings in this paper most helpful to enclose in letters, and have sometimes sent bits from this column to other papers to copy. I lend my paper especially to children, who enjoy the stories. This opens the way to an invitation to Sunday-school. I live in a hotel, where there are many invalids who do not go to church because of ill-health, are glad to borrow a Church paper to read. I have often had a request for mine, and when it was returned I have been told that it had passed through several hands.

It is gratifying to see how much interested our friends in the various other denominations take in our work. Many have told me that they consider Spirit of Missions was the best missionary budget they knew, both as to make-up and articles. I have often noted that as a rule sojourners in hotels leave religious reading at home. The Church paper loaned to them, therefore, is perhaps the only bit of spiritual uplift that they find available.

My dear mother, shortly before her death, spoke of the value of the Church paper, especially of the Churchman, which she knew and loved the best. "Never be without a subscription to some Church paper," she said; "it's a fine habit to form, and once formed it is never broken. It will bring you untold comfort and strength."

We see the field, the possibilities. What are we doing to fill them?

"She doeth little kindnesses, Which most leave undone, or despise: For naught that sets one heart at ease, And giveth happiness or peace, Is low-esteemed in her eyes."

For the Young Folks

Ten Little Duties.

Ten little duties! Does no good to whine;
Skip about and do one, then there are nine!
Nine little duties; it never pays to wait;
Do one quick, and—presto!—there are only eight.
Eight little duties; might have been eleven;
One done in no time, leaving only seven.
Seven little duties; 'tisn't such a fix;
Do one more, and—bless me!—there are only six.
Six little duties, sure as I'm alive!
Never mind, one's over; now there are but five.
Five little duties knocking at your door!
Lead one off to Doneland, that leaves only four.
Four little duties, plain as plain can be!
Can't be shirked—one's over—leaving only three.
Three little duties; like a soldier true,
Meet them and vanquish one; then there's but two.
Two little duties between you and fun;
In just a minute longer there'll be only one!
One little duty; now what will you do?
Do it! why, surely; now you are through!

How Billy Was a Soldier.

"My, but I just wish I was growned up so I could be a soldier! I s'pose by the time I'm a man the war will be all over."

"I sincerely hope it will, my boy," answered his father, gravely, "and that there will never be another; but if there should be I trust you will be ready to do your duty, though you will find it far from pleasant."

"Isn't there any way little boys can hurry up and grow faster when they want to, papa?" said Billy, as he and his father passed a little group of soldiers on the street.

"Not that I know of; but let me tell you, my son, a good soldier has a great many hard lessons to learn before he is fit for service. You can be learning many of them while you are growing up if you will, and you can find all the fighting you want to do every day of your life."

"Why, Father Baker, I'd like to know how," said Billy, stopping right where he was to stare at his father in amazement.

"One of the first and most important lessons a soldier has to learn is to obey promptly and without a question. I think I know a little boy who is very apt to question why he must do things he is told to do. And very often, I am sorry to say, he disobeys father, mother and teacher."

Billy looked rather discomfited. "That's different," he said; "if I was a soldier of course I'd obey."

"I'm afraid not unless you had learned to do so before. Suppose you begin this very day to try to do just as you are told every time without one question of murmur, will you? You can imagine that you are in a training camp if you like."

"That will be sort of fun," said Billy, "but I don't see what chance there is for me to do any fighting."

"Don't you? Well, we are all encountering enemies every hour of our lives, and either we overcome them or they conquer us. Sometimes we have to make a pretty stiff fight if we want to come off victorious.

"Every time you are tempted to say or do anything that is not strictly true you are face to face with the enemy Deceit. When you are tempted to think of your own pleasure first, or to keep things for yourself, and not share with others, Selfishness is trying to get the best of you. When there is work you ought to do and you try to shirk it, Indolence is the foe. Then there is Disobedience, Ill Temple and—"

"Don't tell any more, please; that is enough for once; it sort of makes me tired to think of so many things. But I guess it will be easy enough to conquer 'em. I can do most anything if I just make up my mind to it."

"Billy," said mother that very afternoon, "I want you to look after baby while I go down the street to do an errand."

"Oh, dear!" exclaimed Billy, fretfully. "I was going over to Tommy's, and we were going to have lots of fun. But that's always the way; when I want to go anywhere I have to stay home to do something."

"I thought you were going to be a little soldier boy," said mother, gravely. "Isn't this a good time to begin fighting? Here's disobedience and selfishness trying to overcome you. Are you going to let them conquer? I shall not make you stay home; go to Tommy's if you wish; but I shall be disappointed not to be able to do my errand, and I shall be even more disappointed to have my soldier boy defeated."

Billy felt very uncomfortable. He wished that mother had not such an unpleasant way of making him decide things himself.

"I told Tommy I'd be sure to come," he said; "he will be 'specting me."

"Very well," said mamma.

Billy waited a few minutes, hoping she would say more, but she did not. "You most generally say I must keep my promises," he continued, but there was no reply to this.

He waited a few minutes, then he slipped out of the room, took his cap and went out doors.

"Aren't you ashamed of yourself?" something kept saying inside of him. "You're a pretty soldier to be beaten the first time like this. You are selfish not to be willing to give up your play when mother does so much for you. And you are disobedient, because if you go you are doing what you know mother does not want you to. You're no soldier at all unless you can fight better than this."

Billy was almost to the gate when all at once he squared his shoulders and marched back double-quick.

"I most got beat," he said, "but not quite. You go right off and I'll take care of baby. But I wish it was as interesting and easy to be a soldier as it is to think about being one."—Kate S. Gates, in Lutheran Church Work and Observer.

The Rainy Day Visitor.

Probably Ernest was as scarlet as grandma's tomato-pin-cushion by this time. Minnie watched the little rivers run down the garden path into the little lake at the gate. She sighed. Scarlet fever was the only thing Ernest had not divided with her in all the nine years of their twin lives.

Grandpa was asleep on the sofa, with a newspaper over his face; grandma dozed in her easy chair by the fireside. It seemed as if they were always asleep. She thought of Mrs. Todd's baby, who was always taking a nap when she wanted to take him riding. "People seem to sleep a good deal at the top and bottom of their lives," she said to herself and sighed again.

Grandma sat up with a start. "Why, child!" she exclaimed, picking up her knitting, "I must have closed my eyes for a second. I was just wondering," she went on briskly, smiling down at the doleful little face, "if you wouldn't like to read the diary your mother wrote when she was ten years old."

Minnie, with wide eyes, followed grandma to the bookcase. A mother only ten years old made one feel solemn. After a few minutes' search the book was found. It was of faded red leather with "Diary" printed across the back in gold letters. There was a red pencil tied to it with a ribbon that had once been blue.

As soon as she began to read, Minnie forgot that it was raining, forgot that she was lonesome and homesick.

"Ester Brown and me are going to kepe a diry," it began. Minnie stopped reading. Could that possibly be Aunt Esther Brown, who lived at Waterlee, "our adopted aunt," as the twins called her?

"That is just who it was," said grandma, waking from his nap in time to hear Minnie's excited question.

She could hardly let the book go long enough to eat her dinner. At the very end of the book came the most exciting part. She was going slowly to make it last as long as she could when she read this: "Ester Brown and me are too old to play with dolls any more, so we are going to put our paper dolls all in the sekerit drawer of the old sekeritree and never look at them again. Cross youre harte and hope to di."

"Grandpa, grandma, grandpa!" cried Minnie, dancing up and down. "Is there a secret drawer in the secretary?"

"Yes, yes," said grandpa, rubbing his chin. "Let me see. Pull out the second drawer from the top. It's right in the back of that."

Minnie did so, trembling with excitement. She found a little narrow drawer, but it was empty.

At the sight of her disappointed face grandpa came to help her. They hunted for half an hour, but no other secret drawer could they find. They were about to give it up, when grandma, who had joined in the search, said suddenly: "Father, didn't she mean the old secretary? You know we bought this one the spring after she was nine, and she and Esther had the other in the attic to play with."

Up into the dark, musty attic went the three. There in the dormer window stood the secretary, covered with dust and cobwebs. If Minnie had hard work to keep from screaming downstairs, she had harder work now, as at last grandpa opened the secret drawer and handed her a pile of what seemed dusty papers. It was indeed the paper doll family put there so long ago by the two little girls.

When they were dusted, they appeared as good as new, and Minnie spent the rest of the day playing with them. She laughed and laughed at the queer style of the clothes they wore. At bedtime, when she gathered them up, she said to her grandmother: "It was just like having my little girl mother come to play with me."—Anna Louise Berray, in Sunday-school Times.

The Little Dog That Couldn't Forget.

After this dreadful war is over there will be thousands of Americans who will be going to Europe. France and Belgium, as a man said to me the other day, will be a new "holy land" because of the thousands of men who have there given their lives for the freedom of the world.

Perhaps at some time you may go to Europe. If you do, I know that you will go to the city of Edinburgh, the great capital of Scotland. There are many things in this ancient city that are sacred to us, for it was there that many of the battles of our Presbyterian Church were fought. There are many monuments in the city of Edinburgh. There is a beautiful street that runs through the center of the city called Princess Street, one of the finest and widest avenues in the world. In the center of the street is Princess Street Gardens, and in this lovely little park is the monument that was erected by the Scotch people to Sir Walter Scott. You can't go to Edinburgh without seeing that monument. But there is another little monument that I hope you will sometime see. It was erected years ago to the memory of a dog. The dog's name was Bobby. His master was very poor, but Bobby loved him very much. One day the master died. They took him and buried him in Greyfriars Churchyard. It was in that churchyard long ago that thousands of brave Scotch men and women met and signed a solemn pledge that they would die before they would give up their faith. They were called the Covenanters, and that is where our boys' society gets its name, the Covenanters. But I must tell you about Bobby. After his master had been put in the grave and the grave had been filled and the turf laid on the top, every one went away, all put Bobby. He lay down there on the grave and put his head between his paws and would not leave. No tombstone was put there over that poor man's grave, but Bobby never forgot him. He stayed by that grave for four years, summer and winter, in heat and cold, keeping watch there. They tried to drive him away, but he always came back. Bobby loved his master, and he would not go.

When the children went home from school at noon to get their lunch, they passed by the churchyard; and they used to take part of their lunch and give it to Bobby. He ate what they gave him and then went and lay down again on the grave. After a while Bobby began to get weak and thin. He could only crawl, but he would not leave the grave. And one day when the children stopped after school to see him he was dead.

Then the people of the city began to talk about the faithfulness of the dog. They had stories in the papers about him. There was a noble woman in London, the Baroness Burdett-Coutts. She heard about Bobby and went to Edinburgh and had a little monument erected to his memory, and on it were the words, "Greyfriars Bobby." At the foot of the monument there is a drinking fountain; and when people stop there to drink, they think about the little dog who could not forget his master.

My text to-day has only two words. It is so short that we can all remember it: "Son, remember." We have a Master who has gone away, and He doesn't want us to forget Him. It is Jesus. If when we are tempted to lose our tempers and do wrong we would remember Jesus, it would be so much easier to do what is right. When boys and girls do wrong how very often they say: "I forgot!" It is because we forget Jesus that we do wrong. Let us remember this story of "Greyfriars Bobby" and see if we, too, can remember our Master.—Stuart Nye Hutchison, D. D., in the Presbyterian of the South.

For the Arithmetic Class.

There are some curious facts and fancies connected with numbers. The number 9 is, perhaps, the first as regards such experiments, although number 7 is more prominent in literature and history. When you once use it, you can't get rid of it. It will turn up again, no matter what you do to put it "down and out."

All through the multiplication table the products of 9 comes to 9. No matter what you multiply with or how many times you change the figures, the result is always the same.

For instance, twice 9 equals 18; add 8 and 1, and you have 9. Three times 9 equals 27; 2 and 7 make 9 again. Go on until you try 11 times 9 equals 99. This seems to bring an exception. But add the digits—9 and 9 make 18; and, again, 1 and 8 make 9. Go on to an indeterminable extent, and the thing continues. Take any number at random. For example, 450 times 9 equals 4,050, and the digits added make 9 once more. Take 6,000 times 9, which equals 54,000, and again you have 5 and 4.

Take any row of figures, reverse the order, and subtract the less from the greater—the difference will certainly be always 9 or a multiple of 9. For example, 5,071 minus 1,705 equals 3,366. Add these digits, and you have 18, and 1 and 8 makes the familiar 9. You have the same results, no matter how you raise the numbers by squares and cubes.

Once more way is given by which number 9 shows its strange powers. Write down any number you please, add its digits, and then subtract the sum of said digits from the original number. No matter what numbers you start with, the sum of the digits in the final answer will be 9.

Try these experiments, and you will be delighted with the exact manner in which they prove the statement. Some quaint puzzles, based on these fixed principles, have been made.—London Tit-Bits.

The Choice of Helpers.

What was it that the dear Lord Jesus came into the world to do? To help people to be good? To found the Church? Yes, both those answers partly describe His work.

Do you remember the lesson we had last week about the "Flight Into Egypt"? For many years after His return Jesus lived quietly in Nazareth. He went to school with the other village children and when He was twelve years old He went up to Jerusalem for a service in the temple that was very much like our service of confirmation.

Then He came back to Nazareth, where He worked with good St. Joseph at the carpenter's bench, and became skilled in the use of tools. All this time He was thinking about the great work which He came into the world to do and was getting ready for it.

At last there came a time when He left the little home at Nazareth, said good-bye to His dear mother, and went away to be alone with God on a mountain for a long time. When He came down He was all ready to begin.

How do you think Jesus began? If mother gave you a great deal of work to do, wouldn't you ask your friends to come and help? This is what our dear Lord did.

He walked along the shore of the Lake of Galilee, where the little waves came dancing in. It was a busy scene, for many fish were caught there, and there were all sorts of queer boats along the water's edge. Here a little company of men were cleaning and sorting fish. Others were salting them and packing them in casks. Some of the fishermen were mending their nets before they went out again.

At last Jesus saw two brothers, Peter and Andrew, who were getting ready to cast their nets into the sea. Jesus always knew what was in the hearts of men and He knew that these two, even though they were rough fisher's clothing and worked for their daily bread, were true and loyal. So He said, "Follow me, and I will make you fishers of men."

He meant, of course, that if they were like Him and were loving, and patient and gentle, they would be able to win people for His Kingdom.

Peter and Andrew did not wait to see what other people were going to do, or even to finish their work. "They straightway left their nets and followed Him." Thus they set us an example of quick obedience.

Jesus went a little farther and He saw James and John in a boat with their father, Zebedee, mending their nets. He called them, and they, too, left the ship and their father and followed Jesus.

When you were baptized Jesus called you, just as surely, to follow Him, so that you might share in His work. How can you do this? Think out the answer for yourself.—Shepherd's Arms.

Slipping a Cog.

"It's just the same, day after day," said Dorothy; "house work and mending, and shopping, and marketing to make the money go as far as it can, and then all over again. I'm getting to feel just like one cog in a great big wheel. I don't count—what difference does it make what I do, or whether I do anything at all? Anyone else could make father and the boys just about as comfortable as I do, for I haven't learned to be very much of a housekeeper yet."

Jane took up a pair of scissors and snipped out a few lines from the morning paper. "Here, catch!" she said.

Dorothy caught it as it fluttered down. "Read it aloud," said Jane. She had just come to live next door, and Dorothy had taken a great fancy to her laughing, clever face.

"'Pride in humility,'" read Dorothy. "Oh, it's one of those 'line-o'-cheer' things:

"'I'm but a cog in life's vast wheel
 That makes the same old trip,
 Yet what a joy it is to feel
 That but for me the wheel might slip!

'Tis something, after all, to jog
 Along, and be a first-class cog.'"

"Just so," said Jane. "There's your answer in the daily paper for to-day. I noticed it, because I often feel the same way that you describe. I suppose everyone does. Perhaps kings do."

Dorothy pondered. "I think I'll learn that 'by heart,'" she said; and she did.—Exchange.

An Experiment Worth Trying.

Miniature trees such as the Japanese produce to perfection, the Youth's Companion says, can be grown by the simple process of planting a seed in half of an orange skin in which fine soil has been substitute for the pulp. The outside of the skin is covered with shellac, and when the tiny roots force their way through this, they are carefully cut off. The paring off of the roots, it is claimed, stunts the tree.

Bread was not the original food of man. That was fruit. When sin entered the world the curse followed, and man was doomed to toil. "In the sweat of thy face shalt thou eat bread." Fruit grows spontaneously, and needs neither cooking nor preparing for man's food, and fruit in all its varieties would afford an abundant supply. But being shut out of Paradise, man was compelled to toil and live on the food prepared for the beasts, and finally, after the deluge, upon the beasts themselves.

Bread is the great staple of human food, and bread lasts all the way from Paradise lost to Paradise regained. When the new world comes we hear no more of bread, but we find the curse removed, and the tree of life with its twelve manner of fruits, yielding its fruit every month. Then we no more shall need bread, nor the labor which produces it. But at present the bread question is a burning one with the sons of men.

As the Creator ordered a bread diet for man to bring him down, it is probable that the making of bread, which involved the use of fire, was a revelation to man from his Maker.—H. L. Hastings.

I sit within my room, and joy to find That Thou who always lov'st art with me here.

That I am never left by Thee behind,
But by Thyself Thou keep'st me ever near;

The fire burns brighter when with Thee
I look,

And seems a kinder servant sent to me;

With gladder heart I read Thy holy book.

Because Thou art the eyes by which I see;

This aged chair, that table, watch, and door

Around in ready service ever wait;
Nor can I ask of Thee a menial more

To fill the measure of my large estate,

For Thou Thyself, with all a Father's care,

Where'er I turn, art ever with me there.

CADET JOHN DUNN, IV.
Royal Flying Corps, Canada, Died March 26, 1918.

"Oh, what hadst thou to do with death,
Who wast so full of life—or death with thee,
That thou shouldst die before thou hadst grown old!"

It seems entirely appropriate, even in this day of universal anxiety and of a wider individual sorrow than the world has ever known before, to lift our eyes for a moment from the horizon with its daily happenings of tremendous import and let them fall upon the new-made grave in Blandford Cemetery of the subject of this memorial. For his life was notable in more than one of its phases—a life not soon to be forgotten. Covering as it did not more than twenty years, it was nevertheless unusually full—full of the things that are worth while, sweetness, fellowship, studiousness, ambition to serve and the self-consecration without which these qualities are mere abstractions. For twelve months prior to January last, while at the University of Virginia and at home during his vacations, he was restless with a great eagerness to be an actor in and not merely an observer of the greatest struggle of all time. He must have projected himself into the future to a day when he might rejoice to be able to say, "I was a part of those things," and securing at last the parental consent, he left the University for Toronto and became a cadet in the Royal Flying Corps, choosing the Canadian service rather than that of the United States only because the former was more fully equipped and offered better prospects of an early transfer to the battle front.

But it was ordered otherwise. While in camp he became alarmingly ill and, though given the best medical attendance and nursing, soon succumbed to the disease, passing on March 26th from this life to the life eternal. Yet his earthly life was in a sense complete, for throughout its years he had responded adequately to every demand, had embodied the best type of a high and joy-giving young manhood, had kept the faith. He went to his rest, as did that other prince, "in the very May-morn of his youth, ripe for exploits and mighty enterprises." B.

Trust.

I know not by what methods rare,
But this I know; God answers prayer.

I know not when He sends the word
That tells us fervent prayer is heard.

I know it cometh soon or late;
Therefore, we need to pray and wait.

I know not if the blessing sought
Will come in just the guise I thought.

I leave my prayers with Him alone
Whose will is wiser than my own.
—Record of Christian Work.

The reason why we have so many crosses, trials, wrongs and pains is made evident by the Kingly patience of Christ. We have not one too many for the successful culture of our faith. The great thing, and that which it is most of all difficult to produce in us, is a participation of Christ's forgiving, gentleness and patience. This, if we can learn it, is the most difficult and the most distinctively Christian of all attainments. Therefore, we need a continual discipline of occasions, poverty, sickness, bereavements, losses, treacheries, misrepresentations, oppressions, persecutions; we can hardly have too many for our own good, if only we receive them as our Saviour did His cross. —H. Bushnell.

Plain Words About Prayer.

In intercessory prayer we enter most deeply into the spirit and experience of Jesus. His most characteristic prayers were for others—for His friends, for the sick and afflicted, for His disciples, for His enemies. Why should He have prayed for these others; one might ask—if He believed already in His Father's universal loving will? Would not God give to all those gifts which He saw they needed without the intercession of any other on their behalf? That same question men might ask themselves to-day in regard to intercessory prayer.

And the answer is for us, as it was for Jesus: there are certain things which the love of God Himself can only do through the instrumentality of His children, one for another. There are blessings which it requires the human instrument to convey. He cannot give to men the inspiration which can come through the highest friendships until there are friends whose souls are open to become the channels of the highest things. He cannot make righteousness prevail among the nations until there are men in the nations who are willing to be righteous. He cannot make peace until the hearts of the people in this land and every land are ready to conquer by His love the hates and prejudices which make war.

Oh, is it not an awful thing—and yet a thing that may be redeeming, too—to realize that all the agonies of this time may be the punishment we make inevitable for ourselves because we are not ready yet to learn and to live the truths by which they might be ended? We say that we are horrified by the war and its ghastly havoc. We say that we hate the brutal ambitions and the cruel selfishness which caused it. We say that we fight for a world that shall be redeemed into an abiding peace. But what if, while we say these things, the coming of all we profess to desire is blocked by our indifference to the forces through which alone redemption can be wrought?

Admiral Sir David Beatty said of his own country: "England still remains to be taken out of her stupor of self-satisfaction and complacency . . . and until she can be stirred out of this condition, until religious revival takes place at home, just so long will the war continue." And another officer, home from the tragic campaign at Gallipoli, said also of his nation: "I think God is waiting for her to learn many things before the war will end, and she is very, very slow in learning."

How fast can we say that we in America are learning all that God has for us to confess, before the travail of this time may cease? Are we learning yet to hate in ourselves the power of the flesh and the world which make self-indulgence and covetousness so real and the beauty of God so dim? Are we learning to pray, by learning first

Certain it is that the mercies of God can be poured out upon His people only as there arise men and women who cry out to be made the channels through which that mercy may be bestowed. When we intercede, therefore, for one another, for the nation and for the world, we are opening the way for the blessings of God. The Nation's Answer to the World's Call for Liberty and Democracy, Dr. J. A. B. Scherer, representing Council of National Defense.

*Invited.

Plenty of people believe in a "common salvation," meaning thereby a vague, indiscriminate gift that is flung broadcast over the mass. Plenty of people believe in a "common faith." We hear, for instance, of a "national Christianity," and a "national recognition of religion," and "Christian nations," and the like. There are no Christian nations except nations of which the individuals are Christians, and there is no "common faith" except the faith exercised in common by all the units that make up a community.—A. Maclaren

All which is real now remaineth.

And fadeth never;

The hand which upholds it now, sustaineth

The soul forever.

Know well, my soul, God's hand controls

Whate'er thou fearest;

Round Him in calmest music rolls

Whate'er thou hearest.

What to thee is shadow, to Him is day,

And the end He knoweth,

And not on a blind and aimless way

The spirit goeth.

—Selected.

Corregio stood before a grand painting, enraptured; and as he gazed, grasping the sublime conception, amazed at the wondrous execution and coloring of the picture, he exclaimed: "Thank God! I, too, am a painter." So, when a Christian looks steadily at what it is to be children of our Father, with sublime thrills of joy he can say, "Thank God! I, too, am a child of the Lord God Almighty."—G. C. Baldwin.

Most of the coldness and indeed most of the criticalness that we experience in the Church is of our own making and is self-generated. In a great household there must be varieties, both of taste and temperaments, and if we have the right attitude and spirit we will come to the House of God not as critics, but as lowly contributors to the weal and happiness of each and every one of its worshippers, be they rich or poor, be they high and low, be they fashionable or unfashionable, be they clothed in silks or homespun.—St. Mark's Outlook.

In one of Murillo's pictures he introduces us to the interior of a kitchen, where white-winged angels are busy at work. One is putting the kettle on the fire to boil, another is lifting a pail of water, yet another at the kitchen dresser is reaching up for plates. Somehow you forget the pots and pans, and think only of the angels, and their presence glorifies and consecrates the meanest act. The humblest roadside pool may reflect the blue heavens, the lowliest service may reflect the throne life. If our hands slack, we rob God and man, but ourselves most. We must not serve for reward, but for love; and when our service is pure there will be no question about the reward.—F. B. Mayer.

The enjoyment of noble architecture and music is not worship, and may be mistaken for it. The hush that falls on us, walking the aisles of a church of eight hundred years; the thrill of nerves and heart as the glorious praise begins, whose echoes fall amid fretted vaults and clustered shafts; all that feeling, solemn as it is, has no necessary connection with worshipping God in spirit and in truth. And we may delude ourselves with the belief that we are offering spiritual worship, when it is all a mere matter of natural emotion, which the most godless man could share.—A. K. H. Boyd.

A visitor, staying with the poet Tennyson, at his home on the Isle of Wight, one day ventured to ask him what he thought of the Lord Jesus Christ. The two were walking in the garden when the question was asked. For a moment the poet made no reply, but seemed lost in reverie. Then he stopped before a beautiful flower, every petal of which seemed to be drinking in the enlivening rays of sunlight, and said, as simply as a child: "What the sun is to that flower, Jesus Christ is to me. He is the Sun of my soul."—Selected.

Fascinating Reading for Sunday or Quiet Hours

Of recent years various expeditions, American and foreign, have been at work in Bible lands, unearthing all sorts of astonishing facts regarding the life of the early Christians. The result of their labors is now reported in an intensely interesting volume,

The New Archeological Discoveries

by Prof. Camden M. Coburn, who is not only an expert at unearthing buried treasure, but a master of fascinating narrative. His pages are as thrilling as romance and as readable as a novel and they bring you facts of the most surprising kind regarding the life and times of the primitive Church.

ASTONISHING PARALLELS BETWEEN ANCIENT AND MODERN LIFE

First and second century manuscripts found in Egypt, personal and business notes, love letters, contracts, mortgages, etc., reveal to us that

Preparedness Was a Slogan in Pharaoh's Day and conscription was advocated by many as being a better safeguard than reliance on a volunteer army.

Excess Profits and War Taxes Worried the Ancient Jews

Trusts flourished and made huge sums while taxation to carry on the imperial government was levied even on necessities.

Nero's Palace Had Elevators and Hot Air Heating to say nothing of a revolving dining-room, a mechanical water-pump, and an elaborate organ with pipes, stops, etc.

Woman's Rights a Two-Thousand-Year-Old Problem

A newly discovered play of Euripides tells us how suffragettes of his day revolted against man, seized the government, and of the result.

The High Cost of Living Was Enormous in Biblical Times

Three days' earnings went for a bushel of beans, and a month's wages of a laborer would not purchase a small chicken.

Millionaires Dodged Their Taxes in Rome and Alexandria

by making false returns and got out of paying their inheritance duties by employing shrewd lawyers to prepare their wills.

The Servant Question a Burning One When Cleopatra Reigned

They demanded days off and other privileges or refused to work, and were quite as independent as the help of today.

Graft and Corruption Ran Riot Under Caesars and Ptolemies

Thoughts For the Thoughtful

Giving up means giving upward.

"To perceive a truth is to begin to live it."

Who knows most, him loss of time most grieves.—Dante.

To be willing for any kind of sin to stay in your heart, is to be willing for the devil to own the earth.—Ex.

"There are but two great realities, the heart of God and the heart of man, and each is ever seeking the other."

"All my life's whys and wherefores, whats and whens are in God's hands." This is the African version of "My times are in Thy hand."

The first duty of the missionary is to find Christ, rather than give Him, among those to whom he is sent.—Bishop Brent.

An army is one army in crossing a river, though part be on one side and part on the other. So it is with the Church of God here and in Paradise.

O Man of Calvary and Bethlehem, Thou Who didst suffer rather than condemn, Grant us to touch Thy garment's healing hem.

A man may strive for influence and miss it. But let him grow within himself, in self-control, in purity, in submission—and then he will not miss it. Selected.

Although to-day we walk in tedious ways.

To-day His staff is turned into a rod, Yet will we wait for Him the appointed days, And stay upon our God.

It is only when we are really armed in Christ for the shocks and storms of life that we are safe to remember that we are made fit in Christ for a double enjoyment of life's joys.—J. Hastings.

Christ can take the man at his worst, and the woman at her basest, and out of them make saints that can love God and that God has loved, make saints that can cause the very breath of the world to grow fragrant and the very heart of the world to grow tender.—A. M. Fairbairn.

The forgiving act of man is generally excited by commiseration for the offender, it is not the plan of his life, it is an occasional act. But Divine forgiveness is a plan settled, eternal, immutable. His forgiveness delivers men not only from the consequences of sin, but from the sins themselves. "He sent His Son to put away sin by the sacrifice of Himself."—David Thomas.

A silver mug fell into a chemical solution which dissolved it completely; the chemist, however, put in some substance which caused the silver to be precipitated in a huge, shapeless mass, and then it was worked over again into a cup. So the Great Chemist treats the life swallowed up by sorrow. Does He not shape it anew to some more glorious end?—Selected.

A life dipping into the shadows is invulnerable if Christ be its Leader and Guide. It is proof against cynicism, against embitterment, against intellectual stagnation, and spiritual coma; and there is no more splendid moral spectacle in life than to see a man or a woman touching old age, carrying in to it undismayed, faith in God, faith in humanity, faith in themselves, as called of God, faith in the future, all of which is frankly impossible, an unknown secret, save as that secret is revealed in Christ.—A. Connell.

It is a pallid and nerveless Christianity that knows no desperate ventures. It is a poor faith, poorly guarding human capacity, which has no debt to pay in sympathy and good will to others, no note of destiny to guide it into service, no glowing passion to be found in Jesus Christ. Our money would not be so hard to part with, our missionary societies would not be so anxiously burdened, our brothers and sisters on the field would not be so hard-driven, with paralyzing possibilities before them and inadequate strength in their ranks, if once we came to feel that this kind of thing is really Christianity, that this is personal religion, and a dedicated life, that this is the consecration and use of all our powers, that this is the inevitable mission of the Church—to make Christ known to the human race.—A. Connell.

God's word has its silences, merciful and beneficent; but Satan's word has its silences, too, not merciful and not beneficent. Satan's word tells of flowery paths, of alluring pleasures, of seductive companionships, of jovial nights and days; but Satan's word is silent concerning the hidden precipices, the gnawing remorse, the degrading bondage, the deathless despair that lie in wait for the footsteps of those who walk in evil paths. Flashing lights, costly paintings, merry music send out their welcome to the passer-by, from halls of fair-seeming which are wholly devoted to the service of evil; but no voice from within, no legend on the wall tells of the ruined lives, the scattered households, the broken hearts, whose history found its first tragic meaning beneath these lights.—H. C. Trumbull.

We all have our share in developing the sentiment of our community. We are all equally responsible for the forces which control the moral development. Our influence depends upon what we are. We need not look at others in this world crisis. The shedding of blood and the inhuman treatment of our fellows could not take place if the lead of Jesus Christ had been followed. God permits because He has given the care of the world into the hands of man. Will man rise to his responsibility? Let us look to ourselves.—Bishop Mann.

Dependence Upon God.

There is one outcome of our present hard experience which it would seem right to expect, that is, an increased sense of dependence upon God. We have been sharply reminded of the weakness of our Christian civilization, of the feebleness of the bonds which trade and commerce, religion and education make to maintain peace, of the insecurity of the order of the world's life of which we have been proud. We had supposed that the nations nominally Christian had been tamed so that hatred, cruelty and war were restrained, and now our work has fallen down about us and the revelation of our weakness and insecurity has come.

Many dangers have come at home which we thought were entirely past, because of our means of communication, the development of our industries and the progress of science, and we have learned this winter how dependent we are as regards the most necessary things in life. A week of extremely cold weather has made untold suffering because of the lack of coal which is but a few hundred miles away from us. We are dependent for our food upon fields far away and the interruption of transportation makes great distress or something worse in our great cities. We have built up a great and marvelous order of trade and commerce, and we find how easily it may be disarranged and how near starvation we are. Whether men recognize their true relation to God, they are feeling as perhaps never before their helplessness and their dependence on the power above. Who orders everything in this world. That is one of the very first things for men to learn. We have not the sense of dependence that was felt in the simple days of the Old Testament or in the days not so far back of us when the fields about the villages and towns provided largely for the simple needs of the people. Without being too confident as to what the war may mean for religion, while hopeful for good, there will be a response in the minds and hearts of the people to the presentation of the thought of our absolute dependence upon God. People are feeling this as never before and it makes a good foundation on which to build up true regard for God and all that enters into the making of a good character and a good life.—Newark Churchman.

Lukewarmness.

You know what a nauseous thing a lukewarm drink is. We like cold drinks and hot drinks, but just a tepid liquid is sickening. You know what lukewarm people are, half and half, milk and water. If any cause, or any effort to do good, to effect any change, attracts to it only lukewarm people, we despair of it, we know that nothing will ever be accomplished.

Now, what about lukewarmness in reference to religion, in reference to ourselves, our parish, our church, our fellow-men, our dear Master? Yes, "lukewarm" is the right word, for it does imply some warmth. A lukewarm bath might be life, an ice cold one, death. You do love God in some degree. Generous impulses and high resolves do stir within you. You do try, in some faint, languid way, to follow in His train. But is there not an absence of that enthusiasm, that eagerness, that devotion to our spiritual state, and the spiritual state of the world, that glow, that fire, that rush which would transform the world, and change this slow, halting, unsteady progress of the gospel of Christ into a magnificent victory?

Now, what do you do, when you find placed before you some lukewarm drink? Why, you send it out to the fire. Do that way with your spiritual life. What fire, do you ask? Why the fire of penitence, the fire of stern resolve, the fire of earnest aspirations. The blessed food so often on our altars is a fire, prayer is a fire, the giving up of the will is a fire. Take your souls then and warm them up. And what do you say to the lukewarm people in your service? "My son, if you want to stay with me, you will have to show a livelier interest, and step around quicker." So God says to us: "My son, if you continue in this languid way, doing a half-and-half duty, if you show no more interest, your lukewarmness will become coldness, and the coldness will become iciness, and you will lose your soul, not because I wish it, but because you will it."

Let us then struggle against lukewarmness; love God a little more, open our hearts to the fire of the Sun of Righteousness. The ice will melt, the indifference will become enthusiasm; warm ourselves, we will help to set the world on fire.—Exchange.

"He Remembereth."

A song from my heart is up-welling,
It's music my soul long hath known;
It brings a glad note of assurance—
The Lord doth remember His own.

Remember! I question no longer—
My days with its comfort are filled:
Like Galilee's blue tossing billow,
His presence all conflict hath stilled.

And out from its sure, tender resting
My heart would in gladness make known
Its life-song, in joy or in sorrow—
The Lord doth remember His own.

Remember! No earth-cloud, obscuring,
Can hide e'en the least of His own
From the gracious, far-reaching compassion
Of the "Lamb in the midst of the throne."

For e'en there its radiant splendor
The heart of the King is, made known;
And, with caring unspeakably tender,
The Lord doth remember His own.

A Morning Prayer and Resolve.

I will try this day to live a simple, sincere, unselfish life; repelling every thought of discontent, cultivating, cheerfulness, self-control and the habit of co-operation; practicing economy, friendliness and helpfulness. And as I cannot in my own strength do this, or even with a hope of success attempt it, I look to Thee, O Lord, my Father in Jesus Christ my Saviour, and ask for the gift of the Holy Spirit. It is a blessed secret, this living by the day. And one can carry his burden, however heavy, till nightfall; anyone can do his work, however hard, for one day; anyone can live sweetly, patiently, lovingly and purely till the sun goes down. And this is all that life really means to us, just one little day at a time.—Bishop Vincent.

A Question of Soul Strength.

What would happen to our bodies if we took our three meals daily on the run? If we never sat down to rest? If from the moment of rising in the morning until we went to bed at night we were perpetually walking, running, moving about? The question is absurd. No one would think of living in that way, except in some terrible emergency. We would be physical wrecks in a few weeks or wake up some morning like the men in the Bible to find ourselves "dead corpses." We would not be much better off if we tried to rest for an hour or two once a week.

And yet that which is so evidently impossible is absurd in our physical life is what a great many of us do constantly with our souls. Day after day we rush about on our business on our pleasure. We do our necessary work. We talk and read and walk and ride. All of us feel the heavy pressure of modern life, and a pressure greatly increased by war conditions. At times we think of little about our souls and the higher and nobler things of life; but it is usually only thinking as we run or as some hard knock comes to us. Sunday comes and a good many of us get to a Church and for a little while there is rest and real thinking. But practically we have been working our souls all the time and never given them a chance for rest and refreshment. For a few moments perhaps we pray, turning to God, the source of peace and strength and courage. But that is all.

Now with such treatment our souls wear out. They lose their strength. When the trial comes they cannot stand any more than can a badly used body when there is demand for all its physical resources. What we need is a time of soul rest and refreshment each day. The occasional church service and the still less frequent partaking of the sacrament cannot give us all we need. We are not often enough nor long enough in God's presence. We need to set apart a definite time each day to read God's word, to meditate upon His will, to draw upon His strength.

The best way to do that is to take up some regular reading of the Bible. A few simple rules will suffice. A quiet place, a few minutes of time, fifteen or twenty if we can manage it, but less if that is not always possible; some definite system in choice of passages; a careful reading; a moment of quiet thinking about the meaning of the words; an application to our own need and then the silent prayer in which we ask God to make His message a part of our lives—that is all; but that is Everything. Our souls will be fed, rested and refreshed. We shall go to our work fit and strong.—Berkeley Churchman.

There are things that cannot be shaken; there is a kingdom which cannot be moved. It is not a kingdom of the world, for the mightiest of such kingdoms have fallen. Babylon, Greece, Rome, magnificent, beautiful, powerful though they were, did not endure because they were not built upon the eternal principles of God. Because they were not in touch with the purposes of God.

It is not a kingdom of wealth or earthly power, but the kingdom of God and His Blessed Son, the kingdom of Christlikeness. It is as wide as the universe, big as the mind of God, but small enough to fit the heart of a child of God. Yes, thank God, among the changes and chances, the upheavals of this reeling, bleeding world, some things endure. And they are things that you and I can lay hold upon and find the peace that comes to those who lay hold upon eternal things.

The world has gone wrong, not because it had no guide, but because, in its arrogance and pride, and power, it refused to be guided. The word of God standeth sure. Heaven and earth shall pass away, but My word shall not pass away. The individual, the Church, the nation must go back and listen to the word of God, or there can never be any power to the nation or stability to the Church.

Great and wise men, influenced by their time, speak for the present. God speaks for all time. In the hours of stress and storms, cling to the eternal promises; plant your feet upon the Rock of Ages.—Bishop Darst.

PREPAREDNESS FOR THE CHURCH

Never in the history of the country has the Church's responsibility in upholding the ideals of the nation been so great. In rendering its share of the essential work, its buildings should provide for maximum efficiency in every department. Consult the leading specialists in all branches of church improvement, construction, alteration, etc.

Designs will be prepared indicating how contemplated changes, etc., can be effected. Local labor will be availed of when desired for the constructive work, the artistic and elaborate enrichment being executed under the supervision of our New York artists.

THE BATTLE-LINE IN FRANCE.

With mingled anxiety and confidence the eyes of the civilized world are fixed upon it, and the minds of many millions of earth's best and truest sons seek to grasp not only the details of the awful struggle but its tremendous import. The greatest armies the world has ever seen, backed by the greatest resources its power and wealth and genius have ever created, are fighting the greatest battle in the long history of human warfare. This is easily said and with difficulty understood. One stands before a map of France and with newspaper in hand draws the long, tortuous line of carnage and death, trying to remember that each fraction of an inch means miles of agonizing conflict with every degree of endurance and desperate endeavor. An army of wearied men stands, as this is written, with its back to the wall, the impalpable but impassable wall of a stern military command to hold their ground at whatever cost. If the line should break, if the onrushing tide of the enemy proves irresistible, one dreads to think of the possible results; the devastation of larger portions of fair France with its accompanying barbarities, the raising of new armies by almost exhausted peoples, the prolongation of the war, perhaps, over weary and sanguinary years before the victory of liberty and humanity is finally won. But we will believe to the last that it will stand, that the power of the enemy will be broken by its own mad impetuosity as they dash upon it, and that once again the heavier battalions will melt before the might of the juster cause.

To this end our prayers should go up without ceasing to Him who sitteth on the throne judging right. The report of every day's fighting ought to be read with a solemn realization and punctuated with petitions. It is so little we can do with our hands, with our money, with our voice and influence, with our little self-denials—and so cheap when we think of what others are paying! But we can do this also, taking the burden of the awful struggle upon our minds and hearts, so far as they are able to grasp it, and pouring out strong intercessions before the God and Father of us all, whose presence is on every bloody field and with every fighting man, who sees the flight of every shell and marks every heart-breaking strain and feels and suffers with every phase of its agony and sacrifice. It will not be in vain that we thus cast our hearts, if not our lives, into the conflict, calling mightily upon Him who is the strength of those who turn the battle at the gate.

There is little time now to recount the losses or reckon the terrible toll of the battles that are raging. We see little of this in the daily bulletins and can well understand the reason. Later they will be known in part and our hearts will be stirred with stories of heroism and sacrifice and torn with a realization of the cost in suffering and mutilation and loss of life. It will be heartrending, but not without its compensation. We still cling by a physical instinct to the pagan notion that this animal life of a man is his ultimate possession, the measure of the highest and best that is or may be his. But the values of life depend wholly upon the uses to which it is put, the aims and purposes for which it is expended. Truth and duty, honor, liberty, righteousness and love, the essence of manhood, these are greater than life and worthy of its sacrifice. For the man who values them not, stakes not everything upon their maintenance, life is emptied of its worth. Of one such the Lord of Life declared, "Good were it for that man if he had never been born." But the man who bravely barters life itself for these cannot wholly lose his life; the choice he makes, the will to duty and sacrifice, must become a residual possession of the soul, outlasting the surrendered breath. We are not of those who imagine that a courageous death can redeem a wasted life or make atonement for sin. But we remember that the Master said, seeking to touch a coward's conscience, "Every one that is of the truth heareth my voice." The soul that makes choice of duty rather than life, who loses his life to save something more worthy than life, who shall say that he is not, so far, "of the truth" and has heard the voice of the Christ, though perchance he knows not whence it cometh. And given the entrance of that voice into any soul anywhere and all things are possible to redeeming power and love.

So at last the supreme significance of suffering and death is not the how, still less the when, but the why of it. It may well be that amid the red carnage of the battle, above the deadly rattle of machine-guns and the roar of shells, a voice sternly but none the less graciously makes itself heard that was unheeded in the careless days of peace, and He who aforetime died that men might live and be free finds forceful entrance into souls whose footsteps have followed His own but a little way. It may well be that death, in its grimest and most hopeless reality, finds its ripest field not amid the ravages of war where men lay down their lives, but in the soul-destroying ways of ease and gratification and self-seeking where men determine selfishly to save them, and die quietly in their beds with never a glimpse of life's high meaning or a thrill of its true rewards.

It may be! But we may be sure of this, that the sacrifice will not be made in vain. Somehow God's purposes are being fulfilled, somehow man's redemption draweth nigh. It is ours, the part of the least, the most useless of us, to bring our hearts into full sympathy with that purpose as we understand it and with those who offer their lives in the performance of it, and to lay hold of that power which ruleth and shall rule over all.

CHURCH PENSION FUND.

Mr. Editor: I have greatly enjoyed your editorials on the Church Pension Fund. They are valuable, illuminative and exceedingly provocative of study on the whole subject. I have filed them all for future reference and I find myself in entire agreement with you in most of your premises and arguments, but not in all; and I think the spirit manifested in your last editorial, that of April 6, is open to objection. You and the Church Pension Fund Commission seem to be widely apart on what this Pension Fund really is; the Commission seems to regard it as an insurance and so informed us in making the canvass; whereas you seem to think of it as a charity. I believe that you can find in the former view of the question an explanation of many of the questions brought forward in your discussion. As to allowing the clergy, retiring before March 1, 1917, more than the $600 per annum until the old pensioners retired before that date with their dependents, have had their pensions raised to a corresponding amount, I believe the beneficiaries of the Reserve Fund agree with you to a man. Indeed, I will go further and say that I believe the clergy retiring since the fund became operative would gladly share dollar to dollar with their older brethren. But I do not think they are greatly edified or pleased with your strong language about the management of the Pension Fund. Mr. Sayre and the members of the Commission need no vindication of mine; if they did they would be amply able to take care of themselves; but I do not believe that any considerable number of either the clergy or the laity of the Church think that Mr. Sayre belongs to that class of business men who say things with a "flourish of trumpets"; or that "the Wall Street corporation is without feeling or conscience, bent only to the accumulation of large funds, which is utterly foreign to the Church's true mind and sentiment." Even if this were true of Wall Street, it is absolutely foreign to the spirit in which the business of the Church Pension Fund is conducted. In these utterances you seem to have gone aside from the subject of your able editorial, viz., to make yourself understood.

A. A. ABBOTT.

Cleveland, O.

(We are glad of the opportunity to make ourselves plain on one point mentioned by our correspondent.

The Southern Churchman is absolutely at one with the Church Pension Fund as to what that Institution is; namely, an Insurance system, pure and simple. We have always recognized this fact.

But in order to secure the acceptance of the Church and to have a clear and undisputed field in which to operate the Church's entire pension system, this Insurance Fund did assume certain temporary charitable obligations. They assumed for many of the dioceses the payment of all annuities being granted at a certain date by the said dioceses to their pensioners. And especially when, at their own instance and as a necessary business proposition, they absorbed by merger the General Clergy Relief Fund, an official and most efficient charity of the whole Church, they assumed the charitable responsibilities and undertook to carry out the charitable obligations of that Fund to all its beneficiaries so long as they lived. To that extent, then, the Church Pension Fund has a charity to administer, and will have so long as one of these old pensioners remain. As a cold business proposition they are bound by the terms of the merger, whatever those terms were; so far as we know they have never been made public. But the Clergy Relief Fund was more than a mere dispenser of money; it was an institution with a heart and a soul, representing the love and good-will of the Church for those who had worn themselves out in unselfish service for her and her Master, and with the purpose not of giving to these as little as possible but as much as possible until their wants were fully met and their comfort assured. We have ventured to believe that this is still the mind of the Church towards these who are still her dependents, and to plead with the Church Pension Fund that, out of the abundant means afforded them by the Church, they should be treated with something of that spirit of generosity which the Church feels and has ever manifested, and would still manifest if allowed the opportunity, in regard to them. We ask that, having put the old charitable Fund out of business, and having taken over its obligations and its assets, it should also take over something of its spirit and purpose, and be, not a charity, but a little charitable in dispensing the great sums which the charity of the Church has put at its disposal. And in this desire we are sure that our correspondent is and will always be in sympathy.—Ed. S. C.)

THE PENSION FUND.

Mr. Editor: In your editorial in issue of April 6, "The Pension Fund," you "beg to be corrected if in any particular we are in error in our statements." While the writer has never made an exhaustive study of the Pension Fund, as we presume the Southern Churchman has, there seem to be some points which might be better understood if we bring in from recollection the statements made in explanation of this Fund in the Diocese of Virginia when it was at first presented. In the meeting at the Westmoreland Club, where our two Bishops and the laymen of Richmond City and others of the Diocese were called to have the plan of the Pension Fund explained by Bishop Lawrence, those who were present will remember that he distinctly and emphatically stated that the Pension Fund would only include those who were in active ministry on March 1, 1917, and those who might thereafter join the ministry. When in our Pension Executive Committee meeting the next day held at News-Leader office, at which both of our Bishops and Bishop Lawrence were present, his attention was called to the fact that provision was made in Canon X of our Diocese for the Pension Fund to include the disabled clergy and widows and orphans we were pensioning prior to March 1, 1917, he said he was unaware of any such provision and remarked, "How could we have contemplated talking over these dependents and including them in the system when we never even had a list of them?" He was told that Mr. Sayre was present at the Alexandria Council when our Pension Canon was framed and advised with in the framing of it. He then said if such was the case Virginia was unique in making this provision as no other Diocese in the United States had so done, but that they would live up to the Canon.

Now, Mr. Editor, you will notice that Canon X, Section 3 of the Diocese of Virginia, requires that the Church Pension Fund "will assume and pay all annuities paid by said trustees (of the Disabled Clergy and Widows' and Orphans' Funds) when this Canon goes into effect," and further on in Section 5 of the same Canon it says, "Nothing herein contained shall be construed to hinder or delay the prompt payment of the existing allowance to the present or future disabled clergy, etc."

The Pension Fund, as we understand it, as explained by Bishop Lawrence, did not contemplate the old pensioners at all—those you put in Class A. The actuaries, it seems, who figured out the system didn't have the number of names of these dependents, and consequently they were not included in the new system, but probably were supposed to receive from the different Dioceses their annuities as they had been doing. It looks as if Canon X of Virginia provides that the income from the invested funds of disabled clergy and widows and orphans be paid over to Church Pension Fund and by them paid back to these pensioners. If the Church Pension Fund was constituted and framed not to include these old pensioners, it is possible the trustees would have no authority, much as we may desire it to so use the surplus, and it might require an amendment to the Canon of the Pension Fund by the General Convention to enable them to do so. No one ever thought over five million would be raised, so we provided that our old pensioners should receive what the Diocese had been giving them, and they were only included in the new system to that extent. It appears to be unfortunate that some of this surplus cannot be used to increase pensions to the old pensioners, but the trustees of Church Pension Fund may be within their rights not to do so without proper authority.

ROBERT BEVERLEY.

Caret, Va.

(1. We were not present on the occasion referred to by our correspondent, but we are sure Bishop Lawrence must have misunderstood the point raised in regard to the Canon of the Diocese of Virginia, or that Mr. Beverley misunderstood his answer. The Canon in question was drawn up in the office of the Pension Fund and sent down to the Diocese for adoption. In its main particulars it is the same as that adopted by all the dioceses on entering the Pension System. It differs from some of them, however, in its provisions that the income from the diocesan relief funds shall go for meeting diocesan assessments, while the Pension Fund assumes the payment of all annuities in force when the Canon went into effect; but of thirteen diocesan canons which we have examined seven contain both these provisions in practically the same terms as expressed in the Virginia Canon. We believe that this proposition was withdrawn after a certain number of dioceses had accepted it on adopting the Pension System, but it is impossible that the President of the Pension Fund should not have known of it while it was being presented to and accepted by so many of them.

2. From its very incipency the Pension Fund did contemplate the old pensioners, those of our Class A. When the system was first proposed to the General Convention of 1913 their claim was mentioned as one that had to be provided for, and it was provided for, as well as the "accrued liabilities" of Class B, in the Initial Reserve Fund of $5,000,000; or else the managers of the Fund assembled enormous obligations without knowing how they would meet them—an oversight which they have never acknowledged and of which, in our wildest moments, we have never suspected them. Moreover, the actuaries did have the number and the names of the old pensioners. In February, 1915, Mr. Sayre reported that answers to their second questionnaire had been received from 98 per cent of all the clergy, and it was on the information thus gained that the actuarial estimate calling for the $5,000,000 Initial Reserve was based. Besides this, the names of all, or practically all, of the old pensioners, both of the General Clergy Relief and of the dioceses, were on file in the office of the General Clergy Relief Fund, of which Bishop Lawrence was Vice-President, which was to be merged with the Pension Fund and was working with it as far as it was possible to do so.

So far as a mere lay mind can discover from reading the canon of the General Convention on the Pension Fund, no amendment to that canon is required to allow the Fund to raise the pensions of all retired clergymen to at least the minimum of $600. Indeed, such would seem to be the positive intent of the canon.

Our courteous correspondent will, we are sure, pardon our calling his attention to these facts.—Ed. S. C.)

PROTEST OF A YOUNG CLERGYMAN.

Mr. Editor: Allow me to thank you for your splendid editorial in today's Southern Churchman on the Church Pension Fund. You are on the right track and I hope you will keep on hammering the truth home.

It is a shame that the Church should allow some of us young men to look forward to easy pensions at the expense of the dear old battle-scarred veterans who are now suffering, and who were dear to the hearts of all who gave the magnificent offering.

I have seen no statistics to show that even all of the interest on the nearly nine millions is being used, and we have a right to demand that much of the principal should be given to these men who retired before March 1, 1917.

Let us be just before we try to call ourselves generous.

THADDEUS A. CHEATHAM.
Pinehurst, N. C., April 6, 1918.

CONGRESS PASSES THE CHAPLAIN'S BILL. NEW LEGISLATION THE CHURCH'S OPPORTUNITY.

Congress has given the Church its opportunity to meet with vigor the challenge expressed in General Pershing's recent cablegram to the War Department. The House of Representatives has passed the Chaplain's Bill increasing the ratio of chaplains in the Army to one for every twelve hundred officers and men. This bill passed the Senate at the close of the last session and the amendments made by the House have just been accepted by the Senate. The President's signature is expected immediately.

The law which this bill amends had provided for one chaplain to every regiment, but in May the number of men in an infantry regiment was increased from twelve hundred to thirty-six hundred. A memorial prepared by the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America and supported by the authorities of the Roman Catholic Church and others was introduced at the last session urging legislation to meet the changed conditions. The present bill not only restores the proportion of chaplains, but, by putting it on a numerical basis, permits the assignment of chaplains to military groups not regimentally organized, which would otherwise be unprovided for. The text of the bill is as follows:

"Sec. 15. Chaplains. The President is authorized to appoint, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, chaplains in the Army at the rate of not to exceed, including chaplains now in service, one for each one thousand two hundred officers and men in all branches of the military establishment, with rank, pay and allowance as now authorized by law: Provided, That there shall be assigned at least one chaplain for each regiment of Cavalry, Infantry, Field Artillery and Engineers: Provided further, That the persons appointed under this act shall be duly accredited by some religious denomination or organization and be of good standing therein under such regulations as may be prescribed by the Secretary of War: Provided, That the maximum age limit of chaplains in the army shall be forty-five years."

At the beginning of the war there were sixty-seven chaplains in the Army. At the present time there are six hundred and sixty-six, of which one hundred and fifty-one are in the Regular Army, two hundred and thirteen in the National Guard, two hundred and ninety-two in the National Army, and ten are chaplains-at-large. There are a hundred and ninety-nine Roman Catholic chaplains, four hundred and fifty-seven Protestants and ten of other groups. This new law will permit the appointment of an additional eight hundred. Here is the opportunity of the Church. Already the General Committee on Army and Navy Chaplains has an abundance of applications and is now seeking to discover whether they fulfil the standard indicated by General Pershing, men "of the highest character with reputations well established as sensible, practical, active ministers." If the Church will give them the backing they need in personal interest, moral and spiritual support, and additional equipment, the ministry of the Church to the young men of the Army will be of incalculable result.

The chaplains already appointed are, in co-operation with the religious workers of the Y. M. C. A. and the "camp pastors," accomplishing much. The increase of chaplains will, however, reach further and deeper, since the chaplain alone has access to all parts of the camp, whether barracks, hospital or guard-house, since he has an officer's standing and can thereby do much for the men which would otherwise be impossible, and since he alone of all the religious workers goes with the regiment wherever it may go—to cantonment, or ship, or front line trench. As Chaplain Tiplady says in a recent article in the Missionary Review of the World:

"The one spiritual need of the soldiers is Christianity: and it must be brought to them by men who believe in it and are shaped by it. The American churches must send their best Christians to France. They must send them as chaplains, as officers and as private soldiers. Christian huts are good, but Christian men are better. . . . They are among their fellows in trench and billet, and their lives and teaching speak amid the bursting of shells and the cries of wounded. The first need of soldiers at the front is, therefore, for Christianity in the flesh, the Gospel incarnate. Give us men!"

"HAVE ST. PAUL'S WORDS THE AUTHORITY OF CHRIST'S?"

First, let it be noted that it is not really a question as to whether Paul's words have equal authority with those of Christ, but whether the words our Lord Jesus spoke while He was on earth have greater authority than the words that He spoke to men after He had ascended to glory. The writer of the Acts states in his important introduction that his former treatise, the Gospel of Luke, told of "All that Jesus began both to do and to teach, until the day in which He was taken up." Why began? When did He continue to do and to teach? It is very evident that the new treatise that Luke is writing is not to be concerning the acts of the Apostles, but the acts of the Lord Jesus, by the hands of the Apostles and through the power of the Holy Spirit. These were the things that He continued to do. And the teachings that were given through the Apostles, pre-eminently through the Apostle Paul, were the things that Jesus continued to teach.

This becomes the more evident when we remember the words of our Lord to His disciples as He told them, "I have yet many things to say unto you, but ye cannot bear them now" (John 16:12). Why were they not able to bear them? Plainly because the Holy Spirit had not yet been given. When, then, did Jesus tell them? After the Holy Spirit had made it possible for them to understand. Indeed, it was the Spirit of truth that brought the words of Jesus to them. Are we to place those marvelous words of our Lord in the 14th, 15th and 16th chapters of John's Gospel above the words that He yet had to tell them, when they could understand more clearly? Or shall we rather interpret those words in John by the later words that Christ spoke through the Apostle Paul and others?

This, according to the critics quoted above, would be interpreting the Gospels by Pauline theology.

Referring to his words in John, our Lord said, "These things have I spoken unto you in dark sayings: the hour cometh when I shall no more speak unto you in dark sayings, but shall tell you plainly of the Father." When did that hour come, if not when the Holy Spirit came in His new way, with His marvelous illumination, which could not happen until Christ departed from the earth and was glorified? "I have a baptism to be baptized with," our Lord said, "and how am I straitened until it be accomplished" (Luke 12:50). So when Jesus was on earth He constantly was straitened in spirit because He could not say the words that He longed to say. There were no ears to hear those words. But when His baptism was accomplished, His death and resurrection and glorification, then He spoke His further words to His disciples and told them plainly of the Father.

Moreover, we must remember that our Lord in His earthly life-time steadfastly maintained that He did not speak His own words. "The words that I say unto you I speak not from Myself" (John 14:10). "The word which ye hear is not Mine, but the Father's who sent Me" (John 14:24). "Verily, verily, I say unto you, the Son can do nothing of Himself, but what He seeth the Father doing" (John 5:19). And in the high priestly prayer He said to the Father, "The words which Thou gavest Me I have given unto them" (John 17:8).

The words that Jesus spoke were supernatural words that He had from the Father, and He told of things that could only be revealed by God. And Christ attached not a whit more authority to the words of the Father that He spoke than to any of the words that God spoke through the prophets, from Genesis to Malachi. Again and again He quoted those Scriptures as the infallible Word of God, exactly equal in authority to the new revelations that fell from His own lips. It was when He was commenting on a single word in that Old Testament record that He said, "The Scriptures cannot be broken" (John 10:35).

But Paul claims to have gotten his words from exactly the same supernatural source as that from which our Lord received His. Only now Christ was glorified, and Himself could give His unhindered revelation, which He was not able to do in the days of His flesh because men were not ready for it; he was not yet glorified, and the Holy Spirit not yet given. And so Paul can say to the Galatians, "For I make known to you, brethren, as touching the gospel which was preached by me, that it is not after man. For neither did I receive it from man, nor was I taught it, but it came to me through revelation of Jesus Christ" (Gal. 1:11, 12). That is the true getting back to Christ! Paul in writing to the Corinthians tells them, "We see God's wisdom in a mystery, even the wisdom that hath been hidden, which God ordained before the world unto our glory" (1 Cor. 2:7). Then the Apostle goes on to say that God revealed these things to him through the Spirit. After this revelation was given to Paul, was he left to choose his own words to convey it to men? What of the authority of the words? The Spirit of God knew that the question would be raised, and he said through Paul: "Which things also we speak, not with words which man's wisdom teacheth, but the Spirit teacheth: combining spiritual things with spiritual words" (1 Cor. 2:13).

Is Paul's "Gospel" a new Gospel? It was rather the full blazing light of the Holy Spirit shining upon the same Gospel that was proclaimed from Genesis on, but, before Paul, largely in dark sayings. This brings us to the startling truth that for the clearest statement of the Gospel we need to go, not to the four Gospels, but to the writings of the New Testament church, particularly to those of the Apostle Paul. Not that the Gospel is not in the record of the earthly life-time of our Lord; but it is there obscured, not fully unfolded. The Good Tidings concern the death and resurrection and saving power of our glorified Lord. His death and resurrection and ascension come at the close of the Gospel story. They are put right at the beginning of the Apostolic unfolding of the Gospel, and run continuously through these later revelations of our Lord.

Paul was a fallible man, as were all the Apostles, but the words of Paul, as recorded in the New Testament, are the infallible words of the Living God.

Let us keep clearly in mind that those critics of Paul who cry "Back to Christ!" are in reality robbing Christ of His glory. One critic unwittingly revealed that the true revolt was not against Paul, but against Paul's glorified Lord, when he said of Philipians: "Here the Jesus of history is completely smothered by the myth of the heavenly Son of God." Let us not dim the glory of that eternal Son of God by any subtle reserve in our whole-hearted and reverent belief, as we read the living words of the eternal God given to us through the Spirit-illumined, infallibly inspired bond-servant of the living Christ.—The Sunday School Times.

THE CHURCH AND THE SOLDIER'S SPARE TIME.

The Social Service Commission of the Province of New York and New Jersey a few weeks ago appointed a Sub-Committee on War Activities in the Province, there being no provincial war agency. This committee has been corresponding with various war service organizations of the Church and with similar organizations of the Government working within the field of the Province, with a view to establishing effective co-operation. From Raymond B. Fosdick, chairman of the now well-known Federal Commission on Training Camp Activities, comes the following pertinent suggestion:

"I am confident that your organization can do very effective work in stimulating the representatives of the Protestant Episcopal Church in communities surrounding our army camps to enlarge their social and religious program for enlisted men so that they may have as many avenues as possible for the use of leisure time.

"As you undoubtedly know, ample provision is being made for work of this character on the inside of our army camps, and a great deal has been done in the towns surrounding the camps, under the leadership of the War Camp Community Service. This latter field, however, needs considerable expansion, particularly in relation to the work of the churches. Experience has shown that the instinctive desire of the soldier with an hour's free time is to go to town, even if the town is only a cross-roads, and it has become increasingly apparent that a great deal of time and thought must be expended in the task of organizing these places along healthy recreation and social lines. Secretary Baker put the matter very succinctly when he wrote: 'This, it seems to me, is an opportunity for service which cannot wisely be overlooked. Each lodge, church, fraternity can look out for the needs of its own soldier membership, and where local groups are unable financially to provide adequately for this task, the larger organization of the church or fraternity, as the case may be, can come to the rescue with more ample means.'

"It is unnecessary for me to assure you of the hearty support of the War Department in the task which you are undertaking."

The sub-committee above mentioned would appreciate correspondence with any rector or clergyman in charge of a parish or mission in the Second Province who may be disposed to further the work suggested by the Fosdick Commission. Address the chairman of the committee, Rev. F. M. Crouch, 281 Fourth Avenue, New York City.

The suggestion here made is, of course, applicable to all communities near army camps.

THE WAR AND THE COLLEGE.

Extract from the speech of President Alderman, of the University of Virginia, delivered on Founders' Day, April 13, 1918:

We have lost from our rolls 450 of our students. Some of the departments are quite shot to pieces. Near 2,000 of our alumni are in the nation's service. These men, young and old, have gone to war. Some of them have already paid the price of freedom with their blood. Others are today in the battle line in France and Flanders. Still others await the call. My first thought at this hour is of them. I take off my hat to them and salute their young courage and their brave resolution. May God spare their lives, if it be His will, and if they can keep their lives and yet do their duty.

I have the impulse to say a word in praise of the youth who are here to-day, and who have stayed here, biding their time and making ready for their task. The year, considered academically, has been fairly uneventful in mere happenings, but deeply eventful in the imperponderable things that count. It has been a test of the courage and faith and calmness and high earnestness of these young men, and those who sit before me have stood that test better, I think, than some of us older ones who have unduly chafed and fretted in spirit. I believe that it is at present the duty of every boy in the high schools to make every possible sacrifice to remain in the high schools until graduation, and that every one who graduates should try to go on to college, unless a special need for youths of his age is developed in the military service of the nation. I beg to suggest, too, that the vacation period should not, in this summer of awful decisions, be given over to mere pleasure and recreation, but that every youngster, keeping his heart and spirits fresh and unbroken by normal life and play, should besides seek to do something, to render some definite service of labor that will contribute towards the great common end.

I believe that you will agree with me that out of the suffering and anxiety and apprehension of these tragic days that has issued a subtle power to see with greater clearness our country as it shall be when it shall deliver its unlimited and unstinted force to the righteous settlement of this war. I have long believed that this war was going to temper and fuse America like steel that has been through fire. Certainly my eyes seem to behold a higher morale mounting in the nation, a better organized national mind, a more inflexible will, a more intelligent purpose and procedure, a nobler and sterner impatience with snarling treason and whining pacifism, a determination to fight and kill the enemies of mankind, a swifter response to the call of our brothers "over there"—men who have endured all privations for our sakes. These glorious Frenchmen and Britishers—never again shall I see one without thinking of him as a brother, nor shall I ever again see his flag without thinking of it as the symbol of eternal brotherhood and unity. The warrior's heart is at last beating in this republic, as the nation begins to realize that its legions constitute the last reserves of freedom in this world.

May I ask, finally, what can this university and all universities like this do, particularly, to serve civilization in this supreme hour of its peril? Answering of necessity in most general terms, I can say that our English and French brothers have pointed the way. Whatever we have that the nation needs must be offered to it freely and gladly, whether it be our youth, our teaching staff or our scientific and technical resources, and yet the university, as an institution, must be kept together and must continue to hold the line of service for such oncoming youth as may be unfitted for present war. There will be a remnant of us who can do nothing else so usefully. The spirit and aim of this university, as of all American universities, fighting a rearguard action to preserve the organization and technique of higher training at a time when the best talents of the world are being consumed in the fire of war, must be to inculcate self-forgetting patriotism, integrity of character in our youth, a development of social responsibility as distinct from crass individualism, scientific research and intensive academic preparation for war, if, and as long as, war shall demand it, but as well for the fundamental social readjustments that must follow the upheaval.

It is patent that an era of thoroughgoing radicalism awaits the world. If it shall prove intelligent radicalism, such as guided the purpose of Jefferson, enlightened by knowledge and controlled by justice, the world will sweep into a grander day and democracy, for which we fight, will proceed to its final development. But if it be a radicalism of ignorance and envy and discontent, there will be a "red ruin and the breaking up of law," and men will deliberately seek the iron order or autocracy to avoid the horrors of license. Therefore, universities must live and prosper, lest even victory over a nation steeped in the philosophy of social Darwinism may issue in defeat.

The Great Commission

Methodists and Missions.

Almost all brands of Methodism on this Continent have gotten into a Methodist Centenary program, and the few small remaining brands still out have just been invited to come in. The Centenary is that of Methodist missionary enterprises, and in the Centenary more than six million Americans will have part. Those who know say it is altogether the biggest thing of its kind ever entered upon by organized Christianity. At first some criticism was heard of the time, the war being on, but Methodists replied that this is the time to prepare; to win the war and the world, and be ready to do both.

Methodists of the South, of Canada, and even of Japan are in the plan.

Colored Methodists are part of it also. Next month at Atlanta, when the Southern Conference meets, another big push is to be given to the program, and later, at a summer resort in North Carolina, one thousand representative Methodist leaders of the United States and Canada are to come together to study lines of work. Methodism seems to be on fire.

The program covers the recruiting of Christian workers and their training, but a prominent feature of it is the raising of large sums of money—the largest amounts ever projected for any Christian cause. From one body alone $5,000,000 is to go into war work. Careful surveys on conditions and needs have been made, and money figures talked of run up to $125,000,000 and more, covering a period of two or three years for its collections. Methodists of the South alone talk of $35,000,000. United Brethren, Methodist Protestant and similar bodies closely allied in history and polity to Methodism have been invited to join in the program. The aims are progress and improved methods, and that at home and abroad, on all lines of Christian effort.

A New Name.

This letter was written by a little girl in Egypt to Rev. Stephen V. Trowbridge, Field Secretary for Egypt of the World's Sunday School Association: "This has been such a glad Sunday for us all. Two of the girls of this school have been baptized (one an Abyssinian and the other an Egyptian), and two others have also taken their first communion. The Abyssinian girl's name was Fatma, but now her name is Naomi, which means Grace, and is her teacher's name. The other girl's name was Aneesa, so it did not have to be changed. I forgot to say that two men joined the church and a baby was baptized. That made seven in all."

Bishop Restarick has completed fifteen years in Hawaii. Among other interesting facts he tells us that five kinds of Prayer-Books—American, Japanese, Korean, Chinese and Hawaiian—are used. There are congregations of Orientals where the men all dress as we do, the girls as our girls, and the women in Chinese, Japanese or Korean costume, as the case may be, the men and boys being seated on one side of the church and the women and girls on the other.

Our first missionary to the Dominican Republic has arrived safely at Santo Domingo. Bishop Colmore reached there shortly after Mr. Wyllie, and on the first Sunday held services which he describes as follows:

"It was wonderful on Sunday morning to celebrate the Eucharist at seven and to preach and hold confirmation at half past nine (such a sensible hour) in the old fort where Columbus had been imprisoned while confined in chains in the country he had discovered. All the heads of the Government were present, including the American minister, sitting in camp chairs or on long benches which had no backs. Beside these, there were marine officers, enlisted men, civilian men and women, and several English-speaking blacks. We had an altar constructed in the fort prison, an enlisted man played the piano, and three others—college men who have enlisted for the duration of the war—formed our choir. Everyone was most attentive and reverent, and expressed his pleasure and gratification at the service."

The Woman's Auxiliary to the Board of Missions has recently put out a number of useful leaflets. Among these are "A Devotional Exercise" (W. A. 26), a litany adapted especially for classes studying the Bible and Missions, but helpful in other meetings and for private use. "War and Missions" (W. A. 24), by the dean of the New York Cathedral, and "Socks" (W. A. 27), by an officer of the Massachusetts branch of the Woman's Auxiliary, will be found useful in answering the question, "Why are missions not postponed until the war is over?" A set of five leaflets (W. A. 25) to be given out on five consecutive Sundays is intended to gain the attention of the woman who is not interested in missions. Those who order this last-named leaflet should state how many sets are needed in any particular parish. For these leaflets and for further information address "The Woman's Auxiliary, 281 Fourth Avenue, New York, N. Y."

FROM THE PRESIDING BISHOP.

New York City, April 12, 1918.

On April 11, 1918, the House of Bishops in special session in New York City accepted the resignation of the Rt. Rev. Dr. Paul Jones, Missionary Bishop of Utah.

On April 12 the Presiding Bishop appointed Bishop Touret, of Western Colorado, to the charge of the Missionary District of Utah.

DANIEL S. TUTTLE,
Presiding Bishop.

HOUSE OF BISHOPS.

Resignation of Bishop Jones Accepted. Rev. Dr. J. Wilmer Gresham Elected Bishop of the Philippines. No Action Taken on the Newman-Smyth Overture.

Meeting in the Synod Hall, New York, on April 10 and 11, the House of Bishops accepted the resignation of the Rt. Rev. Dr. Paul Jones as Missionary Bishop of Utah, elected the Rev. Dr. J. W. Gresham, dean of Grace Cathedral, San Francisco, as Missionary Bishop of the Philippines, in succession to the Rt. Rev. Dr. Charles H. Brent, now Bishop of Western New York, and determined upon due consideration that nothing can be accomplished at this time by an aggressive action on its part in favor of Church unity, beyond that which it has already done. In the last-named matter expressions of interest were given, but war conditions prevent at the moment any definite steps, or at least such conditions are the important matters in hand. It was said unofficially that no new Missionary Bishop will be chosen for Utah, as matters now stand, until the next General Convention.

Bishop Jones, of Utah, was present, and upon the course of the debate, changed the form of his resignation, making it without conditions. Almost all of the time of the special meeting of the House was given up to the Jones case, so anxious were the Bishops to do no injustice, and to place the Church in the true attitude before the country. Each Bishop was given ample time to state his views, and at the last the following resolutions were adopted:

"First, the House of Bishops declares its belief that the Government of the United States has obeyed the law of moral necessity in seeking to stop a war of deliberate aggression by the only means that are known to be effective to such an end.

"Second, the House of Bishops believes that any member of this house is entitled to the same freedom of opinion and speech as any other citizen of the United States, but in the exercise of this liberty he should be guided by a deep sense of the responsibility which rests upon one who occupies a representative position.

"Third, the House of Bishops is unwilling to accept the resignation of any Bishop in deference to an excited state of public opinion, and therefore declines to adopt the report of the special commission, or to accept the resignation of the Bishop of Utah for the reasons assigned by him in his letter of December 20.

"With full recognition of the right of every member of this House to freedom of speech in political and social matters, subject to the law of the land, nevertheless, in view of Bishop Jones's impaired usefulness in Utah under present conditions, recognized by himself, the House of Bishops accepts the resignation of the Bishop of Utah as now presented."

The effect of the action of the House is to leave Bishop Jones a Bishop still, on half pay, or $1,500 a year, and free to engage in such work as he may be assigned to by the Board of Missions, or himself map out for himself.

The election of Dean Gresham, of San Francisco, to take up work laid down by Bishop Brent was accomplished with almost practical unanimity, it was said. On the Sunday following the meeting many bishops preached in New York pulpits. Bishop Tuttle and Bishop Partidge were the Cathedral preachers, Bishop Funsten was heard at the Holy Communion, Bishop Faber at Holy Trinity, Bishop Wise at the Transfiguration, and Bishop Johnson, of Missouri, at Grace Church.

BOARD OF MISSIONS.

Meeting of the Executive Committee.

The Executive Committee of the Board of Missions met in the Church Missions House, New York, on April 9, 1918, with a good representation.

From the Domestic Field we received and acted upon the resignation of the Rev. J. H. Brown as missionary in the Diocese of Florida. The Rev. K. G. Finlay was requested to attend as representative of the Board the Conference of Southern Mountain Workers to be held in Knoxville, Tenn., April 10-12.

The resignations of Deaconesses Crane and MacDonald were also accepted as missionaries in the District of Porto Rico. At the request of the Bishop of Porto Rico Miss M. K. Cramer was appointed as missionary teacher.

The retirement of Miss A. M. Clark as a regularly appointed missionary in the District of Hankow was accepted, but at the Bishop's request she is to continue as a missionary employed in the field for one year.

The Board accepted with great regret the resignation of Dr. John MacWillie as missionary physician in the District of Hankow.

The resignation of Miss C. J. Tracy as missionary in the District of Kyoto was also accepted, as well as the resignation of the Rev. H. H. Kelley, of the District of Alaska.

Permission was granted to the Rev. T. R. Ludlow, of Hankow, to proceed to France to work among the Chinese, under the auspices of the Y. M. C. A.

Mr. J. A. MacDonald, at the request of the Bishop, was appointed as missionary in the District of Hankow.

Eleven of the Domestic Missionary Bishops who were here to attend the meeting of the House of Bishops had a conference with the Executive Committee on matters concerning work in the Domestic Field.

LETTER FROM BISHOP ISRAEL.

The American Church in Paris: Resignation of Dr. Watson.

To the Editor of the Southern Churchman:

Some three months ago, through information gained by correspondence with the rectors of the American churches in France, Italy and Switzerland, I made a report to Bishop Whitehead, of the Commission on American Churches in Europe, of the condition of these congregations. Saturday I returned from a two months' visitation of our camps, during which time I spent several days in each of our parishes in Nice, Florence and Rome, and with the Rev. Clement Brown, who has a private licensed chapel in Cannes, and I found no cause to change the statements made in my report. Of this I will write later.

Just now a new and serious situation has arisen at the Church of the Holy Trinity, Paris. On March the 11th the Rev. Dr. Watson presented his resignation to the vestry. Anyone realizing the strain, both mental and physical, of the last four years through which Dr. and Mrs. Watson have passed will not be surprised, for there is a limit to human endurance even among the strongest. The old "American Colony" of Paris has dispersed, and with it the demand for the present dignified form of Cathedral service: a new era has come and a new problem has arisen from war conditions, to meet which new methods must be originated.

Paris is full of Americans of every type of Churchmanship; and hence in the services and in the methods of Church work there must be radical changes made. In his present condition of fatigue Dr. Watson feels it unwise and virtually impossible for him to attempt these changes. After advising with the Bishops here, he has taken the one means by which he feels some priest may be able to continue to keep up the Church in its present position of leadership for American Christianity, which he has so ably represented in Paris and among the French people.

The vestry, with many expressions of regret and esteem, and with emotion, accepted the resignation, and, as some slight expression of their feeling, unanimously requested him to continue his relationship with the parish by accepting the title and post of "Rector Emeritus without duties or emoluments, and with a right to a seat in the chancel at all times."

Dr. and Mrs. Watson will shortly return to America, where, at the request of the vestry, they will present, after a few months' rest, the needs of our work in Paris. A committee composed of Wardens and the Bishop-in-Charge have secured the services of the Rev. J. W. Beekman, formerly dean of the Pro-Cathedral of the Diocese of Bethlehem, as "Locum Tenens" for six months, from April 1.

With Dr. Watson's retirement the intimate and important relations in which he has been associated with the French authorities from the beginning of the war will of course cease, but we hope the loving interest and contributions of his many friends in America will continue in order that his successor may remain in touch with the work.

Owing to the greatly reduced income occasioned by the war, and the unparalleled opportunity for continued leadership on the part of the Church of the Holy Trinity, the Bishop-in-Charge has appealed to the Commission on American Churches in Europe for $15,000 annually during the war and for a few years thereafter, which appeal he hopes the Church in America, realizing its importance, as everyone must who understands the situation, will support and urge.

ROGERS ISRAEL,

Bishop of Erie, in Charge of the American Churches in Europe.

Care Morgan Hargis Co.,

31 Boulv. Haussmann, Paris,
March 16, 1918.

El Nuevo Siglo: Revista Mensual Publicado Por El Secretario Para La America Latina De La Junta De Misiones De La Iglesia Americana, is the title of a new publication issued in the Spanish language by the Board of Missions, with the purpose of providing Church literature for the mission fields. It is a monthly of eight newspaper pages, though its final form has not yet been determined upon. It will contain Church news, translations of standard Church literature, material for Sunday school instruction, etc., presented in instructive form, and will be circulated in our missions among Spanish-speaking peoples.

Bishop Lloyd: The Board of Missions received a cable from Bishop Lloyd on April 12 announcing that both he and Archdeacon Schofield are well. The fact that the cable is dated from Sierra Leone seems to indicate that the Bishop is on his way back to this country.

SOUTHERN VIRGINIA.

Rt. Rev. R. D. Tucker, D. D., Bishop.
Rt. Rev. A. C. Thomson, D. D., Suffragan.

Bishop Randolph's Funeral.

The burial services of Bishop Randolph, of which only a short notice was given in our last issue, held in St. Luke's Church, Norfolk, on Tuesday morning last, were attended by an overflowing congregation in spite of the downpour of rain. Members of the Pickett-Buchanan Camp, Confederate Veterans, of which Bishop Randolph was a member, attended the services in a body in uniform. A large number of the Clergy of the Diocese and of neighboring Dioceses were present, including twelve Clergy, representing the Colored Convocation of the Diocese. Representatives of the faculty of Sweet Briar College, of which Bishop Randolph was the President of the Board of Directors, were also present. When the body arrived in Newport News on its way to Richmond, the Paulist Choristers of Chicago, consisting of one hundred boys, who are touring the country, accompanied it from the boat to the train singing beautiful and appropriate selections. When the body was being removed from the train to the hearse in Richmond these Choristers again sang an impressive funeral dirge in Latin.

Christ Church, Pulaski: The congregation of this church had the privilege of hearing an address by the Rev. C. E. Ward, of Trinity Church, Montreal, Can., on Sunday, April 7. Mr. Ward was for three years a chaplain in the British Army and was recently honorably discharged, following a wound received while at the front. He has held services within a hundred yards of the German firing line. Captain Ward paid a high tribute to the spirit and morale of the men in the trenches. Captain Ward is in this country endeavoring to awaken the people to the spiritual aspects of the war. The rector of the parish, the Rev. Thomas F. Opie, left this week for a vacation during April.

A fine new pipe organ has just been installed, and was used on Easter Day for the first time.

VIRGINIA.

Rt. Rev. R. A. Gibson, D. D., Bishop.
Rt. Rev. W. C. Brown, D. D., Coadjutor.

Dr. Sturgis' Visit to Richmond and the Children's Easter Offerings.

The twenty Episcopal Sunday schools of Richmond met at St. Paul's Church last Sunday afternoon to make their combined Lenten offering.

The children filled the body of the church, and the song service was heartily carried through, as all the hymns were familiar, and the child voices rang out loud and clear.

E. Aubrey Young, at the organ, was an inspiring leader of a choir composed of children from many of the different churches.

Five clergymen, with Bishop Brown and Bishop Thomson, were in the chancel. Bishop Brown, expressing his pleasure at being with the children for the first time at this presentation service, welcomed and introduced Dr. William C. Sturgis, General Secretary of the Missions Board.

Following the offering, the Rev. G. MacL. Brydon spoke of the need today of wheels, wheels for artillery at the front and wheels busy at home to keep the artillery in the field of action. A Sunday-school wheel, wreathed in green with a hub of flowers, was a feature of the afternoon for the children, and as Mr. Brydon called the names of the churches, beginning with old St. John's as the Mother Church, the children brought their ribbon with the name of the church lettered conspicuously on it, and when all the ribbon "spokes" were fastened to the hub, the six foot wheel was complete, save for the ribbon that went across the flowers, and on it was lettered the sum of $3,317.09—the total Lenten offering of the children.

The committee appointed to arrange for Dr. Sturgis' visit, of which Mr. Robert E. Anderson is chairman, cut out for him two days of very strenuous work; but Dr. Sturgis was equal to the occasion and filled every appointment made for him. At every service he was greeted by large congregations, and his earnest addresses left a deep impression. On Sunday morning he spoke to the Bible class of St. Andrew's church, and at the eleven o'clock service addressed the congregation of St. James Church. Besides the afternoon Sunday-school service, he spoke at night at Emmanuel Church. On Monday morning he addressed the Richmond Clericus, and at a luncheon at noon at the Soldiers', Sailors' and Marine Club, he spoke to the Brotherhood of St. Andrew men who were assembled. In the afternoon at All Saints' Parish House he addressed the Woman's Auxiliary and Mission Study Class leaders. An hour later he addressed the Junior Auxiliaries and Brotherhood of St. Paul, and at night was at Grace Church, where certificates for Sunday-school study classes were awarded by Bishop Gibson. Dr. Sturgis is a charming and magnetic speaker, and both children and adults hear him gladly.

Confirmations: On Sunday, April 14, Bishop Gibson confirmed two large classes, each of which was rather unique in a certain way. In the morning at St. John's Church, a class of twenty-seven were confirmed, two of whom were police captains, and two others were ladies considerably past middle life.

In the evening, at St. Andrew's Church there were fifty-six members in the class, and besides the Rev. J. Francis Ribble, the rector, there were in the chancel two missionaries, the Rev. H. C. Merrill, missionary to the deaf, and the Rev. R. C. Montague, city missionary. In the class there was one deaf mute, who Mr. Merrill had prepared for confirmation, and there were ten girls from the Virginia Home and Industrial School for Girls, who had been instructed by the city missionary.

The Rt. Rev. Edward Osborne, D. D., spent two or three days in Richmond on his way South from attending the meeting of the House of Bishops in New York City.

The Rev. W. Roy Mason, of Mission Home, Greene County, has been called to the rectorship of Christ Church, Charlottesville, in succession to the Rev. H. B. Lee, D. D., who recently resigned. Mr. Mason has accepted the call and expects to take charge on August 1. The Bishop has appointed Mr. Lewis, who will graduate from the Virginia Theological Seminary in June, to take charge of Mr. Mason's work.

West Point: On Sunday evening, April 7, immediately after the service the congregation of St. John's Church re-assembled for the election of the vestry for the ensuing year. The number of vestrymen was increased from five to seven.

The spring meeting of the Piedmont Convocation will be held in Leeds Church, Hume, Fauquier County, April 29-May 1. An interesting program is being arranged by the rector, the Rev. William Meade, who will also notify all members as to place and time for arrival.

NORTH CAROLINA.

Rt. Rev. Jos. B. Cheshire, D. D., Bishop

The Parish of St. Paul's Church, Winston-Salem, has been notably improved and blessed under the judicious leadership of the present rector, the Rev. Phillips S. Gilman.

The various church societies have experienced a new stimulus under his guidance, and among recent gifts to the church are a beautiful silk Processional flag, a silk service flag, brass candlesticks and a handsome altar, with embossed Dorsel for the new altar.

All of the Lenten services were attended by large congregations.

Of unusual interest were the organ recitals each Sunday afternoon, and the splendid sermons each Thursday evening, given by different ministers, concluding with the fifth Thursday, when Bishop Edward Rondthaler, of the Moravian Church, spoke on Lenten obligations.

The Easter offering was over $500, and at the Children's Festival, a substantial offering for missions was made.

WASHINGTON.

Rt. Rev. A. Harding, D. D., Bishop

Prisoners' Aid Association: The report of the nineteenth year of this association, an institution of the Diocese of Washington, with a foreword by Bishop Harding, shows a large amount of work done under the wise direction of Mrs. David R. Covell. Mrs. Covell or her husband, the Rev. David R. Covell, are at the Police Courts every day to lend a helping hand to the unfortunates there and to follow them in prison and out with advice and practical assistance. The number of cases investigated and of offenders given wise assistance are sufficient proof of the value of this work, which has the hearty support of the officers of the Police Court. A hospice, or detention home, is a great need at present, also further financial support and a few volunteers for follow-up work.

KENTUCKY.

Rt. Rev. C. E. Woodcock, D. D., Bishop.

St. Mary's Church, Madisonville, the Rev. C. E. Buxton, rector, has had a remarkable growth. Occasional services had been held by the Rev. G. C. Abbitt, but while other religious bodies had large edifices, it was less than two years ago that a small Episcopal church was built. At this time, after his graduation from the Virginia Seminary, the present rector took charge and the church has gradually taken a leading place in the city's activities.

The building has been enriched with furniture and stained glass windows so that today it is the most beautiful church in the city. Plans are under way for the erection of a parish house.

Offerings are made to every worthy cause and constantly increase. The choir has grown from four choristers to thirty, among these twenty boys and girls. The Sunday school has increased 500 per cent. The communicant list that numbered fifteen has grown to forty-one. Seven were confirmed in February, eight more await the visitation of the Bishop in May, and it is expected a large class will be ready for his October visitation.

Through the church a French war baby has been adopted. The warden of St. Mary's is a captain in the army, and another communicant is head of the Kentucky Red Cross Unit in France. The rector has application filed for chaplaincy.

Mr. Buxton is chaplain of many organizations, a member of the City Committee, chairman of the local Y. M. C. A. and Scoutmaster of a full troop of Boy Scouts connected with the church. Besides these he has four missions many miles apart under his spiritual care.

WEST TEXAS.

Rt. Rev. Wm. T. Capers, D. D., Bishop.

The Rev. W. Bertrand Stevens, rector of St. Mark's Church, San Antonio, has taken charge of the field work of the American Red Cross at the Base Hospital, Fort Sam Houston, Texas. Under the recent order of the War Department, the scope of the Red Cross activities at all Base Hospitals has been greatly enlarged. The work at Fort Sam Houston is of particular importance because of the fact that the Base Hospital there has recently been designated by the surgeon-general as one of the fourteen to do "reconstruction" work on men invalided home from overseas duty. The Rev. Dr. Stevens will be glad to give his personal attention to any men whose names are sent him by the Clergy and others. He should be addressed for this purpose, in care of the American Red Cross, Base Hospital, Fort Sam Houston, Texas.

Notice: Owing to the ever-increasing volume of work falling under the personal direction of Bishop Capers in connection with the ministrations of the Church to the men in the vast camps and cantonments of West Texas and in order to provide facilities for handling the work of the Texas Executive Committee of the War Commission, the offices of the Diocese have been moved from 424-6 Gunter Building to 315-17-19 Prudential Building, San Antonio. All inquiries regarding men in the service in West Texas should be addressed accordingly.

The Rev. Walter L. Lofin, formerly at Quincy, Fla., is now in residence as rector of Trinity Church, Victoria, Tex.

The Rev. A. J. Gaynor Banks, rector of Christ Church, Eagle Lake, Tex., has accepted a call to become rector of Grace Church, Cuero, and minister in charge of the Church of the Holy Communion, Yoakum, in the Diocese of West Texas. He will assume charge of these two congregations on May 1.

The Rev. Benjamin Dennis is now in residence as rector of the Church of the Advent, Brownsville, Tex.

The Rev. Joseph Sherrin, rector of Epiphany Church, Kingsville, Tex., and priest in charge of the mission at Alice, has accepted a call to the rectorship of Christ Church, Dallas, and is now resident in his new field.

The Rev. Vincent DeWitte Kline has resigned the rectorship of the Church of the Holy Communion, Yoakum, Tex.

The Rev. E. A. Christian, rector of St. Phillip's Church (colored), San Antonio, is now engaged in war work with the Army Y. M. C. A., and is stationed at Building No. 1, Camp Travis, which serves the colored troops of the 509th Engineers.

The Rev. Francis K. Little is now serving as Voluntary Chaplain at Camp Stanley, Leon Springs, Tex., under the direction of the Bishop of West Texas.

The Rev. Lee W. Heaton, Diocesan Chaplain to the Army Camps, has accepted an appointment as Archdeacon of the Diocese of West Texas in succession to the Ven. A. W. S. Garden, who has assumed his duties as Provincial Secretary in the Province of the Southwest. The Archdeacon should be addressed at the offices of the Diocese, 315-17-19 Prudential Building, San Antonio.

Easter Day Confirmations: Bishop Capers administered confirmation to three large classes of candidates presented by the Rev. L. B. Richards, rector of Christ Church; the Rev. Benjamin Bean, rector of St. Luke's Church, and the Archdeacon, at St. John's Church, on Easter Day. Large congregations greeted the Bishop at all three of these San Antonio churches. The Rev. Dr. W. B. Stevens presented an unusually large class for confirmation at St. Mark's Church on Palm Sunday.

ERIE.

Rt. Rev. Rogers Israel, D. D., Bishop

Bishop Israel in Camp.

Extract from a private letter from a soldier in France, published in an Erie, Pa., paper:

"Another wonderful thing has happened to the camp. Bishop Israel, of Erie, Pa., has been here. You cannot imagine what a great impression his visit made on the men. Wherever he went, he was soon surrounded by a group of soldiers eager to shake hands with him and talk to him of their personal experiences and religious beliefs. To me the sight of this kindly old man who had come to France to be with the soldiers, and even go to the trenches if necessary, gave the effect of the presence of a saint coming to visit the earth; almost the effect of Balzac's Jesus Christ en Flanders. One of the most impressive times was the communion service which he held the Sunday he was here in our barracks.

"The Bishop was very encouraging to me because of his liberality. He spoke of a communion service he had held the previous Sunday, at which Bishop Williams, the Methodist Bishop, has assisted him; also of having been invited by a Catholic chaplain to pronounce the benediction at a mass the Bishop attended."

HARRISBURG.

Rt. Rev. J. H. Darlington, D. D., Bishop.

York Miracle Play.

The student members of St. Andrew's Church, State College, Pennsylvania, presented before the college on Easter Sunday evening the old York Miracle Play of the Resurrection. The cast was composed of the students and four ladies of the church. The chorus was under the direction of Dean Robinson, of the music department of the college. Professors Dye and Frizzell, of the liberal arts department, rendered the play into modern English, and with the rector, the Rev. George E. Zachary, directed the production. The Guild of St. Margaret had charge of the costuming.

The York Cycle of Miracle Plays, of which the Resurrection forms a part, is probably the most ancient cycle of all English plays extant, and was known in 1378 to be "of olde time," so the play is between six and seven centuries old. Originally written for chanting before the High Altar by the priests of the Cathedral, these old Miracle Plays were given without stage accessories or ornaments, and depended for their appeal on the dramatic impressiveness of the incidents portrayed, incidents drawn with reverent care from the Holy Scriptures. The play was presented here in the College Auditorium as nearly as possible in the old manner without lighting effects or stage scenery. There were between twelve and thirteen hundred people present, and all were deeply impressed with the beauty and splendor of the truth portrayed.

NEW YORK.

Rt. Rev. David H. Greer, D. D., Bishop.
Rt. Rev. C. S. Burch, D. D., Suffragan.

Reception and Dinner to the Archbishop of York.

Perhaps it was the war, or may be that Church people of New York had had small opportunity for a twelve-month to get together, or again it might have been the presence of the Archbishop of York, but whatever was the cause, the reception and dinner given by the Church Club of New York to the Archbishop was one of the largest and most brilliant, the most spirited and enthusiastic ever tendered by New York on any occasion. A thousand diners were on the floor, with two tiers of galleries filled in every part. The speakers were the Bishop of New York, the Presiding Bishop of the Church, the President of Columbia University and the Archbishop of York.

At speakers and other tables were almost all of the Bishops of the Church, the reception having been given also to the House of Bishops in session in New York. Military uniforms abounded and men with titles were everywhere. It was a war dinner in name only, so far as the eatables were concerned, and there was small concession of war-times in the elaborate dressing and jewels. Which was taken to indicate that the seriousness of the war has not yet permeated even the American city that is nearest to the fighting front.

The addresses of the chairman, William Edmond Curtis, president of the club, of the Bishop of New York and the Presiding Bishop were not unusual, save in their frequent references to the war and its aims. Throughout the evening, whenever these aims were mentioned, there was not merely applause. The diners arose to their feet constantly, and continued the applause far beyond customary limits. President Butler, of Columbia, pointed out at length the fundamental grounds for the conflict, and described them as moral faith, even Christian faith.

"If we hold to no particular principles," said he, "what matter it if Germans govern us? As mere governors, who get the most out of plans, they are a success. They know how to handle people and to make resources go a long way. They can take certain things and bring them to remarkable efficiency in whatever direction they choose. Why not let them do it for the whole world, ourselves included? We would avoid a lot of bother. They seem to want to do it. Why is it we do not permit them, and so end the whole business of war?"

"The reason is, we entertain some principles. We hold that Thomas Jefferson wrote truly when he set down truth about the rights of every man. We hold that Right and not Wrong must control. We have faith in God that is Justice, Mercy and Truth. These are the principles, and they are principles of faith, that we are contending for. It has been said of old that without these principles to govern life is not worth having, the world not worth rolling on its orbit. It is being said again at this time by the American people. And they are going to continue to say it, and to act upon their conviction, if it take our lives and our money. Some think we have acted too slowly. But act we will, and act we must."

Archbishop Lang gave in conclusion a long and careful farewell. He recited incidents of his receptions in various American cities, telling with amusing emphasis some of the different descriptions newspapers of different cities had given of him and his appearance. He referred to the comment that he resembled pictures of George Washington. Among the points that we made were these:

That France must not be left out of any calculation of the future, but that, after all, there is a bond between the English-speaking, Saxon peoples that is closer than others.

That he could see, while here, a rapidly growing sentiment in favor of prosecution of the war. He urged Americans not to be too critical of their Government, its possible lack of speed, its mistakes in judgment, but to believe that it will arrive at last and make good all professions in its name.

That England, when he left it, was hopeful, but its cup of suffering filled almost to the brim. However, he would return and give to the English people, as far as he could, such message of encouragement, based on what he had seen and heard here, as he knew would hearten them.

That the British people, and he felt sure the French and the Italian, will never quit, even if the Huns break through at this time. He said nobody thought of giving up, but that Europe would do its best—and wait for the United States.

The Archbishop thanked, with much feeling, all people in America who had been kind to him. He spoke especially of the House of Bishops which he had attended, of its numbers and its quite apparent ability in brains and character, and said he would tell the Church of England to what splendid strength the Church of America has come. He believed, with all his heart, that the cause of Jesus Christ must prosper in such hands, under such Government as the world will surely provide, when victory has been won, and Right prevails.

Bishop Tuttle, speaking for the Church, thanked the Archbishop for his messages, delivered in New York and many other cities, and gave him such word to carry back to the Church of England as brought floor and galleries to their feet with applause that ended only with difficulty. Bishop Tuttle, it may be added, was as vigorous in manner and virile in speech as any man of forty-five.

Archbishop of York Receives Degree from Columbia.

On Thursday before the Archbishop's departure he received the honorary degree of Doctor of Laws from Columbia University, being presented by Bishop Greer as member of the trustees. After the ceremony His Grace of York spoke to the students in St. Paul's Chapel, saying that Oxford and Cambridge Universities have been well-nigh suspended in their work through loss of men in the war. The same night the Archbishop spoke a second time since his visit began in Carnegie Hall. Another speaker was George Wharton Pepper, of Philadelphia, who urged universal military training for young men. Among other things the Archbishop said:

"When I first landed here, I will confess, I felt a difference of atmosphere. This world of yours in New York seemed to me very different from the grim, gray world of nearly four years of war which I had left behind. But since then I have felt rising up, almost as if you could see it, this great tide of enthusiasm, determination and conviction in the heart of this great people.

"I know, I have always known, that you have great reserves of patriotic force, and I am certain that once these reserves are stirred and moved they will have the effect of the waters of Niagara. They will advance with ever-growing volume and force and fall, please God, with decisive effect upon this great and terrible struggle.

"I beg of you not to say any more about the war, the word 'wait,' but to put all your strength and determination into the single word 'now.' I don't think anything has ever so clearly and palpably impressed the imagination and heart of any people as this great and awful battle has proven the heart of the American nation."

The occasion was a meeting held to boost the sales of Liberty bonds.

The Diocese is rejoicing over the fact that the Rev. Dr. James E. Wilkinson, Ph. D., has accepted the rectorship of Holy Trinity Church, Manistee. Dr. Wilkinson is Secretary of the Diocese, and until a year or so ago was rector of Holy Trinity, Manistee, when he resigned to become one of the masters of Howe School. He has now returned to his former allegiance, and the people of Manistee are glad to be able to welcome him back.

The Rev. Chester Hill has resigned his charge at St. Andrew's, Big Rapids, and accepted the rectorship of St. Lawrence's Church, Libertyville, Ill., in the Diocese of Chicago.

WYOMING.

Rt. Rev. Nat. S. Thomas, D. D., Bishop

At St. Matthew's Cathedral, Laramie, Bishop Thomas confirmed a class of eleven, presented by Dean Thornberry, at the service on Easter even. As has come to be the custom, the Knights Templar attended in a body the Easter Day service, at which the Bishop preached. By great good fortune it had been possible to secure a few hours of the itinerary of Professor Robert M. McElroy, Educational Director of the National Security League, who gave a most timely message to a record congregation in the Cathedral in the evening.

The new Parish House of St. Thomas' Church, Rawlins, the Rev. Franklin C. Smith, rector, was dedicated on Easter

Monday by Bishop Thomas. This Parish House has just been completed by the untiring efforts of the rector, assisted by a committee of laymen headed by Mr. George Bible. Following the service of dedication a dinner was served, at which time the people took occasion to present many handsome gifts to Mr. and Mrs. Smith, who have since departed for their new field of labor in the Diocese of Bethlehem. It was with deep sadness that farewell was said to them, for their labors of love have brought forth wonderful results in Rawlins. They leave with the earnest good wishes and prayers of their flock in the Missionary District of Wyoming.

NEW MEXICO.

Rt. Rev. F. B. Howden, D. D., Bishop.

At the San Juan Indian Hospital an addition to the working force has been made recently, in the person of Miss Ireland, who has come from New York. In some cases the Navajo Indians bring their sick long distances to be treated at this hospital.

The beautiful Navajo blankets, woven by Indian women, are an attraction to many white people, and it should be remembered that these same Navajo people stand in need, and can receive benefit through this hospital.

Church Going.

There are many people who think that the chief reason for going to church is for what they themselves can get out of it. In a sense this is true, because we can keep God's holy commandments and serve Him truly only insofar as we receive His help. We go to church largely that we may receive such help; but when people are filled with this one idea they are often impressed with the fact that they get little from the service. They say that the music is poor; that the minister reads badly; and that the preaching is not inspiring. Therefore, there seems in their minds to be no reason for going to church. Now, the fact is, that we should go to church, not primarily to get something from God, but to give something to Him. The main object of church-going is to give ourselves to Him, to sing His praises, to thank Him for His kindness, and to renew our promises that we will serve Him with all our power, and strive harder than ever to make ourselves like Christ. Let us repeat this. The real purpose of church-going is to give ourselves to God. Right here we find the secret of getting something from God. We can get help from Him only as we give ourselves to Him. It is evident that spiritual power depends on our own effort. We can become generous only in proportion as we give. We can become strong only insofar as we exercise ourselves. We can see the beautiful only insofar as we train ourselves to see beauty. It is impossible that we should gain anything spiritual beyond what we give. In other words, if we are to have God's grace and help in our daily life, the only thing especially needful is that we should daily give ourselves to Him in prayer, and that we should weekly offer ourselves to Him along with our fellow-men, and so develop the consecrated sense of brotherhood which alone can enable us to love our neighbors as we love God.—Bishop Page.

We need never fear to go through a storm with Christ.—F. B. Meyer.

Christianity and the Community

Thy Kingdom Come on Earth

At the meeting of the War Commission in New York last week, one of the questions brought up for discussion was the matter of the opening of the Liberty Theatres in the military cantonments on Sunday. The Executive Committee was asked to consider the question and arrive at some conclusion which might perhaps be expressed to the authorities in the way of suggestion on behalf of the Church.

There are two obvious attitudes which may be taken in regard to this question. One is that of the uncompromising defenders of Sabbath traditions who insist that the opening of the theatres is contrary to our Christian customs and ideals. This view has been very vigorously expressed in some quarters. Ministerial Unions have passed resolutions deploring the opening of the theatres, and asking that the present policy be revoked.

On the other hand, a great many people, including probably the large majority of the military authorities, believe that the opening of the theatres on Sunday gives to the men after the hard week's work a recreation which is legitimate, and which is much better than some of the associations they might seek for themselves if left to their own devices to spend the day outside the camp.

Between these two opinions the issue in some quarters has been sharply drawn—not always in a friendly spirit, nor with much mutual disposition to understand each other's view.

May there not be another course still along the lines of which the Church might suggest a constructive solution of the whole question? Certainly the view of the military authorities deserves respect when they insist that the men had better be taken care of in the camp than allowed to seek amusement on Sunday wherever they can find it. Certainly also all earnest Christian people will listen with most genuine sympathy to those who wish to see nothing done that will destroy the ideal atmosphere of Sunday, and blur the supreme value of that day as to the time when men's thoughts may be linked to the highest and most serious things. Might not the values which are represented by both sides of the controversy be included in a policy which would use the theatres, but use them only for such character of drama as had been arranged for by a committee that had in mind some real and helpful message which might be brought to the men through it? There was a time when the drama was nurtured in the Church and used by the Church, with moral and spiritual power. Could not the voice of the Church today help shape this particular opportunity for drama in such way as to make it on Sunday something more than an amusement—something that would by its own interest claim the men as powerfully as the common run of plays do, but in addition would be helping to make them into soldiers like Cromwell's ideal—"Men who have the fear of God before their eyes, and make some conscience of what they do"? Surely there ought to be such plays somewhere in the dramatic circuit today. If there are not, there are actors which could revive such plays, and a committee of the Fosdick Commission which had that end in view could see that it was reached.

God's War Aims.

Some of the happiest results of the great war will be those found neither in the war aims declared in President Wilson's most recent address to Congress, nor in Lloyd George's program issued a few days before. In fact, many of them will not have been planned at all, nor even contemplated—that is by the mind of man. By many they will be considered the "by-products" of the war. The devout, however, will recognize them as God's war aims.

A nearer approach to Church unity seems to be one of these. In camp and trench men of every condition of life or mode of thought stand side by side. And because of that fact, there will forever exist a greater degree of sympathy between them. Distinctions of every kind are being swept away. The same is true of the soldiers of the cross. Christians of every creed and name meet and labor together in the Red Cross Society and other relief work, and are learning more respect for each other's motives and viewpoints. And now we read constantly that, in this town or that, several Christian congregations are worshipping together, not because "the love of Christ constraineth them," but because of a shortage of fuel! Thus God uses this distressing situation to effect what brotherly love and the law of Christ seemed powerless to bring about. Surely He "moves in a mysterious way, His wonders to perform."—Diocesan Record (S. Va.).

"A little one shall become a thousand."

A thousand times more useful than before! This seems an impossible ambition, but it appears so simply because we do not realize the possibilities of the spiritual life.

We are told that one grain of corn could by successive sowings and reapings be multiplied in a few years' time to such an extent as to furnish seed for the harvests of the whole world. Now if there are such possibilities in a grain of corn, why should we limit the possibilities of a human soul?

There is a story told of how John Wesley one day spoke to a young lady on the subject of being useful for God. The words made such an impression on her mind that she suggested to a friend of hers the idea of starting a school for poor children on Sunday afternoons, and thus was started the first Sunday school. Her friend was none other than Robert Raikes, the founder of the Sunday school movement which has spread throughout the whole world.

Nevertheless, the idea of increasing one's spiritual efficiency a thousand-fold does seem impossible to the ordinary Christian. We may admit that St. Paul, a man of like passions with ourselves, is exerting a more widespread influence by his epistles throughout the world, year by year, and that he has influenced the lives of hundreds, and perhaps thousands, of millions of people.

But then, we are not saints nor apostles, but ordinary Christians.

But it must be remembered that the soul derives its power to accomplish things from its union with God, and through its thus being linked with the divine resources, and it is not therefore a question of what we can do for God, but what God can do through us. We have no right to set any limit to what God can accomplish through us.

Would it tax the divine resources to so multiply our usefulness that we should become a thousand-fold more effective instruments in His hands than we are now? By no means! For St. Paul tells us that "He is able to do for us far more abundantly than we can ask or think."

But is He willing thus to use us? Most certainly!

The reason why the kingdom comes so slowly, and the divine plans for the uplifting of the world to higher levels of revelation and experience are thwarted and hindered and kept back, is unbelief and lack of willing co-operation on the part of His people. The ordinary Christian is, and remains, an ordinary Christian not because God is not willing to multiply his usefulness a hundred or even a thousand-fold, but because he is satisfied with his present condition and has no ambition to be anything but an ordinary Christian. For there are passages in the New Testament which seem clearly to indicate the almost limitless possibilities of the spiritual life: "Verily, verily, I say unto you, whatsoever ye shall ask the Father in My name He will give it you. Hitherto have ye asked nothing in My name, ask and ye shall receive." "He that believeth on Me, as the Scripture hath said, out of him shall flow rivers of living water. This said he of the Spirit which they that believe on Him should receive."

We must all confess that even if our spiritual power and usefulness were increased a thousand-fold, we should still not have exhausted the divine resources made accessible to us by these promises; that they would still invite us on to a fuller realization of, and a more complete participation in, the heritage of the children of God. To believe God's promises is to honor Him; and to seek for the fulfillment of them, even though they seem too great and too good to be true, is the best way of bringing out all that is best in us, and of enabling God to use us to the best advantage.—Frederick W. Neve, in Our Mountain Work.

May every soul that touches mine,
Be it the slightest contact, get therefrom some good,
Some little grace, one kindly thought,
One aspiration yet unfelt, one bit of courage
For the darkening sky, one gleam of faith

To brave the thickening ills of life,
One glimpse of brighter skies beyond the gathering mists,
To make this life worth while,
And heaven a surer heritage.

The Third Sunday After Easter: The prophet Isaiah, or whoever wrote the forty-second and forty-third chapters of the book, with that wide conception of Jehovah in relation to the affairs of the whole world that belongs to the period of the Exile and Return, boldly declared that the Persian King Cyrus was God's Shepherd and even His anointed, His providential agent for bringing about the end of the captivity and the return (I Easter). The historian Ezra follows this by the record that Cyrus accepted the Divine commission, giving permission to the Jews to go back to their native land (II Easter). In today's lesson we have the story of the rebuilding of the Altar and laying the foundations for the new temple, which was done among mingled tears and shoutings; April weather, as it were, that always happens when there meet together the worshippers of the past and the believers in a glorious future. The New Testament Lesson was selected for its bearing on the session rather than as a correlative for the first lesson. It begins St. Paul's discussion of the Resurrection. The latter part of the chapter (35-end) goes with the selection from Hosea which forms the Old Testament Alternate, and which, according to the Apostle's interpretation, prophesies Victory over death. The present writer would respectfully call attention to the value in this world crisis of the story of captivity and return as interpreted by the prophet. He saw in it an evidence of God's overruling providence on behalf of His Church and the kingdom of God on earth, "Righteousness, peace and joy in the Holy Spirit," and involving the duty of witnessing to God's reign (see Isaiah 43:9-12). The resurrection of our Lord, which is the fulfillment of the Return as viewed by Ezekiel (37:1-14), also leads to this duty of bearing witness. It was this idea, brought out also in the Epistle, that determined the selection of the evening lessons: "Arise, shine, for thy light is come and the glory of the Lord is risen upon thee"; and "Let your light shine before men, that they may see your good works and glorify your Father, who is in heaven."

The week-day morning lessons continue the story of the Return, with its difficulties and discouragements and particularly the inspiring message of Zachariah; and these are paralleled by St. Paul on the Resurrection (already referred to) and selections from Revelation. This latter book has usually been confined to Advent, but it is also appropriate to Easter, with its Christ who was dead and is alive for ever more and has the keys of death and of Hades (the unseen world) and its blessed promises "to him that overcometh"; even as He overcame and sat down at the Right Hand of His Father in heaven. In the evening, First Peter is given entire, with its exposition of the Risen Lord as Redeemer and the religio-ethical consequences flowing therefrom; and Esther is begun, paralleling the Return and glorifying loyalty to the Law, which was then established.

Collect for the Third Sunday After Easter.

Almighty God, Who shonest to them that are in error the light of Thy truth, to the intent that they may return into the way of righteousness; Grant unto all those who are admitted into the fellowship of Christ's Religion, that they may avoid those things that are contrary to their profession, and follow all such things as are agreeable to the same; through our Lord Jesus Christ. Amen.

Collect for St. Marks Day.

O, Almighty God, Who has instructed Thy holy Church with the heavenly doctrine of Thy Evangelist Saint Mark; Give us grace that, being not like children carried away with every blast of vain doctrine, we may be established in the truth of Thy holy gospel; through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

Note: These early disciples were chiefly Galileans of small education; devotedly attached to Christ; but slow to comprehend His instructions; inclined to jealousy of each other, and of varied temperament. Yet Christ purposed, and did use them in extending His Kingdom. The chief features of that Kingdom indicate what He expects from those He calls to membership in it. With wonderful power and exquisite tact, He used the miracle at the Marriage to manifest His glory. Blessings from Him could be known as the most perfect (v. 10) of their kind; and bestowed with Divine generosity to refresh and cheer mankind now and eternally. (Rev. 19:7, 9) Those who seek His blessing once ought to do this daily, and in a faith growing by this exercise.

St. Mark's Day.

Sarah Cecelia Jukes.

St. Mark is commonly supposed to be John Mark, nephew of St. Barnabas, who on his first trial fell away from the work and was refused another trial by St. Paul, but was afterwards sent for by him and acknowledged to be "profitable for the ministry." Of his father we know nothing, but his mother was Mary, a pious Jewish matron, one of the prominent and well-to-do members of the Apostolic Church, who dwelt at Jerusalem. His mother seemed to be intimately acquainted with St. Peter; and it was to her house, as to a familiar home, that the apostle repaired after his deliverance from prison. This fact accounts for St. Mark's intimate acquaintance with that apostle, to whom also he probably owed his conversion, for St. Peter calls him "his son."

There are reasons for identifying him with the "certain young man" who, observing what took place at Gethsemane, fled when surprised by the guards, leaving behind him the linen robe in which he was wrapped. The minuteness of the details given by St. Mark alone seem to point to himself.

The Church's Hymns.

N. B. T.

Like bells they ring across the years,
The precious hymns we used to sing;
From hill and valley of the past,
From meadow, wood and field they ring—
Old tender words, old tuneful airs,
Old loved refrains with music rife:
The hopes, the vows, the dreams, the prayers
Of all a pilgrim life.

They ring, While shepherds watched their flocks,
And once again the night is filled
With songs and wings and starry skies,
And once again my heart is thrilled;
They ring, A green hill far away,
And plain I mark the city wall;
Ring, Jesus, tender shepherd, hear,
And soft the shadows fall

Ring Onward, Christian soldiers, and
My feet are marching valiantly;
The Son of God goes forth to war,
And lo my banner lifted high!
Ring Happy day that stays my choice,
And solemn hands are on my head;
Ring slow, with beauty in their voice,
Lord, is Thy table spread?

Ring, He is risen! clear and free,
And Easter lilies light the sod;
Ring, for one stormy memory,
A mighty fortress is thy God.
Ring, Softly now the light of day,
And bright forgotten sunset fire
Fades gently on my sight away
Beyond a golden spire.

Ring out, My faith looks up to Thee
—Ah, one sweet saint's beloved song!—
Ring high, Forever with the Lord,
And touch me in the weeping throng;
Ring, Rock of Ages, cleft for me,
And as I hear it in my tears
Safely I hide myself in Thee,
As in the other years!

Ring on, old hymns of long ago,
Ring, silver bells, from out the past;
Ring, Paradise, O Paradise,
When I am weary grown at last,
Yea, to my heart it shall be given
To hear unmarred the blessed strains,
Until the sweet new bells of heaven
Ring back the old refrains!

When Changes Come.

If one were to judge by the traffic, the love of change is an overpowering passion of the soul. Endlessly the shuttle of traffic weaves its web of change over the face of the earth, over the lives of men. All of us feel the stir of it, the desire for a different outlook, for glimpses of other folk and scenes. Hence the restless movement on land and sea, the currents of enterprise and adventure and exploration.

But the love of change does not bear upon life quite so hard as the fear of it. We welcome the changes that we devise for ourselves; we look with concern at the horizon from which we conjecture the possible coming of changes not of our choosing. We are great believers in things as they are; we are devotees of the arrangements with which we are familiar—unless, indeed, we decide ourselves that they ought to be different.

We do not always discriminate wisely in proposing changes, for some of the things we restlessly seek are very unsatisfying when we get them, while others that would be infinitely a gain to us are kept at a distance by our fear or our indifference. However, so long as we think we are managing the affair, and are proceeding with gathered experiences that we approve, we are likely to be happy about it.

It is the thing over which we have no real control that stirs our misgivings. The loss of work through some economic upheaval; the death of loved ones; the breaking down of health; the inroads of age—what forebodings darken the moments when our thoughts hover about such prospects!

It is strikingly true that the issues well recognized by most of us to be wrapped up in the hidden plans of God are those that we most acutely dread. Not the things in which we perceive a place for our controlling hand. For we often cry out in crises, "Oh, it would be so different if I could only do something about it; but I can only wait!" The changes most feared, then, are those that come straight from the One who loves us most, not reshaped by any human touch!

We should not have the fear of change that we do have, if we had more fear of distrusting God. In His unfolding plan for our lives there will always be changes quite beyond our foresight or planning. You note year after year a great pine tree where two mountain streams meet in a wonderful forest. One day you pass that way and the tree is a wreck, splintered unbelievably by the lightning stroke. You thought of that tree as a permanent part of the landscape, and you expected to see it each year when you took your mountain outing. But it is gone now. The change has come, the type of change that we know does come. Why not quietly realize the fact of change, and find a way to survive the disappearance of the old, loved landmarks and friends, with a trustful spirit? We are likely to think that things will go on as they are, until we come upon the stricken pine, or the empty chair, or the news of an old friend's Home-going. We know better. Such changes are the normal experience of mankind.

But when changes come we ought not to find ourselves hardened to them. We need not let the certainty of altered circumstances, the sure coming of life into empty places, make any lines of grimmess in the face that we turn toward the facts. Some of the most precious disciplines of life come to us after we have decided not to lock up our griefs behind the iron doors of silent, secret agony, but to let the whole meaning of the change through which we have passed take its full share in mellowing our sympathies, and in making us channels of an understanding helpfulness to others.

A country woman, whose life was smitten with a keen disappointment in its earlier years, was so distracted by her grief that reason failed again and again. But God had not let go of her life, and as the years passed she emerged into the large and sunlit atmosphere of joy in Christ. Very poor in this world's goods, she became rich in other ways, and her home became a Bethel for the unfortunate and sinning. It was her purpose, she said, that no one who visited it should leave without a blessing. She stood one day in the open doorway of another home, about to take her leave after a brief call upon that household. They had knelled in prayer with her, at her own request, and she had asked God to bless all within that home. She turned back as she was about to leave, and with a quiet smile upon her face she said: "You know we cannot always tell just how God will send the blessing we ask for. He will surely send it"—and then with a look of remembrance and of joy, "but it may be the pruning hook, you know." By way of the pruning hook her own life was bearing fruit even in that moment. And fruit-bearing does not arise from grim resignation.

Just now the world is a welter of bewildering changes, running like streams of volcanic fire along new channels, excoriating life with a fury that staggers the mind. Not only the glare of national upheavals is in our eyes, but the fire burns its way into the heart of our tenderest personal relationships. How are men and women to meet the violent, cataclysmic changes that are coming into individual lives the world over? In the thick of it all, one age-long fact looms with a pure and reassuring glory before our smitten eyes.

There walks with us One who does not change, in a life-giving relationship that does not change, nor has changed from the beginning.

He was before the dawn of things. He walks unweariedly with man through man's long day. He waits in the red sunset of the age to prepare a new day glorious even beyond prophetic power to disclose in its fullness. Those who walk with Him are in the world, but not of it, moving with understanding mind and strong heart and joyous faith straight through the storms of change, gathering up into a peace that passeth understanding the very elements of life that apart from Him are impossible to resolve into the material of hope and joy. That of which I may be deprived was never permanent; that which cannot be taken away I am not to lose. All the deepest elements of the sweet and holy relationships of life no violence of change can take from me, for the Christ with whom I walk gave them to me, and wove them into the wonder that we call life. So while my heart may ache with longing for those who have been called Home, while I may be stripped of goods and position and dear associations, I may take the road day by day with my Friend, and in that unending fellowship talk with Him about the memories I cherish, while looking with all joy and trustfulness for the next disclosure of his plan.

Indeed, when changes come, Christ not only does not go, but—if that were possible—draws even closer than before. Are we really afraid that, having put our trust in Him, we shall find Him unequal to our need of guidance and comfort? Shall we not rather, from full hearts and an abounding faith, sing with an ever-deepening joy as we journey:

"In heavenly love abiding,
No change my heart shall fear,
And safe in such confiding,
For nothing changes here.
The storm may roar without me,
My heart may low be laid;
But God is round about me,
And can I be dismayed?"

"Wherever He may guide me,
No want shall turn me back;
My Shepherd is beside me,
And nothing can I lack.
His wisdom ever waketh,
His sight is never dim;
He knows the way He taketh,
And I will walk with Him."

Prospice.

The ancient and the lovely land
Is sown with death; across the plain
Ungarnered now the orchards stand,
The Maxim nestles in the grain.
The shrapnel spreads a stinging hail —Where pallid nuns the cloister trod,
The airship spills her leaden hail;
—But—after all the battles—God.

Athwart the vineyard's ordered banks,
Silent the red-vent forms recline,
And from their stark and speechless ranks
There flows a richer, ruddier wine;
While down the lane and through the wall
The victors writhe upon the sod,
Nor heed the onward bugle-call;
—But—after all the bugles—God.

By night the blazing cities flare
Like mushroom torches in the sky;
The rocking ramparts tremble ere
The sullen cannon boom reply,
And shattered is the temple-spire,
The vestment trampled on the clod,
And every altar black with fire;
—But—after all the altars—God.

And all the prizes we have won
Are buried in a deadly dust;
The things we set our hearts upon
Beneath the stricken earth are thrust;
Again the Savage greets the sun,
Again his feet, with fury shod,
Across a world in anguish run;
—But—after all the anguish—God.

The grim campaign, the gun, the sword,
The quick volcano from the sea,
The honor that reveres the word,
The sacrifice, the agony—
These be our heritage and pride,
Till the last despot kiss the rod,
And, with man's freedom purified,
We mark—behind our triumph—God.

Hindering Prayer.

Strange though the name may sound, there is such a thing as hindering prayer, and many an earnest Christian prays it. You withdraw into your closet with some precious heart's desire, arrayed in what you consider all the proper panoply of prayer—humbleness, reverence, firm belief in the power of God—and afterward you look back and realize that in some way the dim, sweet hour failed. The trouble was that you shut into the closet with you a plaguing doubt. Not a doubt of God's ability to answer prayer, not a doubt of the fact that He could only answer it aright—just a nameless, bodiless doubt. As your lips moved your heart whispered, "I dare not leave so big a thing unprayed for, but I hardly think it will ever be granted me." And you go out as wistful and as wavering as you went in.

Thus we defeat our own purposes, and God's. We pray, "Make this dream come true," and say to ourselves in an aside, "Yet it can never be more than a dream"; we plead, "Let this cup pass," and murmur in our souls, "But it will not pass." Then, when the answer fails to come, we take a mournful pleasure in recalling the far-sightedness of our prophecy.

Small wonder that the early disciples cried, "Lord, teach us to pray!" There are few things that we see through a glass more darkly than the real nature of prayer. The weakness of some petitions is easy to point out—the perfunctory prayer wins nothing because, in truth, it asks for nothing; the petulant, unthinking prayer—like a child's fretting for unattainable toys—must go unanswered perforce. It is about the hindering prayer that we are blindest—the prayer that is earnest and thoughtful, yet handicapped by a vague and faltering doubt that makes Omnipotence impotent while it pleads.

The matter grows clearer when we come to realize that the Almighty voluntarily imposes limits upon His power in order that we may pray. If we think of prayer as a lever, and of the infinite power of heaven as a wonderful, intricate machinery that on occasion waits to be put in motion by that lever, we come to a better understanding of what prayer ought to be. And once we understand, surely we shall less frequently in our praying hinder God.

For the Southern Churchman Concerning Candor.

When Betty joined her four schoolmates she was a little out of breath. Her eyes were bright with earnestness. "I believe in candor at all times," she declared. Celia Morse would have criticised me readily enough behind my back. I chose to speak my mind to her face—and she's angry with me for it."

The quartette had linked arms and started up the hill together, but Ruth Lovell turned to watch a little figure whisking into the distance with a flutter of resentful skirts. Her own eyes were serious. "What was 'your mind,' Betty?" she asked.

"Just what everyone else's mind is on the subject of Celia's singing," was the prompt reply—"namely, that her 'alto' is no more alto than it is tenor. She brought the remark on herself by announcing that she expected to take vocal lessons."

Two or three of the girls laughed uncertainly. "That's what you might call having the courage of your convictions," Anne Murray commented. Anne was always open in her admiration of self-confident people, though now she did look a little shocked.

Gretta Hall's face kindled with mischief. "It was candor with a vengeance, Betty!" she exclaimed. "I declare, though, I believe you're right. Say frankly what you think—when you're brave enough to say it, especially to a firebrand like Celia."

"I dare either one of you," put in Clare Brown, "to call Celia a firebrand to her face." She chuckled at the thought.

Betty halted the march at the top of the steep incline. "Well, I don't always live up to my principles," she confessed. "But that's my slogan: candor at all times. Ruth, what are you pondering about?"

Ruth's smooth brow was furrowed. "I don't quite understand. What if we all came squarely out with every thought and sentiment?"

Betty shook her red locks. "It would stir up a storm, at first," she answered, but in the end we'd have a squarer old world. Don't you agree with me, you other three?"

People generally did agree with Betty Archer. Anne acquiesced somewhat reluctantly, but Clare and Gretta nodded with emphasis. "It would be fun, too," they said in one breath.

"It would be common sense," Betty declared in her positive way. "Let me illustrate," she added, gaily, in the tones of a favorite professor. She seized a long pin from her hat to do duty as a pointer. But with her first dramatic flourish a gust of wind snatched the hat and sent it sailing down the slope.

The would-be declaimer went scampering after her lost property. "Don't bother," she called. "The wind and I will have this out between us."

But the chase was a long one, for the hat was broad and the wind wild. The others looked on with sympathetic laughter.

"Do you know, Betty's not as supple as she once was," Gretta said, suddenly. "She eats too much candy for a crack tennis player."

"I don't think anyone ever considered her a crack player," Clare spoke up with some asperity. "But as you say, her playing's gone back, lately, sure enough. Even Celia does better. There," she added, "I ought not to have said that!"

Though Ruth's quick glance was mischievous, it did not hold a hint of malice. "Why not," she asked, "if it was in your mind?"

The other three looked guilty. "Caught in our own trap!" cried Gretta.

She thought seriously for a moment. Gretta was nothing if not thorough. "See here, girls," she said, presently, "we ought to try out this proposition before we shelve it. Who'll have 'the courage of her convictions'?"

Before any one could answer, Betty rejoined them, panting but in high good humor, her captured hat in her hand. She did not notice at all the tenseness of the little group. Gretta cleared her throat. "Bet," she said with visible effort. "You could run a great deal more easily if you'd let chocolate drops alone."

Betty's bright color deepened. "Dear me, Gretta Hall!" she rejoined, uncertain how to take the remark. "When did you start in on lectures?"

Clare's cheeks were as flushed as Betty's by this time, but she spoke up before Gretta could reply. "It's the truth, Betty. Your game shows it these days, too."

Betty's head went up, and she looked quickly from one to the other. There was no doubt about her bewilderment. Evidently the brisk run had banished from her mind all memory of their late conversation.

She turned to the shrinking Anne. "And what have you to say?" she demanded, hotly.

Anne was not at all equal to the occasion, and stumbled badly. "O, nothing," she said. Then she amended, miserably and irrelevantly, "You're still wearing Ruth's scarf that you borrowed a month ago."

Mildred's color had faded when she turned to Ruth, and her voice was cold. "And how did I strike you, Ruth, as I ran down the hill?"

Ruth's clear eyes held a look of mingled laughter and distress. "You didn't strike me particularly at all, honey," was her answer. "I do remember noticing, I believe, that the sunlight made your head shine like a burnished copper kettle."

Betty's angry face softened; then it grew hard again. "Now!" she said, "suppose I begin to be candid—"

At the word she caught herself up short. A flash had cleared things suddenly for her. "I see," she said presently, with a crooked smile. "Didn't know how to take my own medicine!"

Gretta flung an impulsive arm about her shoulders. "And we certainly didn't know how to give it. My, how we blundered!"

"I deserved what I got," Betty acknowledged, good-naturedly. She was square enough to own when she was beaten. "Don't look so abject, Anne."

"Speaking your mind is a hard matter," Anne explained. "Unless, now, you happen to have a pleasant mind, like Ruth's."

Betty took off her hat and ran a slow hand over her red curls. "That's the truth," she agreed. "She saw beauty in my carrot-top, and told me so. Here is a mighty comfortable kind of candor. When Celia lets me speak to her again I'll try that brand, I think!"

For the Young Folks

A Child's Day.

A merry song in the morning,
When the sun creeps up like gold,
When the grass all through is pearly dew,
As full as it can hold,
A duty here, a pleasure there,
A long, long time for play,
A merry song in the morning
Makes music all the day.

A sunny smile at noontide,
When the deep blue sky's a sea,
When drifting crowds of snowy clouds
Are soft as soft can be;
And in the fields a flower's here,
A ripened berry there—
A sunny smile at noonday
Makes all the world more fair.
A little sigh in the evening,
A sigh of sweet content,
When faint lights still across the hill
Tell where the sunset went;
When stars look down like angels' eyes,
And tired people rest,
And children nod like sleepy birds,
With mother's arms for nest.

A smile, a song, a happy sigh—
So do the little years go by!

Janie's Lesson.

N. B. T.

Janie had always supposed that only grown people adopted children, so she was surprised and delighted when Uncle Alec sent word that he had adopted a French orphan in her name and was turning the little girl over to her for the duration of the great war.

"That means," mother explained, smiling into Janie's round eyes, "that this child, the daughter of a dead French soldier, is lonely and needy, and that Uncle Alec has picked her name from the long list of French orphans, and in your name will send her money and clothes from time to time. Many people in America are helping the poor children of France in that way."

Janie's face shone; she felt very proud. "And this little Jeanne is my own orphan?" she asked. How wonderful to have a child across the sea belonging to you, in a way!

"Your own orphan," mother answered. "Uncle Alec is willing to send her money and supplies, but he is a very busy man, so he has given her to you, and he expects you to write to her and to do what you can to comfort her forlorn little heart."

Janie was enraptured. She could not find pen and paper soon enough, and an hour later she brought to her mother a dainty letter, written on tiny, pale blue stationery decorated with little silver birds. But as she folded the closely-written sheet her look grew troubled.

"How can Jeanne understand my language?" she asked. "O, mother, we had forgotten that part!"

Mother, who usually remembered things, had forgotten that part, too. What was to be done? "You wouldn't want me to write them for you," she said. "I'll send it as it is, and perhaps Jeanne can find some one to translate it. Then what do you think of trying to learn a little French so that you can correspond with her in her own tongue?"

Janie's face fell a little. She was generous and loving, but she did not like to study. Anything on earth she was willing to give Jeanne, she thought, except that. "Let's wait and see," she said, sealing and stamping the letter hurriedly. "I don't believe she'll have a bit of trouble getting this read."

A few weeks later Janie found in the post-office a small gray envelope with a foreign postmark. She ran home waving it excitedly. "She did read it! She did, mother!" Then, as the note fell out of the envelope, she looked up somewhat shame-facedly. "I'm glad you can make out French," she said.

Jeanne had written a loving little letter of joy—mother could translate it enough for that. It was wonderful, the small writer said, to hear from another girl far across the sea, with the same age and the same name as her own. An English lady had put the letter into French for her, it seemed. She went on to tell, in neat writing on the rough gray sheet, how she lived in a cottage with her widowed mother and baby brother, how brave and good her soldier father used to be, and how sometimes they could hear the great guns of battle booming not very far away.

Janie listened with first a smile and then a tear. "I am going to begin tomorrow to learn French," she declared. "And before long I'll be able to write a short note, anyway, that Jeanne can read without trudging a mile to the English lady."

But when the next day came it seemed too hard to settle down to a new kind of study, and as the weeks rolled by it seemed harder. She grew to love her French orphan more and more, as she received the painstaking, faithful little letters, but somehow she never loved her quite enough to learn French. And each time Jeanne told, uncomplainingly, of walking the long mile to the English lady's house in order to hear the precious message from her friend across the sea. Mother offered more than once to help her daughter with the lessons, but always Janie put her off with an excuse. Who could learn French during vacation?

Jeanne's birthday fell only a week before her own, she had found, and when the time drew near she took keen pleasure in choosing a gift to be sent across the water—a simple little dress, with pink polka-dots to set off the wearer's dark hair and eyes. It took all of the contents of her savings bank, but Janie was not stingy. She mailed the package with a light heart. With it went a birthday letter.

A long time passed without any word from France. Janie grew anxious, after a while, and wrote again, but still no answer. At length a letter from little Jeanne's mother came. Jeanne had been sick for many weeks, she said—not dangerously ill, but feeble and listless. The little girl had walked to the post-office and brought back Janie's letter on the day before she grew ill. But the office was far away, and this was the first time the mother had found a chance to write. "The English lady has gone back to England," she went on, "and so my little girl cannot tell what is in your letter. We do not understand your language. Jeanne looks at your letter and cries."

Poor Janie cried, too. She felt that tears were useless now, yet she could not hold them back. "All that way to the post-office in the rain, maybe, to get my letters, then another long walk to have them read; and the last that reached her she cannot even read at all! Mother, she did not mention the little dress—surely she could understand that, anyway!"

Mother explained that packages travel more slowly than letters. "It probably reached the office the day after her last trip. Maybe it is still there; I fear that possibly, being uncalled for, it has started back to the return address."

Janie's chin quivered. "If she could have read the letter they might have found some way to send for the package," she said, sorrowfully.

Some time afterward a little plain gray envelope with a queer postmark fell out of the bundle of mail again. Janie caught it up with a little cry.

"The beautiful dress has come," Jeanne wrote. "A passing traveler brought it, and I knew your writing on the back. I am so happy that I am well again."

And not so very long after that a small pale blue envelope decorated with a silver bird went speeding to France. It was an American envelope and the postmark was American, but the words of the letter inside, though they straggled a little, were every one French!

Sensible Roosters.

"Papa," said little Harry excitedly, "Pliny Smith says his bantam rooster can lick my big Plymouth Rock; but he couldn't, could he, papa?"

Papa was too busy, so he only said: "O, Harry, you mustn't talk about roosters fighting. It isn't nice for roosters to fight any more than it is for little boys."

Harry said no more; but he did not forget about the matter as soon as did his father, for a couple of days after this he met his father at the gate with a proud smile on his face and said: "O, papa, Pliny's rooster didn't lick mine at all."

Papa looked grave. "I hope you didn't have the fight," he said.

"Well, papa," acknowledged Harry, "Pliny just bragged so much about how his rooster could lick mine that I told him to go on and bring him over, and we would see."

Papa looked stern, but said nothing. "So I swept off a place in the coal-house," continued Harry, "and threw some corn on the floor, and then told Pliny to bring on his bantam."

Papa looked stern, but there was a suggestion of a twinkle in his eyes.

"Pliny said," went on Harry, coming close to his father's knee, "that whichever rooster first quit fighting and went to eating the corn was to be counted licked. So we threw the roosters into the coal-house and shut the door, and went and climbed up to the window." Harry stopped with a curious smile on his lips.

"And which of them went to eating?" asked papa.

"Why, we don't know, papa," replied Harry, "cause when we got to the window both of them were eating as fast as they could."

"And they didn't fight at all?" papa went on, while the twinkle in his eyes grew even plainer.

"Naw," Harry's voice was quite expressive of disgust. "When we opened the door they both came out and walked around together, just as Pliny and I do, and each one tried to see which could crow the louder."

"I do believe those roosters have more sense than you and Pliny have," said papa. And Harry wondered what he meant.—The Pacific.

Tangle of Wood and His Saw.

Esau Wood would saw wood.

All the wood Esau Wood saw Esau Wood would saw. In other words, all the wood Esau saw to saw Esau sought to saw.

O, the wood Wood would saw! And oh, the wood-saw with which Wood would saw wood.

But one day Wood's wood-saw would saw no wood, and thus the wood Wood sawed was not the wood Wood would saw if Wood's wood-saw would saw wood.

Now, Wood would saw wood with a wood-saw that would saw wood, so Esau sought a saw that would saw wood.

One day Esau saw a saw saw wood as no other wood-saw Wood saw would saw wood.

In fact, of all the wood-saws Wood ever saw saw wood, Wood never saw a wood-saw that would saw wood as the wood-saw Wood saw saw wood would saw wood, and I never saw a wood-saw that would saw as the wood-saw Wood saw until I saw Esau Wood saw wood with the wood-saw Wood saw saw wood.

Now, Wood saws wood with the wood-saw Wood saw saw wood.

Oh, the wood that would saw Wood saw saw would saw.

Oh, the wood Wood's wood-shed would shed when Wood would saw wood with the wood-saw Wood saw saw wood!

Finally, no man may ever know how much wood the wood-saw Wood saw would saw, if the wood-saw Wood saw would saw all the wood the wood-saw Wood saw would saw.—Tid-Bits.

How Marbles Are Made.

All boys like marbles; but who knows how they are made or where they come from? "Marbles," says the Chicago Herald, "are made in great quantities in Saxony, for export to India, China and the United States. A hard, calcareous stone is used. This is broken into square blocks; and about 150 of these blocks are thrown into a mill, in which is a flat slab of stone with numerous concentric furrows on its face. A block of oak of the same diameter as the stone, a part of which rests on the small stones, is made to revolve on the slab, while water flows upon it. The whole process requires but a quarter of an hour, and one mill can turn out twenty thousand marbles a week. The mills at Oberstein, on the Nahe, in Germany, manufacture marbles and agates especially for the American market."

So marbles are made going through the mill and getting the rough corners rubbed off, the edges smoothed down, and the mass ground into globular form. And boys are made into men in much the same way, by being run through life's school, which is their "mill," until their rough corners and edges disappear and they become rounded and smoothed and fit for use in the world.

Poverty, adversity, hard times, and hard fare—all have their uses in this world to round men and smooth them and polish them and fit them for usefulness here and for glory hereafter.—Exchange.

A man came into a room where a religious service was about to be held. Picking up a Bible, as he opened it, his eye fell on the text, "The fool hath said in his heart, there is no God."

"Ah," said he, "I am a greater fool than that fool, for I believe there is a God and I'm not serving Him."

War Gardens.

Sing a song of gardens,
Little seeds in line,
Here a shoot that's lifted,
There a trailing vine;
Green upon the brown earth,
Beanpoles in a row,
Sun and wind and shower—
That's how gardens grow!

Sing a song of gardens,
Work and care they take;
Spade and hoe and shovel,
Watering-pot and rake;
Drought must never mar them,
Worm nor ugly weed,
Patience, patience, patience—
That's what gardeners need!

Sing a song of gardens,
O, the barren lands,
O, the children waiting
Harvest from our hands;
O, the hungry people
We are working for—
Gardens, gardens, gardens,
Help to win the war!

The Land of the Princess Winter.

Maud Marshall Mason (aged 11 years).
Warrenton, Va.

Poor little Lucy was sitting in a big arm-chair with all her beautiful toys around her. She was an heiress and had everything that her parents could give her. But there was one thing that Lucy wanted and did not have—a companion. Her parents wished her to be brought up in a certain way, so though she had many beautiful toys, she was often very lonely. If she had believed in fairies she would not have been so lonely, but she did not, though it was not her fault. But after this particular day they were her best friends.

As she was sitting alone with nothing to do, she suddenly heard a sound behind her, and turning, saw a fairy with blue eyes and golden hair.

"I know you are lonely, Lucy," the fairy said, and that you wish for a companion. Our Princess has sent me to tell you that if you believe in us you can come and see us any time you want to!"

Lucy was delighted at this and said, of course she believed in them and was wild to go. The fairy told her that she must be very good if she wished to have them as playmates.

The fairy made Lucy very small and gave her a pair of wings. Then they flew away. Far away in the distance Lucy could see a land that glittered like silver and gold. This, the fairy said, was the land of the Princess Winter, their fairy Princess. They were flying along in the country now and the scene was beautiful. The grass and weeds were of silver and gold, with here a ruby-colored bush or a turquoise-colored shrub. The trees were of silver and gold, and the houses of many colors. "How beautiful," thought the little girl, "to be able to come to such a place whenever you wish!" She noticed that, though there was snow here and there on the hill, they were not cold, and asked the fairy the reason for this. The answer was that nobody ever felt the cold there. This was a relief to Lucy, who hated cold weather.

Soon they saw the walls of the city where the fairy Queen and the fairy Princess lived. Lucy was very excited at the thought of seeing a fairy Queen. When they reached the city it proved so beautiful that it dazzled Lucy's eyes. After a while, when she grew used to it, she saw that all of the people were beautiful, kind fairies, and all of the shops colored blue, red, green, yellow and silver.

When they were in sight of the place Lucy remembered that she did not know the name of the fairy with her, so she asked.

"You notice," said the fairy, "that I am dressed all in pink, don't you? Well, I am called the Pink Sweet Pea. I will take you to your bed-room now before you see the Queen. You are to stay with us a week. No, your mother and father will not miss you."

Lucy's room was much more magnificent than any room she had ever seen in her parents' house. A fairy came in to attend her. She was used to having servants wait on her, but not fairies, and was much pleased. She was dressed in a beautiful blue dress and given the name Forget-Me-Not.

At about eight o'clock word came that the Princess wished to see her. She went very timidly into the throne-room, but when she saw the Princess she forgot all her bashfulness in admiration of her. She had blue eyes, golden hair and rosy cheeks, and she wore a white dress trimmed with many colors. Her jewels were beautiful. When she saw Lucy gazing at her she said, "Come here, my child, and sit beside me." Of course, this was a great honor. By the time supper was ready they were great friends.

A wonderful week followed. Lucy went to fairy parties; she coasted for miles on fairy sleds; she went on sleigh-rides in fancy sleighs drawn by graceful reindeer. On the last night came the crowning ball. As she rolled away in the coach she thought she had never been so happy. The grand ball-room was decorated with icicles of all colors, and holly, with here and there a cedar tree. The fairies looked far more beautiful than they had ever looked before. When all were there the dancing began. As Lucy was only a child, of course she danced only with children. There was a little Prince there who was very attentive to her and they had a delightful time. His name was Prince Spring. About twelve o'clock refreshments were served. They were delicious, of course, being fairy.

Next day, when she left, Lucy asked if she might not come back soon, and the Princess said, Yes, if she cared to come. Lucy said of course she did, and wondered why the Princess had said that. But when she got home she understood. Her parents had changed their mind and found a nice little companion for her, named Nelly. They were so happy together that she did not ask to go to fairy land again. But she and Nelly have always been great friends with the fairies.

Christ Our Example: How easily and contentedly we speak of Jesus Christ as our example. Do we realize what it means? If we did, it would revolutionize our life. Do we begin to know our Bible as He did? Do we begin to pray as He did? How thoughtful He was for others, how patient toward dullness, how quiet under insult! Think of what it meant for Him to take a basin and towel, like a slave, and wash the disciples' feet! Do we stoop to serve? Can any one say of us that we "go about doing good"? Think of His words, servants of His, "I have given you an example, that ye should do as I have done to you." "Christ-like" is a word often on our lips. Do not speak it too lightly. It is the heart of God's predestination. It is our high calling.—M. D. Babcock.

CHARLOTTE MEADE RUFFIN.

MRS. CHARLOTTE MEADE RUFFIN, widow of Julian C. Ruffin, died at her home, Marlborough, in Hanover County, at 3 A. M. March 25, 1918. On the following day, funeral services were conducted at Immanuel Church, Hanover County, by Rev. James W. Morris, D. D., of Richmond, the pall-bearers being her old Sunday-school scholars, selected by her. In the afternoon, final services were conducted by Rev. C. Braxton Bryan, D. D., of Petersburg, at the grave, in Blandford Cemetery, where she was laid to rest by the side of her husband, who gave his life in 1864 for the cause he loved so well.

Mrs. Ruffin is survived by five children, Julian M. Ruffin, Miss Jane Ruffin and Mrs. Roland F. Broadus, of Hanover County; Edmund S. Ruffin, of Norfolk, and Mrs. Harrison H. Christian, of Henrico County, Va.

Mrs. Ruffin was born at Causons in Prince George County on May 23, 1833, being the second daughter of John E. Meade and Rebecca Beverley, his wife, and on her father's side she was a lineal descendant of Sir Richard Everard, a colonial governor of North Carolina; of General Everard Meade, of the Revolutionary War; of Sir Richard Randolph, of Curles, and of Pocahontas, and on her mother's side, she was a descendant of Robert Beverley, the historian; of Robert (King) Carter, of Corotoman, and of Colonel William Byrd, of Westover.

When the war was ended, she was a refugee in Amelia County, practically all money and personal property, and many of her loved ones had been swept away, nothing remained but the land. But with a rare courage she packed up the little household furniture left, and started off for Hanover County with her five young children. On reaching Richmond it was found impossible to hire a conveyance, but she succeeded in getting the Federal authorities to convey her and her family and belongings to Marlborough, some sixteen miles distant, in army wagons. She often spoke of the "kindness of the Yankees" in assisting her, and doubtless her natural bitterness toward them was much softened by this act of kindness.

For the past fifty years Mrs. Ruffin has been a prominent figure in church work and the social life of Lower Hanover County. With no means except what could be obtained from the soil, she has succeeded in keeping up Marlborough in a fair degree of elegance, and many friends and relations and all the visiting Bishops and Clergy have enjoyed its hospitality. Her ancestors have given Bishop Meade and many other clergymen to the Church. She, herself, was a most devoted Episcopalian, interested in and a contributor to all branches of church work, and during the past twenty-five years, she probably gave more of her time, thoughts and love to Immanuel Church than to any other object. After a long life well spent, she has now passed to her last reward.

MRS. CHARLOTTE MEADE RUFFIN

Died recently at Marlborough, the home whence her beautiful, faithful ministrations issued with healing strength to rebuild her church when war had stricken its material interests; where love's home-life showed its Christian character; and the lonely friend was ever remembered.

RESOLUTIONS.

At a meeting of the vestry of Grace Church, Kirkwood, Mo., held on the 10th of April, 1918, the following action was unanimously taken:

Since it has pleased our heavenly Father to call unto Himself our dear brother, fellow-vestryman, and Senior Warden, HENRY W. HOUGH, in the ninetieth year of his age, we make it no less a pleasure than a solemn duty to place on record our appreciation of his personal worth and his most honorable and valuable service. It was because he loved the church sincerely and so well that he was called to serve as vestryman, lay reader, junior warden and senior warden for a continuous period of fifty-nine years—from the organization of the church and parish, Easter Day, 1859—to the end of his life and it was because church duties were to him no less a delight than obligations of conscience that through this long period he never failed to attend the vestry meetings, except on account of illness or absence from the city, and to take active part and give wise and thoughtful counsel in the deliberations.

He was one of the small number of devoted church people who founded and organized the Kirkwood Church in the regular Sunday meeting begun in the dwelling house of Harry I. Bodley in 1857—so that his personal connection with it embraced a period of sixty-one years. He watched its beginnings with affectionate concern and contributed a full share in the giving to it the good name it enjoys, both in the Diocese and at large. For many years he was a delegate to the Diocesan Convention and on various occasions a delegate to the General Convention.

Resolved, That a copy of this minute be sent to the widow and family of our deceased brother, and a copy also to the "Southern Churchman."

RESOLUTIONS.

At a special meeting of the faculty of Stuart Hall, held on April 10, 1918, the following resolutions were adopted, and approved later by the student body:

Whereas, on the sixth day of April in the year of our Lord 1918, the RT. REV. ALFRED MAGILL RANDOLPH, D. D., LL. D., D. C. L., entered into the life eternal and

Whereas, Bishop Randolph has been the President of the Board of Trustees of Stuart Hall since 1892; be it

Resolved, That the faculty and students of Stuart Hall desire to express their deep sense of the loss sustained by this school and by the Church at large in the death of Bishop Alfred Magill Randolph. The school also desires to put on record its appreciation of the great work accomplished by Bishop Randolph in Virginia, and in particular, of his unfailing interest and activity in behalf of this institution, with which he was so closely connected for twenty-six years.

The members of the school extend herewith their sincere sympathy to Mrs. Randolph and the other members of the family.

Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be sent to Mrs. Randolph and family; and that a copy be sent for publication to the Southern Churchman.

CHURCH KNOWLEDGE AND NUR- TURE.

We hear of him for the first time in the twelfth chapter of the Acts of the Apostles in connection with his mother's home in Jerusalem. Soon after we find him accompanying Paul and Barnabas on their return from Jerusalem to Antioch. He again comes before us on the earliest missionary journey of these same apostles, when he joined them as their "minister," their lay-helper, to provide for their personal wants when traveling, and to aid in the temporal side of their work. For some reason, which Scripture does not record, he drew back at Perga in Pamphylia from the work to which they were sent and returned to Jerusalem. However, he redeemed his reputation later and was restored to the favor of Barnabas first and then of Paul.

We find him at St. Paul's side during his first imprisonment at Rome, and he is acknowledged by him as one of his few fellow-laborers who had been a comfort to him during the weary hours of imprisonment. We again hear of him in the Epistle of St. Peter, where he says: "The Church that is in Babylon, saluteth you, and so doth Marcus, my son."

From Babylon he would seem to have returned to Asia Minor, for during St. Paul's second imprisonment, in writing to St. Timothy, he charges him to bring Mark with him to Rome, on the ground that he was "profitable unto him for the ministry."

After the death of St. Peter and St. Paul, tradition affirms that St. Mark visited Egypt, founded the Church of Alexandria, and died by martyrdom. Tradition uniformly assigns him as the author of the Gospel of St. Mark. The early fathers tell us that he was the interpreter of St. Peter, and after the death of the apostle he compiled this Gospel from the recollection of St. Peter's teachings. There is little evidence of literary skill, but the descriptions are graphic, full of fresh life-like touches. We feel the majesty of Christ, His energy and power, His deep human sympathy. It is the Gospel of Him who "was declared to be the Son of God with power."

"The Soul of the Soldier."

There are all kinds of men in the training camps, as there are everywhere else. There are men with the morals of a mud turtle and the vision of a bat, but there are also multitudes who are spreading the contagion of a splendid manhood through the barracks. Some will come back to civil life unimproved, but they are the ones who would go to the devil on a desert island. But many, many thousands will testify in years to come that the first glimpse they ever had of the possible beauty and grandeur of life came from association with their comrades in camp. For example, in Camp Devens there are numbers of men who came from the textile cities of New England, where socially, economically and morally they were predestined; they have never had a chance to know anything or be anything. But in Camp Devens, not counting the commissioned officers or the personnel of the Depot Brigade, there are 695 college men representing twenty-seven New England colleges and universities. They are the best of our race, the flowering of the purest and sanest homes, men who could found another New England, as their forefathers did three hundred years ago. They were drafted into service, and their influence upon the thousands of other men is already having a marked effect.

Few people, even among our political and moral economists, realize the influence of taking a million and a half men out of our competitive system and placing them under the law of co-operation. When the men understand that their messmates are not trying to steal their jobs or get their money, they haven't the slightest objection to doing kindly and generous things for one another. The complexion of their world has changed, and they change with it. When they see that the best men in camp are not ashamed to be decent, they want to be decent too; when they find that some are not afraid to pray, they are willing to pray also. Two men went to the Y. M. C. A. director in Camp Devens and said that they were in the habit of kneeling down and saying their prayers every night at home. What ought they to do here? "Try it out," was the advice. They did; the second night two others in the barracks joined them; the third night a few more; gradually the number increased until considerably more than half of the men resumed the habit of childhood and knelt by their cots in prayer before turning in. A company captain in one of the cantonments the first evening his men stood at attention for retreat said, "Men, this is a serious business we are engaged in; it is fitting that we should pray about it." There and then this Plattsburg reserve officer made a simple and earnest prayer for the divine blessing upon their lives and their work. The impression upon the men was described to me as tremendous. Such incidents, although not common, indicate the general spirit of the new armies; the better men and the men of ampler early opportunities are already exercising a refining and favored fellows. Old misunderstandings and prejudices are passing away; an uplifting influence upon their less-social distinctions are giving way to a new solidarity; individual goodness, repressed for lack of an encouraging environment, is coming frankly to view. The effect upon the favorites of fortune is no less marked than upon the men who came from mean streets and stifling tenements. A young millionaire whose most serious business in life had been buying automobiles and raising fancy stock on a country estate was doing manful work as a corporal in a supply company. "This is the real thing, after all," he said to me. A Princeton graduate of 1916, now a Reserve officer, said that his company in six weeks had gathered more spirit for team work than his college class had generated up to the middle of the junior year. "How did they do it?" I asked. "They all started on the same level and aimed for the same end. There has been nothing to pull them apart in cliques; rather, everything binds them together. They have picked up speed and snap; nothing can stop them now. And I haven't seen any of the little meannesses so common in a college."

So there are a hundred reciprocal influences playing on the men all the time; some are being remade, others modified; many who had never known the impelling force of a great motive or the alluring spell of a high ideal have found both in the purpose and spirit of the new army. When I began my investigation of the camps my proclaimed aim was to discover, not what kind of soldiers Uncle Sam would send to France, but what kind of men Uncle Sam would send back to their homes and their communities after the war is over. I have discovered both: for in making better men we are making finer soldiers, and in making efficient soldiers we are producing a higher type of men—healthier physically, broader mentally and nobler spiritually. If Germany should crumble before these men can get into action, if we have lavished billions of dollars to train men for battles they will never fight, yet the money has been well spent, and I consider it the best investment in citizenship the country could have made. —Dr. J. H. Odell, in the Outlook.

A boy of thirteen was often brought to Judge Lindsey's Juvenile Court in Denver, charged with truancy. Notwithstanding the judge admonished him many times, it did not seem to do him any good. The teacher kept writing, "Tim will stay out of school to work."

Once when reproving him, the judge told him that there would be time enough to work when he was a man. "My father was a man," replied the boy, "and he did not work. He went off and left mother and me. I guess that's what killed her."

Finally Tim appeared in court one day with a happy face, and pulling a soiled and crumpled paper from his pocket, handed it to the judge. "I'm going to remember all the things you told me and I'm going to school regular, now I got that done," he said, with some pride. Judge Lindsey examined the paper, which proved to be a receipted bill, and found that, little by little, Tim had paid fifty dollars for a headstone at his mother's grave.

"My boy, is that what you've been doing all these months?"

"I wanted her to have a monument, judge." Tim furtively wiped away the moisture in his eyes. "She done a lot for me; that's all I could do for her now."—Ex.

Thoughts For the Thoughtful

"Controversy in religious matters pays no spiritual dividends."

"God will not give us any more truth than we are willing to live."

Everything we do will be great when it is what God wants done.

The devil wins many a battle by getting God's troops to fire into each other. —Ex.

"When you ask God for your bread today thank Him for what He gave you yesterday."

That was a fine epitaph on an earnest Christian's gravestone, "Because I live, ye shall live also."

There are many people who claim to be Christians, who do not work at it much through the week.

Every development of juster ideas, of higher powers, of better feelings in mankind, are only new helps to interpret Him; and the lifting up of life to the level of His ideas and character is the programme of the human race. —Stalker.

And into his ear was breathed A whisper of fair renown; And the nameless victor was glory-wreathed,

For the Voice that said, "Let thy sword be sheathed,"

Said also, "And take thy crown."

—P. C. Ainsworth.

Put out of your thought the past, whatever it may be; let go even the future with its golden dream and its high ideal; and concentrate your soul in this burning, present moment. For the man who is true to the present is true to his best; and the soul that wins the ground immediately before it makes life a triumph. —Azrora Stearns Davis.

Expect that prayer will become ever more engrossing as the Divine impulse is yielded to; so that what now occupies but a comparatively small portion of time and energy will become with us as with the great Apostle, an exercise which we prosecute with unceasing ardor, an ever-delightful method of promoting the Redeemer's kingdom. —Rev. F. B. Meyer.

Christianity has an uplifting and carrying power to aid suffering humanity. Compare the wailing words of Ovid in his Tristia, or Cicero's lamentations during his exile, with the heroic tones of a worn, weary and jailed Jew, feeble in frame, fame and friends, and a victim of perjury, who made no wail or lamentation, but sings, "Rejoice, and again I say rejoice!" —Rev. Harold Huntington, in Cui Bono.

The reticence of the Bible is sublime, as sublime as that of the starry sky. Enoch speaks not in his translation moment. Elijah speaks not in his chariot of fire. Lazarus speaks not in his hour of resurrection. The child of Jarius speaks not on her bed of revival. The youth of Nain speaks not from his arrested bier. Moses alone does speak from beyond the grave; but it is not of the things beyond; it is of the things "to be accomplished at Jerusalem." —G. Matheson.

There is a day in spring When under all the earth the secret germs

Begin to stir and glow before they bud. The wealth and festal pomp of midsummer

Lie in the heart of that inglorious hour Which no man names with blessing, though its work

Is blessed by all the world. Such days there are

In the slow story of the growth of souls.

—Smedley.

O God the Son, Redeemer of the world, truly Thy name is above every name! In spite of error, misunderstanding, hatred, scorn and blasphemy, in the deadliest hour, when the skies blacken and the earth reels and it seems that men have once more crucified in this dread eclipse the Son of God afresh, still Thy majesty and Thy power are felt, and through the midnight comes the prayer of a penitent, "Lord, remember me," or perhaps the confession of an executioner, "Truly this was the Son of God"; still when they dream that Thou art forever silenced, buried, guarded and sealed down, the stone is rolled away from the door of the sepulchre; and the keepers grow weak as dead men; and angelic forms are there; and still through the gray mists of the morning Thou comest, changed to something august, half-unknown, immortal; but the tones of Thy love are heard again and at Thy voice we know Whom we have believed, and our faith in Thee becomes the victory which overcomes the world. —Chadwick.

The best return we can make for a gift of God is to take a higher gift. Have you thanked Him for your daily bread? Then the best return you can make is to take the bread of life. Have you thanked Him for your sleep? Then the best return you can make is to take His gift of rest and peace. Have you thanked Him for your health? Then the best return you can make is to seek His gift of holiness. "I will take the cup of salvation." I will take the finest thing upon the Lord's table! —J. H. Jowett.

The Master's Touch.

Edith G. Cherry.

"He touched her hand, and the fever left her."

He touched her hand, as He only can,

With the wondrous touch of the Great Physician,

With the tender touch of the Son of Man.

And the fever-pain in the throbbing temples

Died out with the flush on brow and cheek,

And the lips that had been so parched and burning

Trembled with thanks that she could not speak.

And the eyes where the fever-light had faded

Looked up, by her grateful tears made dim,

And she rose and ministered in her household,

She rose and ministered unto Him.

"He touched her hand and the fever left her."

Oh, we need His touch on our fevered hands!

The cool, still touch of the Man of Sorrows,

Who knows us, and loves us, and understands.

So many a life is one long fever!

A fever of anxious suspense and care, A fever of getting, a fever of fretting,

A fever of hurrying here and there. Oh, what if in winning the praise of others

We miss at last the King's "Well done"?

If our self-sought tasks in the Master's vineyard

Yield "nothing but leaves" at the set of sun?

"He touched her hand and the fever left her."

Oh, blessed touch of the Man Divine! So beautiful then to arise and serve Him,

When the fever is gone from your life and mine:

It may be the fever of restless serving, With heart all thirsty for love and praise,

And eyes all aching and strained with yearning

Toward self-set goals in the future days.

Or it may be the fever of spirit anguish,

Some tempest of sorrow that dies not down,

Till the cross at last is in meekness lifted.

And the head stoops low for the thorny crown.

Or it may be a fever of pain and anger, When the wounded spirit is hard to bear,

And only the Lord can draw forth the arrows

Left carelessly, cruelly ranking there.

Whatever the fever, His touch can heal it;

Whatever the tempest, His voice can still;

There is only joy as we seek His pleasure;

There is only rest as we choose His will.

And some day, after life's fitful fever,

I think we shall say, in the home on high,

"If the hands that He touched but did His bidding,

How little it matters what else went by!"

Oh, Lord! Thou knowest us altogether, Each heart's sore sickness, whatever it be;

Touch Thou our hands! Let the fever leave us,

And so shall we minister unto Thee.

The very same Spirit whose fiery flame sat upon the twelve apostles, and whose indwelling filled their hearts, is still our only strength, our only holiness, and our only hope.—Selected.

Right Beliefs.

The right beliefs of some may not issue in right living, but at the same time if there were no right beliefs there would be no right living.

There is, therefore, no more idiotic contrast current than that between the doctrinal and the practical—as though that which is doctrinal is not practical and that which is practical is not doctrinal. As a matter of fact, teaching must be doctrinal if it is to be practical, and it cannot be practical without at the same time being doctrinal. It is only on the assumption that certain things are true that I am under obligation to live a Christian life, to work in the way it points out. You tell me that I ought to live a Christian life. I ask you, why ought I to live a Christian life? And before you can justify your exhortation you must convince me of the truth of the great Christian verities. Convince me, however, that these great Christian verities are grounded in reality, and you at once make clear to me that any other sort of life is both wicked and foolish. On the other hand, create in me the impression that the great Christian verities are but little more than cunningly devised fables and at the same time you create in me the impression that there is no sufficient reason why I should adopt as my own the Christian ideal of character and conduct.

Here we find the ultimate explanation of that repudiation of the Christian moral standards that is so prevalent today. Nothing is more certain than that this revolt against the Christian ideal of character and conduct is due to a previous repudiation of the great Christian verities. No doubt there are those who reject the Christian creed, but who still cling to the Christian moral standards. These, however, are making an impossible attempt to grow fruit on a tree after its roots have been cut. The logic of the situation is clearly against such, and whether or no they intend it, the enemies of the Christian creed are also the enemies of the Christian standard of morals.

Let us not imagine, then, that right beliefs are not important. Their importance cannot be too strongly emphasized. But let us keep clearly before us the fact that right beliefs are important only as they lead to something beyond, only as they are translated into conduct. The end of all God's dealing with us is not to lead us to a knowledge of "the things to be believed." This is but a means to an end. God's purpose for us will not be realized unless out of these sinful lives of ours there is produced a type of manhood and womanhood that finds its archetype in Jesus Christ.—Presbyterian.

For the Men at the Front.

Almighty Father! Now we raise.
With grateful hearts our songs of praise,

For Thou didst our dear soldiers keep.
From perils on the ocean deep,
Oh! hear us, when on bended knee
We offer heartfelt thanks to Thee.

O Loving Father! Thou dost know
The places wheresoe'er they go,
Amid the battles roar—oh! then—
Protect, O Lord, our boys and men.
O! hear our prayer, make war to cease
And send on earth a lasting peace.

O Holy Spirit! Lord above,
Fill doubting hearts with faith and love,
With sure belief Thou wilt preserve,
Wilt help and comfort all who serve.
Let earth and air unite and sing
All praise to Thee, our Glorious King.

Almighty Father! we adore,
And praise Thy name for evermore,
A nation bowed to Thy commands
We leave our all in Thy dear hands.
Glad songs arise again to Thee
From earth, and air, and sky, and sea.

God's Music in the Soul.

We may all possess within our souls a secret, mysterious music that is unlike the murmur of the surf on the distant shore or the sighing of the summer wind through the treetops. It is not comparable to the lofty peal of the organ, the clamor of brass instruments of the subdued strains of lute and violin. This perfect melody falls best on the inward sense when outward sounds are driven forth and stilled. It is the voice of God. Those who desire to preserve their hearts in peace must have daily contact with God. This is quite possible. The greater the domestic or business pressure, the more discordant the clash of interests, the stronger becomes the need that we listen to the Divine harmony within our own souls.

Those who approach God day by day, temporarily emptying their hearts of other thoughts, may catch these sweet vibrations of the heavenly harmonies.
It may be on the rushing railway train, in the crowded office, or for a moment in the midst of social joys. It may be in the stillness of the night, when our minds are afresh attuned to the heart-tendering influence of the Spirit of God.
Only the Divine Mind can fully play upon the finer heart-strings of our natures. God will do this for us if we will. When the many voices of the world distract us, we may do well to listen for the quiet notes of God's music within our souls. When despair clutches us, we find refuge in its calming influence. When temptations assail us, we receive high courage from its loftier strains. Above the storms of life its swelling power renews our faith and action. In weariness, it soothes us.

Its minor keys pour forth restfulness and confidence to the inward ear. How gracious is this music of our Lord!

Many are the chords within the souls of men that are touched by the Spirit of God. Efforts on behalf of world peace may illustrate the difference between the call of the intellect and that of Jehovah. Many are the strings stirred by men and women in their efforts to abolish war. Some of these send forth notes on behalf of material interests alone—security, thrift, quietude and ease. One glorious chord is all too little heard in the clash of tongues. Even those who love Christ too little heed it. It calls for self-sacrifice and love. The string that vibrates to the touch of the finger of God is what our blood-sodden earth needs today. This chord speaks of sin —softly, insistently. Men of this generation may close their ears to it, but it will never cease to play. Long years hence, when the voice of the economist, the philanthropist, the debater, have ceased, men will perform listen to the Divine harmony of the sacred string that is thrilled by the breath of God.

Only obedience to it will make possible the triumphant strain, "Glory to God in the highest, on earth peace, good-will to men." The Divine symphony within us is but a foretaste of celestial joy. Submission to its authority is but the prelude to the glories of the choir invisible. "Blessed are they who know the joyful sound." "They walk, O Jehovah, in the light of Thy countenance."—W. C. A., in Christian Work.

A Thought for the Times.

"Darkly, as in a glass, our sight
Still gropes through Time and Space;
We cannot see the Light of Light
With angels, face to face;
Only the tale His martyrs tell,
Around the dark earth rings—
He died and He went down to hell
And lives—the King of Kings!"

PREPAREDNESS FOR THE CHURCH

Never in the history of the country has the Church's responsibility in upholding the ideals of the nation been so great. In rendering its share of the essential work, its buildings should provide for maximum efficiency in every department. THE WAR AND THE MINISTRY.

An article by the Rev. Paul Micou, sent out by the General Board of Religious Education and published in the Southern Churchman of March 23, has attracted considerable attention. He shows therein that in all probability, if the war shall continue for two years more and no special effort be made to supply the deficiency, the Church will have only about sixty-four men studying for the ministry at her theological institutions. The estimate is based upon the evident fact that by far the greater part of those who would normally have become candidates for Holy Orders since June last are of draft age, and that this will continue to be the case so long as the war lasts. Indeed, as now seems not improbable, if the draft age has to be extended in order to meet the larger demands upon our country for troops to win the war, the few who enter upon their theological studies after the age of thirty will also be practically eliminated and only those who are physically disqualified for war or industrial service will be left to replenish the ranks of the clergy.

It is part of the price that we must pay for the end for which the war is being fought. The Church would hold no son of hers back from the service of humanity in this great crisis, and emphatically she wants no slackers in her ministry. Perhaps, too, it is a part of that discipline and testing which doubtless the Church must needs undergo to prepare her for a critical time of larger sacrifice and endeavor which will follow the war. Speaking for our own Church, if such a dearth of clergymen as will almost certainly be felt for a few years shall purge her from some of the evil effects of sacerdotalism, and will enable her to realize upon the so greatly dormant power of her lay priesthood, it will not be without its compensations. Moreover it ought to be followed, within a few years after the close of the war, by a great increase in the number of candidates from among that most virile class of men who have been both tried and trained in the school of the soldier.

Bishop Knight of Sewanee is quoted as expressing the belief that so soon as the war ends our seminaries will be crowded with men seeking the ministry; giving as his reasons the religious fervor with which the war is being prosecuted, well fitted to turn men's attention to officership in a yet more sacred crusade, as well as the fact which has often been noted that such large additions to the ranks of the ministry have usually followed prolonged periods of war. Many years ago the present Bishop of Virginia called attention to this fact which was so signally illustrated, in the South at least, after the War Between the States. For many years thereafter in every young Episcopal clergyman of the South one expected to find a Confederate veteran, and such is the case to-day among our native-born clergy who still remain at the age of seventy or upwards. And what a stalwart, noble body they were,—gentlemen unafraid who had faced both life and death in their grimest realities and from whom the naked character of men had few secrets. Their lives once consecrated to a sacred cause they refused when that issue was past to take them again as their own possession, but sought another and, in those days, hardly less arduous field upon which to expend them. One would like to write the little one knows of the brave lives of some of these for an example to those who will come after.

That they will be many no one can doubt. No previous war has engaged so many men in the service of religion and the soldier's welfare as this, and numbers of these will come out of it unwilling to relinquish the privilege of ministering to their fellows in spiritual things. And many a young soldier will come back to begin life again with an ambition for yet higher service for man and God for which the holy ministry will open the way.

This confidence, however, does not make less pertinent Mr. Micou's suggestions that the present and future need of well qualified men for the ministry be stressed at this time, both among boys and college men, among men in the army, and among older men who might find in the diaconate first and then in the priesthood the opportunity for that greater measure of service which the times demand and every true-hearted man is ready to give. Of the latter class there ought to be found many who would require but little special preparation to fit them for large usefulness in this vocation. There are few positions in which one can serve even his country at war to greater advantage, particularly in isolated or rural communities where the people lack inspiration and leadership, than as minister to one or perhaps two or three small congregations. Experience has proven that oftentimes such men of maturity, taken immediately from among the body of the people, making up in experience and practical common-sense what they may lack technical preparation, have done exceptionally valuable work. This seems to have been the primitive method of supplying both deacons and elders in every church; and we may well doubt whether the medieval and modern method of practically confining the Church's choice to more or less immature youths with a highly specialized course of preparation has any great advantage over it.

But in any case conditions will demand that a larger use be made of the service of lay readers. The services of the Church may still be had and the greater part of her activities in any congregation may go on almost unimpaired with one or two faithful laymen undertaking such duties as they are competent to perform, with an occasional visit from a neighboring priest. Here again war conditions will make a very definite and practical call upon men fitted for this excellent voluntary service. It ought not to go unheeded, for it is a work to be highly esteemed both for one's Church and country.

Non Possumus. Such seems to have been, in effect, the whole answer that the House of Bishops found to give to the overtures submitted to them, particularly that from Dr. Newman Smyth and others of nine Protestant Churches, looking towards some actual step in the direction of Church Unity. "We cannot do anything. The objections are too many. The difficulties are too great. The theories and traditions that would be impinged upon are too delicate to be thus rudely disturbed." We do not know how their response was formulated; doubtless in well-rounded periods and with the most courteous expressions of kindness and underlying sympathy; but from what we can gather this is what it all came to—a confession of inability to take any positive action or, as far as appears, to suggest any practical alternative, when confronted with a concrete proposition in regard to this great question.

We do not for a moment suppose that the course of non-action adopted represented the mind or desire of a majority of the Bishops. Certainly very many among them must have entertained more than merely negative convictions on a subject of such import, and would have wished that some constructive affirmation might have been made. It was simply the resultant of various counteracting forces of sentiment and opinion and was accepted because they could agree upon no other. But it sadly shows the powerlessness of this great body to take that position of leadership in American Christianity which is properly theirs by right of heredity and which would gladly be accorded them, if they were able to accept and use it, by the best elements in the divided Churches around us. Some time this Church must discover some positive and constructive meaning in its real desire for the unity of God's people, some course of action adapted to the actual conditions confronting her rather than the nebulous theories of ecclesiasticism which are hypnotising her, if she is going to keep pace with the march of events and fulfil her mission in the world of tomorrow.

Since the above was written we have seen the report of the Committee of the House of Bishops, adopted by the House, which is published in another column. It seems to us to lack even something of the courtesy and kindness which, by anticipation, we had credited it with. To say to these memorialists that a compliance with their suggestion would be to "deny that any truth . . . is of real importance and necessity" strikes us as being as discourteous as it is far-fetched, irrelevant and indefensible.

The Worship of God.

This generation, noble as it is, is so taken up with many things that it cannot look up to something higher than its own doings. It is clothed magnificently, it is strong, intelligent, good; but it is not given to the worship of God. That is a universal need of human nature. The man who does not worship is dissatisfied with himself. Man is a worshipping and praying being. We have no more right to slight this than any other important matter. If we do we shall suffer the inevitable consequences—dissatisfaction with ourselves—a certain feeling of incompleteness of life—a craving for something which we do not have.—Rev. R. H. Kline.

No "Letter to the Editor" will appear in our columns except over the signature of the writer.

ON READING THE SERVICE.

Mr. Editor: I was speaking recently to one of our most thoughtful, practical and zealous Bishops, on the subject of the careless, unimpressive and altogether unworthy manner of the reading of the service and the lessons by many of our Clergy, to which I have frequently called his attention, asking his great influence in the many Dioceses in which he is called to officiate (as well as his own, of course) to effect a radical change in this regard.

His reply moved me greatly, for he admitted all that I had said and added that he had repeatedly spoken to his Clergy about it, but with so little effect that he despaired of ever impressing upon them their shortcomings in this respect.

I wonder whether one more letter from a long-suffering layman will have any influence, where the Bishop has failed. In no spirit of criticism, but as one who loves the Church, I do beg that something be done, by our Bishops and in our seminaries, to bring home to the Clergy the need of more reverent, thoughtful and intelligent reading of the services—and at the same time the need of some study of voice production. A few lessons from any teacher of the voice would remedy some of the defects so common with the Clergy, and any clergyman who will take the trouble to read Bishop Fiske's little book, "Sacrifice and Service" (published by Longman, at seventy-five cents), will find in one of the chapters many sane suggestions about the rendering of the service. I understand that Bishop Lawrence and several other Bishops are giving the book to all their young Clergy.

I am writing now out of a painful experience, in many churches, and during a long membership as a quiet layman—not as a critic, but as one who has honestly sought spiritual upbuilding in my church life. Thank God, it is my personal knowledge that God has, through His Church, brought many souls to a realization of what He teaches, but, oh! that His message were more worthily delivered so that the number of worshippers might be greatly increased.

From the opening sentences, which are filled with food for reflection and consideration, to shape one's thoughts with preparation for what follows in the Exhortation and the Confession, through the prayers to the lessons, that in these latter days ought to be the vehicle for impressive influence, not frequently otherwise sought by the hearers—there is surely greater opportunity to arouse and awaken men to what the Church, as God's representative, so fully seeks to teach.

Instead of this, we usually have the service almost murdered. No effort is made by voice or reading to create an atmosphere of reverence. The prayers are read crudely and hastily. The lessons are read unimpressively, with no effort to show their meaning or remind the hearers that a message from the Lord is being delivered.

Once in a while one hears a clergyman like Bishop Courtney, or Dr. Houghton, of the Transfiguration, New York, or Bishop Fiske, of Central New York, read the lessons, and then he understands how the mass of Clergy are cheating him of a real spiritual gift of grace, the appealing tones, earnestness and emphasis of Bishop Fiske, recalling, in the Litany especially, those of the most noted Bishops and priests of the Church in the past.

Out of a full heart, therefore, I ask: Cannot something be done to arouse the Clergy to the need of reform and improvement?

First, because it is a matter of general experience, among men especially, that there is a careless and unimpressive reading, as though a mere form rather than deep and real worship (in this, even a casual reader of this observation will recall the honorable exceptions among the officiating Clergy).

Second, because even if the object of our coming together is made secondary to the sermon that is to follow (thus hoping doubtless to attain the desired result—winning souls to Christ), this can be accomplished by the elimination of what is most regretted—the unimpressive, the perfunctory, the too often merely mechanical conducting of divine service. Surely the great opportunity that the Clergy honestly and zealously seek, is to make God's Word and His service a real influence, so surely they wish, as the crowning feature of their ministerial life, to bring devotion to birth among their people. Is it too hard to have a layman say that if that is their purpose their action belies it? It seems to me, were I a clergyman, that I would:

(1) Read and study the lessons always, before presuming to read them in public worship.

(2) Study the prayers, that I might understand every phrase.

(3) Practice reading carefully, with a kindly critic.

(4) If possible, take some lessons in voice production.

(5) Get a good book on the subject and inwardly digest its counsels.

(6) Ask some one to point out my faults and then try to correct them.

(7) Make every effort to have the service begin in such a way that the atmosphere of reverence is created.

(8) Pray about it every day myself and especially before every service at which I officiated.

(9) Pray especially that in the lessons I might realize that I am reading a message from God, and that in the prayers I am trying to lift up to Him the prayers of my people—and so try to give them wings.

(10) If I read this humble protest of a layman, refrain from putting it aside without asking, "Is it I?"

Faithfully yours,

MIDDAY PRAYER—A SUGGESTION.

Mr. Editor: Not long ago a letter appeared in the Norfolk Ledger-Dispatch urging that all Christians of whatever denomination be urged to offer up a prayer at a given hour for our cause in this war. Elsewhere, I am told, similar moves and suggestions have been made, and I have been wondering if we Christian people of America are not neglecting to use the "strongest weapon" at our command and to use it to the utmost, namely, the weapon of prayer!

If every Christian in our land were to stop for just one minute every day as the clock strikes twelve to ask our heavenly Father that our men and those of our allies be strengthened to hold and to drive back the hordes of the enemy, what a power this would represent and what a strength it would give to those brave men battling for their lives and for ours and for all that makes life dear and worth while.

If this could be put to all our people I feel sure that it would make a strong appeal and that many would gladly avail themselves of the suggestion. Let us as a united people get together in the name of Christ, our common Lord and Master, and present a united front against those powers of darkness whom we are today fighting!

"And He spake a parable unto them that they ought always to pray and not to faint. . . . And shall not God avenge His elect, that cry unto Him day and night, and yet He is long suffering over them? Nevertheless, when the Son of Man cometh shall He find faith on the earth?"

The answer to that question—humanly speaking—remains with us; if we are faithful the Son of Man will find faith when He cometh; if we are faithless He will not! Which will it be?

Are we Christians here in America using to its utmost Christianity's strongest weapon? Are we proving the power at our command, the power of prayer? Can we not help the boys at the front by letting them know that we are with them every day, and that through our prayers they are being given a power otherwise not their own?

Then there is another blessing that would come to us from such a united effort at united prayer, namely: It would be a great help towards drawing all Christians of whatever communion closer together at this time of common peril and need, which closer relation might continue with us always afterward! Surely we must feel that if there is one thing that all Christian people believe in and agree upon, it is the necessity of prayer. If we cannot get together in matters of faith and doctrine we can get together in prayer, and when once we have given this a fair trial we will have been made to see how much closer and more alike we all are than we possibly had ever dreamed of.

We hear so much these days about the Federation of Churches, Christian Unity, and such similar movements, that we make the suggestion that this getting together in prayer will do much towards making Christian Unity, which we all believe should be and for which we are daily praying, a reality. After all it is the unity of spirit that we all want to see made a real, living, potent thing in our lives, and must not prayer, the most spiritual of all things, be the foundation upon which we are to build?

What an inexpressible comfort to those who have loved ones at the front to know that a united country is with them every day at a given hour in its prayers! What an appeal this should make to all who believe in the power of prayer, as to those who desire to see right and justice procured for all mankind!

If our President would send out an appeal to the whole nation that at the hour of twelve a bell (or bells) be sounded in every town and city as a call to the nation to join together in prayer for one minute, it would be accepted by nearly every right-thinking man and woman throughout the land and might grow into a marvelous power, not only for today's peril, but for the morrow's betterment.

THE CHURCH PENSION FUND.

The Rev. Gilbert Pender.

The Southern Churchman has bravely and convincingly pointed out what seem thoroughly to be regretted failures on the part of the Church Pension Fund to meet the hopes and expectations of thousands who contributed to the Five Million Dollar Fund, believing that, in so doing, they were helping to care for the whole body of the aged and infirm clergy of the Church, and of the widows and orphans of deceased clergy. These editorials and letters have had to do, in the main, with the matter of getting a more equitable support for those who were already pensioners of the General Clergy Relief Fund, and a proper use of special funds which came to the Church Pension Fund from the General Clergy Relief Fund—e. g., Automatic Pensions at 64.

It seems to me that there are other criticisms that ought to be made with perfect frankness, and urged with determined persistence until they are met. I venture to deal with some of them.

I. Failure to Take the Church Into Confidence.

Since the Five Million Fund (which turned out to be an Eight Million Fund) was raised the Church Pension Fund has never once really taken the whole Church into its confidence and told us just why it must do certain things and could not do other things. It has never answered questions clearly and frankly. It has never met criticisms honestly made. It has made assertions without offering proof; stated conclusions without stating premises; announced policies without giving reasons. The Church Pension Fund is a corporation in which every Churchman is a stockholder and every clergyman is a policyholder. We have a right to know, and we do demand the evidence that makes assertion good, the premises that make conclusions valid, and the reasons that make policy wise.

II. Bewildering Assertions.

Some of the unsupported assertions which have been dealt out to us appear, on close analysis, to be incredible, and we are reluctantly compelled to wonder what purpose they can have other than to bewilder and dazzle the doubtless and unheeding. I cite two examples:

(a) We are told that the liabilities of the General Clergy Relief Fund amounted to nearly two million dollars. And furthermore, that the funds in cash and securities turned over by that Fund were not nearly enough to meet this liability. (Incidentally in all reports and statements as to the funds and assets turned over, we find no mention of the fact that the Church Pension Fund holds in its safe assured wills and legacies received from the General Clergy Relief Fund, and which will eventually come to the Church Pension Fund, amounting to a million dollars or more.) But aside from that, here is the assertion that the liabilities are about two million dollars. But no evidence to substantiate that statement has ever been forthcoming. Show us the actuarial figures. We know that the amount needed in the first year of the Pension Fund to meet the grants of the G. C. R. F. was about $110,000. At that rate, supposing that not a single beneficiary of the G. C. R. F. died, it would take eighteen years to use two million dollars. How many of them will be alive eighteen years from now? We believe that Mr. Sayre told the General Convention that seven years would practically wipe out the beneficiaries of the old Fund. Possibly we are wrong and the Church Pension Fund is right, we only ask the evidence of this so far unsupported assertion.

(b) Recently one of the leading and influential laymen of the Church told the writer that there was one thing the critics of the Church Pension Fund overlooked—namely, that the Church Pension Fund in the beginning said that in order to care for retired and infirm clergy, or the dependents left by deceased clergy, it would be necessary to have a fund of forty-nine million dollars. He argued from this that we could not expect much from a five million dollar fund and not very much more from an eight million dollar fund. Of course if the premise is accepted the conclusion follows. But the premise was never demonstrated and to the average intelligence it becomes ridiculous on any sort of close inspection. Just look at it for a moment. Given a fund of $49,000,000. It would be invested, say at 4½ per cent. That would bring in a yearly income of $2,205,000. There are six thousand clergymen in our Church; their average salary, so the Church Pension Fund tells us, is $1,200. Their annual premium is 7½ per cent of their salary. That gives the Fund an additional income of $540,000. So the total income of a fund with forty-nine millions at the start would be $2,745,000. Suppose the number of beneficiaries equals ten per centum of the clergy list, or six hundred. Each one of them would receive the snug pension of two thousand two hundred eighty-seven dollars and fifty cents. The number of beneficiaries is not so great as that, but if it were it would mean that most of the aged and retired clergy would be receiving a retired pension amounting to nearly twice as much as they ever received in their years of active labor. Or to come at it from another angle. Suppose the average pension was six hundred dollars, then a Pension Fund with forty-nine millions on the start could have 4,575 pensioners on the list, a number more than equal to three-quarters of the total number of clergy. Suppose the average pension was nine hundred dollars, then a fund with forty-nine millions at the start could have 3,050 pensioners on its list, a number equal to more than half the number of clergy in the Church. This statement that we needed a forty-nine million dollar fund is on the face of it ridiculous, and to argue from it to what can or cannot be done with an eight million dollar fund is rank foolishness. Of course the point is that close examination of other bare assertions without evidence to support them may prove that they are equally insupportable. What we want is the evidence and what we must do is to examine it.

III. Unfair Discriminations.

There have been unfair and unwarranted refusals of pensions. In two cases where premiums had been properly paid since March 1, 1917, pensions have been definitely refused on the ground that the men applying were already receiving pensions from other sources. That seems to us to be deliberately breaking faith. The statement was repeatedly made in printed pamphlet and public speech, by the President and the Secretary of the Church Pension Fund, in the campaign for the five million dollars that men would receive their pensions as of right, and not as a gift, grant or charity that no questions would be asked, or could be asked, as to other sources of income. It seems perfectly clear that a man otherwise eligible to a pension from our fund is not made ineligible by the fact that he receives a pension from the Carnegie Foundation, which surely has nothing to do with the Church. Moreover, it seems to be not only bad faith but manifest injustice. It is, to speak with downright frankness, none of the business of the Church Pension Fund what a man's income is, or where it comes from. His pension from the Church Pension Fund has been bought and paid for. It is his. If it be said that in these first years only one year's premium has been paid, the answer is that that is not true. His premiums have been paid "en bloc" by the Five Million Dollar Fund for Accrued Liabilities. Of course the whole confusion here comes from the fundamental misnomer. We really have no such thing as a Pension System in the Church. We have something that travels under the technical name—Pension Fund—but it is not that at all. It is an Insurance Fund. It is a system for insuring annuities to men who are policyholders and whose premiums have been paid. Men are given these annuities not fundamentally because they are aged or infirm, nor because they have served the Church a certain number of years. A clergyman may be old, he may be infirm, he may have served forty-four years, and none of these things entitle him to a pension. He may be one or all of them and not receive a cent of pension. The one sine qua non is that his premiums shall have been regularly paid. If they have he may get his pension. If they have not he certainly won't get any pension. To insist that no premiums means no annuity, but reserve the right to give no annuity even when premiums have been paid, is a good deal like saying, "We are strictly business in the matter of premium paying; we reserve the right to be charitable—to the Pension Fund—in the matter of paying annuities."

If a clergyman reaching the age of sixty-eight is possessed of ten thousand dollars' worth of Liberty Bonds, would the Pension Fund say, "You cannot have a pension." It seems hardly less impertinent to say, "You have a pension fund from the Carnegie Foundation, therefore you shall have no pension from us." The reply is perfectly obvious and just. "But my annuity has been bought and paid for. You took my money. It is not a grant of charity from you. It is a clear business proposition and my right." We are using these words—business, right, charity—in the sense in which they were perpetually dinned into our ears all during the campaign by the officials of the Church Pension Fund. Are they going back on their own principles now that they have got the money on that basis? Surely not.

Further. In the official handbook issued by the Pension Fund for the use of Vestries and Other Governing Bodies, we find the following under the caption, "How Age Benefits Are Computed and to Whom Paid." "At the age of sixty-eight, upon relinquishment of the emoluments attached to any cure or administrative or other office in the Church previously held," etc., etc. Suppose a parish has regularly paid the premiums for its rector. He reaches the age limit and retires. His parish says to him: "You have served us long and faithfully and we wish to make a larger provision for you than your pension will supply. We will continue to pay you a stipend equal to one-quarter of what you have been receiving. This, with the pension we have bought from the Church Pension Fund, will make you fairly comfortable." Would the Church Pension Fund consider that a sufficient justification for saying to this man. "You shall not have your pension because you have not given up the emoluments of your cure." And in that case would it return to the parish the premiums which had been paid in good faith? This is not at all a hypothetical case. It has actually happened in the case of one clergyman known to the writer. The answer is perfectly obvious and fair. It would be made by any live and self-respecting vestry and would, we believe, be sustained by any court in the land. "That is none of your business. You have no right to make such a ruling. We have bought and paid for an annuity for this man at the price you fixed, and we insist that you have nothing to do but deliver the commodity you offered for sale and we purchased. Anything else is receiving money and giving nothing in return."

A PLEA FOR THE HUMANITIES.

George Alexander, D. D.

* * * The progress of the last fifty years has been stupendous, but it has been in the realm of the physical. Our generation, dazzled by the wealth of its discoveries and inventions, preoccupied with its tools and its toys, has thrown its inheritance from former generations to the moles and the bats, and feels itself competent to find the way of life with little aid from the lamp of experience, and still less from the light of divine revelation.

Is the result quite satisfactory? Has our devotion to a bread and butter philosophy yielded a product of which we have reason to boast? We have glorified organization, efficiency, the acquisition and conservation of worldly wealth and physical well-being, and yet civilization is to-day making pitiful efforts to conserve with its left hand what with its strong right hand it wrecks and destroys. Not only so, but that nation to which all others have been going to school, that nation, the most advanced in the application of science to industry, and commerce, and social welfare, has precipitated a struggle in which her sons are being slaughtered by the million and her women and children pinched with hunger, a struggle in which half the world has marshaled its forces to work devastation. The "vicious circle" seems to have come round to its starting point.

Ruthlessness, frightfulness, savagery and breach of plighted faith have been the products of a kultur so highly developed that it has seemed to its authors worthy to be imposed by force upon all mankind. This moral perversion and chaos is not a chance phenomenon with no casual relations that can be traced.

Naturalism divorced from regard for eternal verities leads inevitably to moral perversion. Just as certainly it induces a distortion of mental faculties. Training in science, unbalanced by those elements of culture which appeal to the imagination and the hearts of men, means death to practical wisdom. A mechanistic logic may yield splendid results when applied to things and forces, but when applied to the workings of the human spirit, to the actions and institutions of free men, it leads to conclusions which outrage the common judgment of mankind. It was an Austrian minister of education who, moved to wrath by some manifestation of inability to sense psychological factors, exclaimed in his broken English: "Dese Germans, dey knows everyding. Dev understands noddin'."

The pursuit of secular knowledge without the believing spirit yields a yet sorrier fruitage. It ministers to a certain pessimism that robs nature herself of her charm. More true than when it was penned, is the confession of Wordsworth:

"The world is too much with us; late and soon,
Getting and spending, we lay waste our powers:

Little we see in nature that is ours;
We have given our hearts away, a sordid boon!

* * * Great God! I'd rather be
A Pagan suckled in a creed outworn;
So might I, standing on this pleasant lea,

Have glimpses that would make me less forlorn;

Have sight of Proteus rising from the sea;

Or hear Old Triton blow his wreathed horn."

Let us not deceive ourselves. With eager feet we may pursue knowledge in order to gain pleasure, but the spirit of gladness goes out of life when we part company with what Virgil calls the pii vates, the prophets who have communed with their own souls and talked with God.

"But John P. Robinson, he Sez they didn't know everythin' down in Judee."

True, they had very little of our present knowledge of forces and things. Their thinking has been called narrow; but no one can deny that it was deep and high. The echoes of Sinai still reverberate in the unplumbed depths of the human spirit, and the saying of Him who trod the shores of deep Galilee is still true: "The words that I speak unto you, they are spirit, and they are life."

It must be evident that I am not merely making a defense of the classics as the basis of liberal education. That is scarcely necessary since all the Presidents we have are now lined up against the iconoclastic onslaught of the Rockefeller Foundation. What I plead for, and what I believe is surely coming, coming more surely since our youth are once more responding to the call for devotion of everything to an ideal—what I plead for, is a revival of interest in the things of the spirit, in history, and philosophy, and literature, in the wisdom which successive generations have garnered not only from the experience of life, but from fellowship with God, from the discovery of His ways in the realm of mind, as well as in the realm of matter. Imagination, sympathy, and faith are forces just as real as gravitation or chemical affinity. Any people that leaves them out of its curriculum will lose their sanity and will find that the "stars in their courses" fight against them.—Phi Beta Kappa Key.

Jesus is always gracious to those who come to Him, no matter how foolish may be the errand that brings them. To James and John He gave a helpful lesson, without saying anything that would be hard for them to receive. Their hearts must have been touched as He referred to Himself. Would they be like Him? Then let them serve! "Whoever would be great—and all should long for it—must be like Christ, the servant of all. If any man, in Christ's spirit, gives his life for others, God's sovereign choice will gladly light upon him as fittest for a crown, and for a place with Christ upon the throne."—Amos R. Wells.

The Great Commission

One Day's Income Plan.

The third week in April finds the One Day's Income Plan well past the $30,000 mark. It is interesting to note that whereas the offerings of parishes have fallen off considerably as compared with last year the One Day's Income Plan shows an advance over last year.

Everywhere people seem to be rising to the need. Few gifts are less than formerly, and on the other hand very many of them have been increased—in some cases double or quadruple. With the increased obligations of this year and the large deficit carried over from last year this spirit of determination that the work shall not suffer is bringing encouragement to all at the Church Missions House. It has given rise to the hope that this spirit will be reflected in parish offerings later on.

Already some Dioceses are laying their plans for the Diocesan-wide presentation of the plan on Whitsunday. This has become an established custom in the Diocese of Bethlehem, and this year Kentucky is preparing to use it with the hope of putting that Diocese back on the honor roll.

The following came with a gift of $25: "I take great pleasure in sending my contribution to the One Day's Income Plan. I am making an extra effort this year hoping that each one doing their share there will be no deficit in 1918. I send seven days' income, instead of three as I did last year. Money is necessary to live, but it seems such a small thing compared to the lives that are being given."

An interesting incident has come from a sign painter down South. "I am enclosing a little check for $5 on the 'One Day's Income Plan.' For the past several years, since the arrival of the boll weevil some of us could not figure on an income, so this morning when I found your letter on my desk I decided to see if I could make any trade during the day to make any extra money. Hardly an hour passed before a stranger 'blew in' and wanted me to paint a sign on a piece of property and offered me $5 for the privilege. I am enclosing the $5. I am not superstitious, but this money came in awfully quick behind your letter. Wish I could send more, and maybe I can next year."

The English Church Increases Missionary Offerings.

In common with the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel, the Church Missionary Society is receiving offerings for the foreign work of the Church of England larger than the average. For the first ten months of this present fiscal year the income was $111,000. This is not only a larger amount than was received during a similar period for the preceding year, but is also considerably above the average for the last five years. The Church Missionary Society has asked for $150,000 to cover the loss occasioned by the high price of silver in the Orient. It is probable that our own Board of Missions will need at least $190,000 more than last year to meet this one item of war expenses.

"The sin we are slowest to forgive is often the very one we are most apt to commit."

A Guild of Intercession in a Leper Hospital.

(Inclosing the item below Miss Julia C. Emery writes:

"My Dear Dr. Goodwin:

"Remembering Mrs. Mason's interest in the lepers, I am sure the enclosed will interest her friends among the readers of the Southern Churchman.")

In Kumamoto, Southern Japan, is the Leper Hospital of the Resurrection of Hope, which owes its existence to the interest, energy and perseverance of an English Churchwoman, Miss Riddell. Each year Miss Riddell sends out a Kalender telling of it. That for the present year describes its Guild of Intercession.

"Such members of this Guild as are well enough to do so meet in the chapel every Monday afternoon at four o'clock. The members of the Church Committee take it in turn to preside. Generally a hymn to the Holy Spirit is sung, then a Litany compiled especially for the Guild is read. Some of the sentences in it are taken from the Liturgy of the Russian Church, found as an Appendix to the Bishop of London's 'Visit to the Front.' During this Litany the names of all those for whom we have been asked to intercede are read, and as each name is read comes the response, 'Lord, have mercy upon him.' Then comes a short space of silent prayer, and then follow other special petitions which have been sent in for those who are ill or in trouble, or for friends. Then brief extemporary prayers are offered in connection with requests received, and the meeting closes with the Lord's Prayer and the Benediction.

"Every member of the Guild has some special petition committed to his or her care, and also each member possesses two 'White Comrade' cards, on each of which is written the name of somebody at the front, and for these they pray not only in the chapel, but at their own time.

"Sometimes a name has to be changed. I was talking to one of the women patients recently as I met her in the gardens, and when we had finished talking about herself, I asked her, 'For whom are you praying now?' I wished the mother of the man she mentioned could have seen the joy in her face as she gave me his name, adding, 'I am always praying for him, night and day.'

"One mother sent a photograph of her son to the woman who intercedes for him. It gave the greatest pleasure, and forms for her a fresh link with the brotherhood of Christ and of humanity. That perhaps is the dearest thing to a leper's heart—so outcast are they."

During the early part of Lent, Deaconess Knapp was conducting two Bible classes, one in Tsukiji, for the foreign women of our Mission, and the other in Agabu for the members of the Church of England congregation. The latter it is hoped to make permanent.

Church Intelligence

House of Bishops on the Newman Smyth Memorial.

The Bishop of Vermont presented the following report on the Newman Smyth appeal on behalf of the special committee:

"The House of Bishops has given consideration to the Memorial presented to it, signed by the Rev. Dr. Newman Smyth and the Rev. Dr. Williston Walker on behalf of many others representing several Christian communities.

"While heartily appreciating the earnest plea for the subordination of any partisan or sectarian interests, to the cause of a united witness to Christ and His rule, and humbly lamenting the comparative powerlessness at this great world crisis of the Christian Church by reason of its divisions, we cannot perceive in the course suggested by the petition any real remedy for existing evils.

"As in the civil sphere, so in the ecclesiastical, a patched-up peace, not resting on sure foundations, however immediately alluring, would be provocative of fresh misunderstandings and separations.

"Our differences lie deeper than questions of ordination, important as these are. Though often unperceived, the real difference between religious communions goes down, in many cases, to the recognition or not of a definite revelation of God's mind and will made by our Lord Jesus Christ, His incarnate Son, and of His Church as the minister of His truth and grace.

"We must remind the memorialists that, in the case of many of the religious communions represented by them, there is no central and authoritative body with which we can treat as to questions of intercommunion. By the terms of this organization, each congregation is independent as to its doctrine, discipline and worship.

"To join in ordaining or commissioning any army or navy chaplain, appointed by the State or accepted as a volunteer, from whatever Church he may come, would be to deny that any truth, including that of the Triune Being of God or of the Incarnation of the Eternal Son, is of real importance and necessity.

"We would urge by all means refraining from all unnecessary controversy and rivalry in caring for our soldiers and sailors, and the exercise of the greatest possible consideration and co-operation that does not violate convictions and principles; and the prayerful preparation for the careful and deliberate consideration of questions concerning Faith and Order which now divide us. For such a world conference our Commission, appointed several years ago by the General Convention, is earnestly working.

"The hasty adoption of ill-considered expedients in the face of an emergency we believe would endanger and retard, rather than further, the cause of reunion, and the realization of our Lord's intention and prayer that His disciples may in one Body bear witness to Him and to His word."

The report was adopted.

Later the Bishop of Vermont presented a supplementary report of the Special Committee appointed to consider the Memorial of Dr. Newman Smyth and others, to which was also referred the New Brunswick case, which reached the House after the adoption of the foregoing report. This was a case of several local congregations, including one of our own, desiring to unite, in regard to which the Bishop of New Jersey asked the advice of the House of Bishops.

"The principles underlying that reply apply to this particular case. No steps should be taken with regard to reunion in particular localities or between particular bodies which would hinder or endanger the wider object of the reunion of the whole body.

"The action suggested by the New Brunswick churches cannot be regarded as a merely local concern; it would imperil unity within our own communion.

"Apart from matters which clearly belong to the jurisdiction of the Bishop of the Diocese, and with regard to the two questions, about which advice is specially asked, we are clear:

"(1) That confirmation as the apostolic completion of baptism cannot be surrendered or treated as an optional alternative to any other form of reception to full Church fellowship;

"(2) Nor could ordination or consecration be given to a minister who would exercise his ministry in partial independence of the body which gave his commission.

"We feel convinced that, however laudable the intentions of the promoters of this scheme, its execution would have the effect, however far from their design, of adding to rather than diminishing the divisions which we deplore.

"The committee unanimously recommends, in addition to the adoption of the above statement, the appointment of a commission of three Bishops, to be named by the chair, with whom the Bishop of New Jersey can consult in any action that may be called for."

The recommendation of the committee was adopted.

Meeting of Board of Religious Education of the Province of Washington.

One of the most vital and stimulating of the Board's meetings was held at St. Alban's Church, Washington, D. C., April 17. Excepting the President, Bishop Israel, who is in France, all were present. A great loss has been sustained in the death of the Rev. Fred-eric Gardiner, L. H. D., Secretary for Schools and Colleges. Effort will be made through a committee to carry on the work he has so well begun. Co-operation was pledged in promoting the Wartime Education Fund of the General Board, and the Teacher Training Drive to be made next fall with other Christian bodies. Observance of Education Sunday in every parish next October was again recommended, to be followed, where practicable, with a week-day or week-night conference of the educational forces of the parish. The following resolutions were passed on recommendation of the Sunday-school Commission of the Board:

"Whereas, official statistics of the Church show a decrease in the Sunday-school population of the Church; and

"Whereas, the work of religious education as a means of getting our citizens into right relations with God is a matter of supreme importance, if democracy is to continue a safe institution for America, and love, justice and righteousness are to continue and grow among us; therefore, be it

"Resolved, This Provincial Board of Religious Education earnestly requests all our Clergy, superintendents and teachers to maintain the work of Sunday-school instruction with unabated vigor during the war, and to permit none of the imperative needs of the hour to interfere with the tasks of religious education; and be it further

"Resolved, That the Secretary of the Provincial Board be authorized to transmit this resolution to the Secretary of each Diocesan Board of Religious Education in the Province, with the request that each Diocesan Board earnestly urge the officers of each Sunday-school in each Diocese to give active attention to this matter."

The Sunday-school Commission met on the preceding afternoon, all Dioceses except three being represented and submitting heartening reports. A digest of all Diocesan reports will be prepared by a committee of the Commission for consideration by the Board at its fall meeting.

On the evening of the 16th a joint public meeting of the Provincial and Diocesan Boards and the Washington Sunday-school Institute was held in the parish hall of the Church of the Epiphany, with addresses by the Rev. H. W. Diller on "The Plans and Projects of the Provincial Board," and by the Rev. E. P. Dandridge, on "Religious Education in Wartime."

General Missions—Treasurer King's Report to April 1.

For the first five months of this fiscal year of fourteen months, that is to April 1st, the total of the receipts on the apportionment was $315,951.57 while a year ago for a like period they were $353,707.47, namely:

	Last Year	This Year
Parishes.....	$268,566 80	$226,588 84
Individuals.....	39,138 82	45,476 33
Sunday Schools.....	4,911 35	2,885 24
Woman's Auxiliary.....	39,356 86	37,742 44
Junior Auxiliary.....	1,733 64	2,358 72
	$353,707 47	$315,051 57
Decrease.....		38,655 90
		$353,707 47

Of the total receipts, $23,049.56 has come from the "One Day's Income Plan." This is most encouraging. With the exception of parish offerings, the sources of income more than hold their own. This is fine. And, frankly, we are not greatly surprised at the momentary decrease in parish offerings. Two reasons are obvious. One, the change of date for closing the fiscal year to December 31st has the effect of reducing the hitherto best part of the year for making contributions, namely, the winter months. After making the effort to meet one's parish apportionment towards the end of a year it is very human to wish to rest awhile. For the moment, therefore, we are not over anxious as to the ultimate result. Two, the other reason is the war.

We shall say no more, for this is no time for unnecessary words, when all our mind and will and strength must be bent with overwhelming force to the work of winning this war for Christ. But we know that just because you realize the vital importance of this call, you will defend His battle line in the East as well as in the West, and in the great fight for freedom you will not suffer any of His children to be left behind.

Armenian and Syrian Relief.

Two hundred thousand dollars was appropriated for war relief in modern Bible lands at a meeting of the Executive Committee, April 2nd. Fifty thousand dollars goes to Jerusalem, $100,000.00 to Tabriz and $50,000.00 to Teheran, Persia.

The financial statement rendered by the treasurer, Cleveland H. Dodge, shows total receipts to date amounting to $9,072,766.83. The treasurer's report shows that every cent given to Armenian relief is cabled for relief. Not one penny is deducted along the way for administrative expenses. All the expenses of the committee are met privately by its members.

Contributors received during the week ending April 9th, totaled, $95,703.92.

One of the most interesting features of the war is the common sense methods with which the American people are meeting their responsibility to the sufferers on the other side of the water. Nearly every town and city has its war chest. A committee usually headed by the mayor of the city decides upon the amount which is to go from that town or city for war relief and then raises that amount.

The American Committee for Armenian and Syrian Relief is daily receiving checks from cities in different sections of the United States. The citizens from Dayton, Ohio, have just sent $125,000.00 from their war chest for starving children in Western Asia. Other towns that have apportioned part of their war chest fund to Armenian and Syrian relief during the past week, are Utica, New York; Kenosha, Wisconsin; Columbus, Ohio; Cleveland, Ohio; Detroit, Michigan; Syracuse, New York; Bristol, Tenn., and Wilmington, North Carolina.

Alaska: In a personal letter from Archdeacon Stuck to the Rev. C. E. Betticher, dated January 21 and post-marked Tigara (Point Hope), Alaska, which only arrived Saturday morning, April 20, he tells the interesting fact that he succeeded in reaching Point Hope in time for Christmas, and has spent six weeks there. He then planned to start north for Icy Cape and Point Barrow, hoping to reach the latter place by March 1, where he would remain for two weeks, and then turn east along the north coast of Alaska, reaching Herschel Island by April 15 at latest and Fort Yukon by May 1.

The National War Work Council of the Young Men's Christian Association has sent overseas since June 25th of last year over fifteen hundred men. They have gone for service with the American and Allied armies in France. Since the government has placed in its hands entire charge of the post exchange, as the army canteen is now called, the demand of the Association abroad for men is more insistent.

The latest list of those who have recently sailed for France contains eighty-three names, many of them being men of the first prominence in the communities from which they came. Nearly eleven per cent of these, about the usual large proportion, are Churchmen.

General Theological Seminary: The Executive Committee of the Associate Alumni, General Theological Seminary, has awarded the McVicker prizes in Greek and Ecclesiastical History to Elwood Craig Boggess, of the senior class and a candidate for Holy Orders in the Diocese of Southern Ohio.

The alumni will have its annual meeting on Tuesday morning, May 28th.

VIRGINIA.

Rt. Rev. R. A. Gibson, D. D., Bishop.
Rt. Rev. W. C. Brown, D. D., Coadjutor.

Letter From the Bishop.

Dear Brethren of the Clergy and Laity:
Your Bishop is called upon so frequently to read notices to his congregation that he takes this, the only method which comes to his mind, to comply with that request which in many cases seems imperative.

Please bear in mind in all your associations with your people that we are at war. I know of no condition in life which is not changed by that fact. Defeat would lay us prostrate. We have known freedom; we should if defeated now for an indefinite period live in a state of war or under the heel of an intolerable tyranny. Let us keep this thought constantly in mind. War or a living death; freedom or tyranny.

In ancient times when the Roman Republic was in the peril which now hangs over us a dictator was the usual recourse. They always overcome in the long run. We have no dictator, we are all sovereigns. The first thing to do is to govern ourselves.

We naturally turn to other things in preference, but now whether we like it or not our chief and first business as civilians is to

1. Buy Liberty Bonds and War Savings Stamps.
2. Pay war taxes cheerfully.
3. Support the Red Cross.
4. Feed the army and our allies.
5. Keep up our missions.
6. Care for our parishes.

I know you have these things in mind. "Bind them on your foreheads, talk of them by the way." And exercise yourselves unto godliness of the kind that opens the door to brotherly kindness and charity.

Your Friend and Bishop,
Robert A. Gibson.

Death of the Rev. Dr. Page.

The Rev. Frank Page, D. D., rector of Zion Church, Fairfax, and the Church of the Holy Comforter, Vienna, died in a hospital in Washington on Thursday, April 18, after an illness of about two months of pneumonia.

Dr. Page was a native of Hanover County, Virginia; the eldest son of the late Major John Page and a descendant of a distinguished line of forebears. He graduated from the Theological Seminary in Virginia in 1878 and was ordained deacon that year and priest a year later. His first charge was the old Falls Church, at Falls Church, and Zion Church, Fairfax, with the churches now embraced in the parish of Upper Truro. After two years in this field he became rector of St. Paul's Church, Waco, Texas, where he remained thirteen years, doing a splendid work in building up the Church in that city. In 1903 he accepted the rectorship of St. John's Church, Brooklyn, New York, where he remained nine years doing arduous city work. In the summer of 1911, feeling that this charge was too much for his strength, he accepted an eager invitation from part of his first church, where his early ministrations were still remembered, and became rector of the churches at Fairfax and Vienna, closing his ministry where he had begun it nearly forty years before. He had a genius for making and holding friends, and his influence was always strong and helpful. He was a man of robust character, a plain but forcible preacher and a most faithful pastor to his flock, maintaining in all things the best traditions of the old Virginia Clergy. The degree of Doctor of Divinity was conferred upon him by Washington and Lee University, his academic Alma Mater. He was a deputy to several General Conventions from the Diocese of Texas.

The death of Dr. Page makes the first break in the ranks of his class at the Theological Seminary, that of 1878, which numbered thirteen men and graduated forty years ago next June. He is survived also by his wife, a son and two daughters, and by two brothers, Ambassador Thomas Nelson Page and the Hon. Rosewell Page. His first wife, and the mother of his children, was Miss Lettie Morris, of Hanover County, who died seven years ago.

Dr. Page's funeral took place from Zion Church, Fairfax, on Saturday morning, the 20th instant, at eleven o'clock. Bishop-Coadjutor Brown had an appropriate service for the family and friends at the rectory before the body was taken to the church. The Rev. Arthur Kinsolving, D. D., of St. Paul's Church, Baltimore, Md., had charge of the services, assisted by Dr. Green, Dean of the Theological Seminary, and Professors Wallis and Bell in the church, and by the Rev. Dr. Phillips, of St. Paul's Church, Alexandria, Va., a classmate of Dr. Page, who read the committal at the grave in the beautiful cemetery of Fairfax. Other Clergy present were the Revs. Dr. Bryan, of Petersburg, Va.; William B. Lee, of Gloucester County, Va., and the Rev. Charles E. Buck, of Rock Creek Church, Washington, D. C., classmates of Dr. Page at the Seminary, and the Rev. R. Allan Castleman, rector of Falls Church, Va. Notwithstanding the inclemency of the day, there was a large attendance of sorrowing and devoted parishioners and friends, whose hearts, while mourning their own loss, went out in loving sympathy to their beloved pastor's family in their bereavement.

Resolutions Adopted by the Vestry of St. Thomas' Church, Orange.

Whereas, our rector, the Rev. Robert S. Carter, after ten years of devoted and successful service to St. Thomas Church, is forced by ill-health to tender his resignation as rector, to take effect June 15, 1918.

Be it resolved, That it is with the deepest regret, and only on the assurance that his determination is final, that the vestry accepts the resignation of Mr. Carter.

That he be tendered the use of the rectory until such time this fall as he may see fit to vacate the same.

That a committee of three be appointed to wait on Mr. Carter and present these resolutions with appropriate expressions of our appreciation of his work and grief at his resignation.

April 19, 1918.

Annual Council: Notice.

The vestry and members of St. James Church are looking forward with much pleasure to having the Council meet with them at that time.

Delegates coming via Washington, D. C., will take electric car leaving Thirty-sixth and M Streets, and those coming via Alexandria take electric car from St. Elmo to Bluemont Junction. As chairman of the Entertainment Committee I would ask the Clergy and laymen to advise me whether they will or will not be present. Reply cards have been sent to all the rectors for that purpose.

W. W. Chamblin, Chairman.
Leesburg, Va.

The Rev. Landon R. Mason, D. D., the venerable and beloved rector emeritus of Grace Church, Richmond, is at Grace Hospital in this city, suffering from a broken leg and other injuries received from being struck by an automobile on Saturday evening, April 20. Dr. Mason is resting quietly and doing as well as could be expected.

The Rev. William D. Smith, D. D., of Winchester, has been appointed by the Bishop of Maryland to have charge of all the work of the Church at Camp Meade. He will take charge of this work on May 1, but will retain charge of his parish, Christ Church, Winchester.

The Rev. Malcolm S. Taylor, rector of Beckford Parish, Woodstock, has accepted a call to Grace Church, Berryville.

The Rev. W. H. Cumpston, has resigned the charge of Trinity Church, Fredericksburg, to take up war work with the Y. M. C. A., has arrived safely in France.

Dr. Berryman Green, Jr., a son of the Rev. Dr. Berryman Green, of the Theological Seminary, has been appointed to the University of Virginia Hospital Unit, now awaiting orders.

Confirmation: Bishop Gibson visited St. Stephen's Church, Westhampton, Richmond, on Sunday morning, April 21, and confirmed a class of seven presented by the rector, the Rev. J. D. Green.

In the evening he confirmed a class of eight at St. Thomas' Church, Ginter Park, the Rev. F. A. Warren, rector.

The usual commencement exercises will be held this year at the Theological Seminary the first week in June. Last year on account of war conditions these exercises were greatly abridged, but this year the customary program will be followed.

SOUTHERN VIRGINIA.

Rt. Rev. R. D. Tucker, D. D., Bishop.
Rt. Rev. A. C. Thomson, D. D., Suffragan.

The Rev. W. G. McDowell, rector of Emmanuel Church, Staunton, announced to his congregation at the morning service on Sunday, April 14, that he had offered himself as a chaplain to the United States government for duty with the army. Mr. McDowell has had a call to St. John's Church in Montgomery, Ala., under consideration for several weeks, and in his statement to his congregation he said that on Sunday morning he had telegraphed his refusal to the call to Alabama and, at the same time, had wired his offer to the War Department.

Pending the action of the War Department on his offer, Mr. McDowell will continue as rector of Emmanuel Church. During the time that he has lived in Staunton he has made many friends, both within and without his church, and they will be grieved by his leaving his present post. He has become convinced that his highest duty is to do what he can for his country in its hour of need, and this conviction resulted in his recent action.

EAST CAROLINA.

Rt. Rev. Thomas. C. Darst, D. D., Bishop.

Convocation: The one hundred and seventy-third semi-annual meeting of the Convocation of Edenton, the Rev. R. B. Drane, dean, was held at St. Johns Church, Grifton, April 16 and 17. The opening sermon was preached by the Rev. John H. Griffith, of Kingston. An essay on "Our Church in Relation to the War," was read by the Treasurer of the Convocation, Mr. John G. Bragaw.

The Church of the Good Shepherd, Wilmington, the Rev. F. deV. Dean, minister-in-charge, has lately been improved by having a granolithic walk put around the entire parish property. The interior of the church has been painted, and it is the intention of the minister and vestry to install choir stalls and pews at an early date. A Brotherhood for the young men of the parish has lately been organized, and an evangelical service is held Sunday evenings which is proving very popular.

In St. Paul's Church, Wilmington, the Rev. D. L. Gwathmey, rector, at Evening Prayer on the Wednesday in Holy Week, dedicated a very handsome processional cross, the gift of Mr. and Mrs. J. Haughton James, in memory of their infant son.

The Diocese has been saddened by the death of its former Chancellor, the late Mr. William D. Pruden, who was a member of St. Paul's Parish, Edenton.

NORTH CAROLINA.

Rt. Rev. Jos. B. Cheshire, D. D., Bishop

The Rev. Francis Joyner, who was ill during Lent and unable to hold services, is now improving and it is hoped will be able to resume his duties shortly.

Miss Elise Bradley, missionary or settlement worker in the western part of the State, has resigned on account of the illness of her mother. She has been a worker in the mountains of the State—"Rosborough Settlement"—for five months. If any one wishing to help in this mountain work will write to the Rev. E. N. Joyner, Lenoir, N. C., or Miss Bradley, Stancell, N. C., information concerning the work will be gladly furnished. Old or new clothes donated to be sold will be appreciated.

At St. Luke's Church, Northampton County, services are held twice a month by the rector, the Rev. Louis Taylor, and the Sunday-school work is progressing nicely.

SOUTH CAROLINA.

Rt. Rev. W. A. Guerry, D. D., Bishop.

"Community Service" for Men of the Service.

The Episcopal churches of Charleston have started a "Community Service" for the men of the United States army and navy stationed in and around Charleston. The largest hall in the city has been rented, which is centrally located. The service is held each Sunday night, consisting of a short service, popular music, generally led by one of the military bands, and an address. After the religious service a social hour is held and refreshments are served. The success of the undertaking has been wonderful, hundreds of people have been turned away from the service each Sunday evening after the large hall had been filled to standing capacity. Chaplain W. R. Scott, of the United States Army, has charge of the community service, under the direction of the Bishop of the Diocese.

Bishop Guerry is to speak at the service Sunday evening, May 10.

GEORGIA.

Rt. Rev. F. F. Reese, D. D., Bishop.

Convention of the Diocese.

Preliminary to the meeting of the ninety-sixth Convention of the Diocese of Georgia there were held meetings of the Standing Committee, the Board of Corporation and the Board of Missions, on April 16.

On the evening of April 16 a beautiful dinner was given in St. John's Parish House by the Episcopal Church Club of Savannah. In addition to the members, the delegates to the Convention were present. Mr. W. W. Williamson, the President of the club, graciously acted as toastmaster.

Three after dinner speeches were made, one by R. G. Tatum, who described in a simple tale well told, the ascent of Mt. McKinley in Alaska.

The Rev. G. Sherwood Whitney, the rector of St. Paul's Church, Augusta, spoke about "After the War What of the Church—Carry On." He spoke most earnestly on the obligation in these critical times to public worship, of the effect that our missionary work should not lag—that our churches should be got in good financial order and that religion in the home is fundamental.

The last speaker was the Rev. R. W. Patton, who made a powerful appeal for the American Church Institute for Negroes.

The new officers were elected as follows: President, Hon. J. Randolph Anderson; Vice-President, O. T. McIntosh; Treasurer, M. M. Howkins; Secretary, Thomas Purse.

The Convention itself began with the celebration of the Holy Communion in St. John's Church, the Rev. W. T. Dakin, rector, on Wednesday morning, April 17. The Bishop was the celebrant, and the Rev. N. B. Groton, civilian chaplain at Camp Hancock, Augusta, and the Rev. J. J. Corish, vicar of Christ Church, Valdosta, assisted in the service. The Rev. G. S. Whitney was also in the chancel.

In place of a sermon the Bishop read his annual address. The loving mention of deceased members was made. The number of Clergy in the Diocese has diminished, both by reason of death and of removal, and the Bishop hoped that new candidates for Holy Orders would rise up in our midst. He devoted a part of his address to the progress of the Diocese. Here he noted in particular St. Paul's, Augusta. The church was destroyed by fire about two years ago, and owing to the unremitting efforts of the rector, the Rev. Mr. Whitney, and the devotion of the congregation, the new St. Paul's is now completed.

The Bishop made thankful reference to the fact that this year is the decennial of his Episcopate. His address closed with earnest remarks upon the close of the great war.

The Convention was duly called to order when the Rev. S. J. French was re-elected Secretary, who appointed the Rev. William B. Sams, Assistant Secretary.

The afternoon session was consumed in the reading of reports and routine work. In the evening the missionary meeting was held in St. John's Church. The report of the Board of Missions was read by the Rev. John D. Wing. Hon. A. B. Moore read the report of the Treasurer.

There were three addresses. The Rev. William Johnson, rector of the Church of the Good Shepherd, Augusta, spoke "Upon Whom Does the Responsibility of Missions Rest?" his answer being, "upon every baptized person." The second address was by Mr. R. G. Tatum on "Mission Work in Alaska." The third address by the Rev. N. B. Croton, who is civilian chaplain at Camp Hancock, Augusta, had for its subject, "Our Church's Responsibility to the Boys in the Camp." He spoke in a definite and telling manner.

On Thursday morning the Holy Communion was celebrated by the Bishop at half past seven. Later Morning Prayer was read by the Rev. R. P. Johnson and the Rev. William B. Sams.

The missionary reports were the order for the day. Hon. J. R. Anderson made a stirring address on Diocesan Missions. The patriotic resolution, offered by Mr. E. S. Elliott, was passed.

At the election of the officers practically no changes were made. The Standing Committee are: The Rev. Messrs. James B. Lawrence, Americus; S. B. McGlohon, Savannah; G. S. Whitney, Augusta, and D. W. Winn, St.

Simon's Island, and Messrs. J. R. Anderson, George T. Cann, E. S. Elliott, Secretary, and A. B. Moore; all of Savannah.

The delegates to the Provincial Synod are: Clerical, the Rev. Messrs. F. W. B. Dorset, Augusta; S. J. French, Brunswick; William Johnson, Augusta; W. H. Higgins, Thomasville; J. M. Walker, Albany, and P. T. Prentiss, Augusta.

Lay: Messrs. J. R. Anderson, Savannah; George T. Cann, Savannah; M. M. Hopkins, Savannah; William K. Miller, Augusta; A. B. Moore, Savannah, and R. T. Waller, Savannah.

After singing a patriotic hymn and prayers the Convention adjourned to meet next year in St. Paul's Church, Augusta, on May 7.

St. Thomas' Church, Thomasville, the Rev. William H. Higgins, rector. The congregation of St. Thomas' Church has responded to all appeals made to them this year in a spirit of generosity that is truly commendable. The parish was apportioned $600.00 for the War Commission Fund, and it contributed $721.55. The offering received for the Endowment Fund of the parish was this year $578.16, which added to what was already on hand amounts to $2,014.02. Of this amount the vestry has invested $2,000.00 in Liberty Bonds. A friend of the church has presented to the parish a bond of the third issue for $5,000.00, which makes the total amount of the Endowment Fund, $7,014.02, $7,000.00 of which is invested in Liberty Bonds.

The rector, for the vestry, asked for an Easter offering of $1,200.00, and the total amount received, including the Sunday-school offering, was $1,257.14.

ATLANTA.

Rt. Rev. H. J. Mikell, D. D., Bishop.

The Annual Council.

The eleventh Annual Council of the Diocese of Atlanta convened in St. Philip's Cathedral, Atlanta, on Wednesday morning, April 17.

The opening service took place at ten o'clock. The Bishop, the Rt. Rev. Henry J. Mikell, D. D., was the celebrant at the Holy Communion, assisted by Dean Thomas H. Johnston and the Rev. Thomas Duck. The sermon was preached by the Bishop. At the same time he made a report of his visitations and confirmations since his consecration, which showed that a tremendous amount of work had been done.

Immediately after this service the Council organized for work. A great deal was accomplished on the first day, in hearing reports, completing unfinished business from the last Council and in new work proposed. In the evening the missionary meeting was held. The people were given an account of the stewardship of the Board of Missions, and a vision of the needs of the Diocese in the field. The Board requested an increase of $1,500 in the apportionment for Diocesan Missions. On the following day the Council voted for this increased apportionment to be distributed among the parishes and missions.

The arrangement with the Church Pension Fund, which had been made by the officers of the corporation, was confirmed by the Council. This provides for the transferring to the fund those funds of the Diocese which had been held in trust for Clergy Relief. The Church Pension Fund undertakes to pay out of the income of these trust funds the assessment for the pensioning of the Clergy of the Diocese in parishes and missions, agreeing also to continue the payment of allowances to former beneficiaries of the Diocesan Fund.

The time for the meeting of the next Council was changed so that the Council year will correspond with the fiscal year, which ends December 31. The next Council will meet in All Saints Church, Atlanta, January 22, 1919.

The Council appointed a committee of laymen to raise funds for securing a residence for the Bishop of the Diocese.

The Council accepted the apportionment suggested by the Provincial Board of Religious Education, and ordered it to be assessed against the parishes. The Provincial Field Secretary, the Rev. Gardner Tucker, made a report and addressed the Council on the subject of Religious Education.

The Bishop proposed to the Council the establishment of a Diocesan paper in connection with The Witness, the well known Church paper, which is published at Hobart, Indiana. The Council gave its hearty approval, and all the Clergy agreed to co-operate. The Rev. Randolph R. Claiborne was selected to be editor. It will begin with the May issue. The Woman's Auxiliary also engages to co-operate.

At the missionary meeting on Wednesday evening, the Rev. A. G. Richards read the report; the Rev. H. F. Saumenig spoke on Church Extension in the Dioceses, and the Rev. R. T. Phillips spoke on the LaGrange Settlement Work.

The annual meeting of the Woman's Auxiliary was held on Wednesday, April 17. The Bishop addressed them at nine o'clock, and their corporate communion was with the Council at ten o'clock. Business was then taken up and continued throughout the day. On Thursday morning they had a Corporate Communion and a Quiet Hour.

The attendance was splendid and the meeting enthusiastic. Their purposes during the year had been well carried out. A stirring address by the President, Mrs. C. L. Pettigrew, inspired them to new endeavor. This was echoed in larger financial undertakings, and in their unanimous agreement to co-operate in making the Diocesan paper a message-bearer to every home.

Bishop's Reception For the Council: Thursday evening from eight to ten, the Bishop and Mrs. Mikell gave a reception for the members of the Council and the Woman's Auxiliary. The visitors nearly all remained over in Atlanta to attend.

TENNESSEE.

Rt. Rev. Thos. F. Gallor, D. D., Bishop.

Appeal: The Elizabeth House Social Center at White Bluffs, Tennessee, is a mission of the Church of the Advent, Nashville, Tennessee. The Rev. Prentice A. Pugh is the President of the Board.

Elizabeth House is the center for all moral, cultural, recreational and educational activities of the community. It furnishes the inspiration for higher civic righteousness, a more loyal patriotism and interprets to the community its relation to the world-wide problems of to-day. The school, vocational work, the club activities, and the usual day by day work of the Center are gradually instilling the ideal for social purity and right living.

In order to go further—to really meet adequately the many needs—to do the preventative work which must be done now and to insure the growth of a work which has already proved by results the great need for it, there must be a greater financial support from the Church at large.

The one building has never been finished. It lacks the outside covering and foundation. On the inside upstairs there are only two rooms finished. There is space enough for six more rooms.

The extra room is needed to extend the club work, and in order to save the building it must be finished before another winter.

The three resident workers have been living with only the barest comforts. The house lacks all furniture—except beds and a cooking stove, boxes are made to supply the other needs—household furniture of any kind can be used to advantage.

There is no water supply. The water must be carried from a well two blocks distant. A well is greatly needed.

A sum of one thousand dollars is needed to put the building into livable and workable shape, to provide the elementary comforts in order that the workers and the work may better serve the community and ultimately the larger whole.

All contributions are to be sent to Rev. Prentice A. Pugh, 1202 Seventeenth Avenue South, Nashville, Tennessee.

HARRISBURG.

Rt. Rev. J. H. Darlington, D. D., Bishop.

The indebtedness on St. Mary's Church, Waynesboro, has been paid off in full. Steps are being taken for its consecration in the near future. It is in charge of the Rev. F. A. Cook, who also has charge of the Church of the Transfiguration, Blue Ridge Summit, and Calvary Church, Peartown.

A tablet in memory of Albert Dorwart, son of the Rev. William Dorwart, Archdeacon of Harrisburg, has recently been placed in St. Albert's Church, Duncannon. It is of hard wrought brass, and was given by friends of Albert Dorwart in Virginia, where he spent three months among Indians at Amherst, Va., laboring in the interest of the Church. Albert Dorwart died in the service of the country, in which he had enlisted many months before his death.

The organ in St. James' Church, Lancaster, has been rebuilt and much enlarged, and was used for the first time on Easter, and gave excellent satisfaction. It has seven registers in the pedal organ, twelve in the swell, ten in the great and nine in the choir. It has also a register in the choir room. It is fitted with electric action, and is one of the finest organs in this part of the State.

NEWARK.

Rt. Rev. E. S. Lines, D. D., Bishop.
Rt. Rev. W. R. Stearly, D. D., Coadjutor.

War Dinner at Bonnie Brae Farm.

On April 6 nearly two hundred men and women representatives of a large number of parishes were brought together in Newark for a war dinner by the trustees of the Bonnie Brae Farm for Homeless Boys, that the support of this new undertaking of the Church might be presented. Brief addresses followed the dinner, and then interested laymen in a short time received parochial and individual subscriptions for the coming year amounting to $10,000, to be used in part for the support of the home and part, if deemed advisable, for a new cottage beside the farmhouse, that more boys may be received. It is a home and not an institution, and it has come into existence for boys not likely without it to have a chance in life.

Clerical Changes: Several changes among the Clergy are taking place. The Rev. Waldo A. Amos resigns St. Paul's, Hoboken, to take a very responsible position with the Red Cross Society; the Rev. F. B. Bartlett, of West Hoboken, resigns to go to South Dakota; the Rev. Hugh D. Wilson, of Passaic, resigns to go to Western Colorado; the Rev. George G. Daland, of Bloomfield, resigns to go to New Mexico.

NEW MEXICO.

Rt. Rev. F. B. Howden, D. D., Bishop.

Episcopal Residence for New Mexico.

Bishop Howden, in acknowledging the $3,400 appropriated by the Board of Missions from the undesignated legacies towards the liquidation of the indebtedness upon the Episcopal residence of New Mexico, says that as soon as he is able to secure an additional $500 the Church in New Mexico "will own a Bishop's residence, free from all debt, which from this time forward the Bishop can occupy rent free, and in all probability at no expense to himself for upkeep, insurance, repairs, etc." This fact, he believes, will prove an incentive to New Mexico to go forward in achieving Diocesan status. "Four years ago," he adds, "our endowment assets were considerably less than $100. To-day these assets are about $13,000, so it is encouraging to know that we have made a real beginning."

Is there anyone who will give the last $500 to remove the last vestige of indebtedness from the Bishop's house? New Mexico has already given about $2,500.

The Rev. Christopher Sargent is now in charge of the mission at La Union, N. Mex., where he holds services every two weeks.

The Rev. George Deland, of Bloomfield, N. J., has been called as curate to the rector of El Paso, Tex.

The Rev. H. H. Fay, now an officer in United States army, is stationed at Fort Bliss, Tex.

At Santa Fe, New Mexico, a service flag containing twenty-six stars, has been unfurled.

At Grace Church, Carlsbad, the service flag contains nineteen stars, representing every boy of military age connected with the church there.

The Rev. L. B. Holsapple is now at Camp Cody, Deming, New Mexico, as voluntary chaplain.

Mr. D. E. Hinton, as the Brotherhood of St. Andrew representative at Camp Cody, has been doing effective service among the soldiers since September. At a recent visit by Bishop Howden twenty-two soldiers were admitted into membership of the Brotherhood of St. Andrew.

Chaplain Brander is now in charge of the work at Marfa, Texas, under whom marked material improvements have been made in the church property.

The apportionment for missions has already been met, which fact seems to indicate that the apportionment for the whole missionary district will be met this year.

Christianity and the Community

Thy Kingdom Come on Earth

In this war our attention is apt to be fascinated by the obvious things. We recognize the need of immense numbers of men. We recognize the need of the gigantic mass of war material which must supply these men. We recognize the need of money. We appreciate the power of these things. But there is something mightier still which is not so easy to perceive. It is the power of the idea and of the ideal.

The indispensable service which the churches can render to the nation is in the clearing of our ideas and the uplifting of our ideals. We must help the men and women of America understand that the utmost material effort will be of no avail unless back of it is the power of the sort of loyalty and self-sacrifice which nothing short of divine motives can create.

Take, for example, the spirit of the people in responding to the draft. Take the question of the response to the call for deliberate curtailment of luxuries in order to buy Liberty Bonds. Take the question of saving food. People may be interested in these things for a moment by catchy advertising, but the only thing that can make them respond in a really great way is the consecration of spirit which sees the appeal of a high cause and deliberately subordinates all small self-seeking and self-pleasing to it. Never more wonderfully than to-day has the Christian pulpit had the chance to bring into touch with a living opportunity the supreme Christian message that we find our own life only when we dedicate its actual choices to something bigger than ourselves.

The need of straight thinking and unselfish thinking is well illustrated in connection with the proposal recently made in the United States Senate by Senator P. T. McCumber, of North Dakota, in a bill designed to inaugurate what he calls a universal manhood conscription for the war—a conscription, that is, which would require of those who labor at home the same sort of dependable service as is required of those who fight at the front. Obviously his proposal runs counter to much natural human selfishness, and if the ideal he has in mind is to be reached, it can be done only through the greater power of just the sort of large-visioned unselfishness which Christianity ought to be making real.

In the New York Times Magazine Senator McCumber explains the purpose of his bill as follows:

"I believe the public in this country is already aroused to the point that it would support manhood conscription if it were required as a necessity to win the war. The public believes that every man should fully do his part, and that is what this would accomplish. The public to-day is exasperated because of the failure of some men to bear their part of the burden. We are so afraid of labor that we have not faced this issue squarely. I think that the vast majority of the men who do the actual labor—I do not refer to the leaders—are patriotic and believe that a man ought to perform all the service in him to help win this war.

"The public sees that the principle that every one should do his part is right. If it is right to take a man of draft age and compel him to fight, isn't it right to take his brother who remains at home and compel him to produce the supplies that the soldier brother needs? If the government has the right to say to the soldier, 'You must fight whether you please or not,' it has a right to say to the man remaining at home, 'You work whether you please or not.' Even then, think how much greater is the sacrifice the soldier makes: He risks his life in a zone of constant danger, while the man at home works in a zone of absolute safety.

"Our soldiers are giving up their lives to protect us at home. Think of some of the contrasts we have to that. Millions in this country who are idling, living on others! I have made estimates based on the reports of the last census of those not engaged in gainful employments, and I am convinced there are 6,000,000 men in this country now, between the ages of eighteen and sixty-two, who are doing practically nothing and living off the rest of the community. Many are men who are supported by well-to-do parents. I believe the time has come when no man in this country who is able to work should be permitted to escape from doing his part in this war.

"Think of the contrast between the soldiers who are sacrificing their lives for us over there and the slacking that has been going on among some of the workmen here. The average stint of a riveter in a shipyard is about four hundred rivets a day. In the report of the work done by a gang of twenty-five riveters, I find their average was fifty-one rivets a day. They draw pay of $11.10 a day each for driving a total of 1,277 rivets. It is asserted that, if they had done a normal fair day's work, they would have driven 10,000 rivets. At the standard piece-work rate their earnings would have been about one-fifth of what they received. I do not mean to blame all this on the riveters; lack of management or of organization must be responsible to some extent. But think of such inefficiency when we are so sorely pressed for ships! Slacking in the shipyards has been worse than anywhere else, but conditions are now getting better there.

"There were forty-three strikes in this country between February 15 and March 11, and seventeen of these were strikes affecting ship construction. Think of that at a time like this! We have made an agreement, it is true, to prevent a recurrence of these strikes, but what law is there to prevent the breaking of the agreement? If those men were under government control, as all men in this country should now be, the government could say, 'We are paying you good wages; we expect you to do an honest day's work each day, and you are not going to strike on us.'

"Workmen in some classes are making such high wages now that they earn enough in three days to support them a week, and there are numerous lay-offs of three days a week, because the high pay makes it unnecessary for them to work all the time. A labor report in my possession on work in certain shipyards states that the labor, though liberally paid, is only 50 per cent efficient. In one yard 18,000 were hired during 1917, and only 11,000 have returned to work after working a few days. This is one explanation why we have not turned out more ships.

"Under our present system we are not getting more than 60 per cent of what our man power ought to produce. That lost power may cost us the war unless we change the system. On January 21 I introduced in the Senate and had referred to the Committee on Military Affairs a bill which provides for the use of all our manhood power on a fair basis, not aimed to reach workmen only or a few classes, but every man in the country between the ages of twenty-one and sixty-two years of age. It interferes with no employment or right to contract for labor, but it does subject the whole to the call of the government, to perform such service in transportation, ship construction, and war supplies as the government may require. It was not intended to interfere with present employment and the distribution of labor, except where necessary to promote efficiency in the conduct of the war. The great majority engaged in useful employments for which they are well fitted would remain just where they are; but, as the bill provided, there would rest over all the authority of the government, just as it now rests over the soldiers. In effect, the bill would organize a reserve army of all the manhood of the country to sustain and to support our boys on the battle line."

A Baptist minister in Richmond, Va., made an appeal to his people lately in regard to food conservation which was so vividly put that the daily papers published it prominently. He said that he had just come home from an all-day missionary meeting in the country, and at the dinner spread by the congregation he counted twenty-one hams on the table—besides any amount of other lavishness; and he said he doubted if the entire amount which the congregation gave for missions was equal to the value of what they ate up. The country people, he went on to say, think that because they raise their own food they are free to do with it exactly what they please; and what he pleaded for was just what we all need to learn to-day—the spirit of a new stewardship which regulates our use of everything we have by the thought of the nation's need.

The National Committee on Armenian-Syrian Relief (1 Madison Avenue, New York), is appealing for the gift of Liberty Bonds. The committee can draw drafts against these for the money immediately needed to feed the two and a half million starving people in the East; but the bonds themselves will not be thrown on the market for sale until after the war.

Fourth Sunday After Easter: There is, perhaps, no better illustration to be found of the work of the prophets as the guides and inspiration of their times than is afforded by Haggai and Zechariah. The exiles had returned (some of them, at least) to Palestine with the brightest possible hopes; but there had come difficulties and discouragement and a consequent reaction. Adversaries "weakened the hands of the people of Judah and troubled them in building and hired counsellors against them to frustrate their purpose, all the days of Cyrus, King of Persia, until the reign of Darius." Crops, too, had been poor. They had sowed much and brought in little. The heavens withheld their dew and the earth its fruit and there was a drought. The people said, "It is not the time to build Jehovah's house." Some of the more fortunate ones, however, had managed to scrape together enough to build themselves fine residences, and so Haggai wanted to know whether it was a time to erect ceiled houses to live in? They should "consider their ways." God would be with them as He had been with their forefathers after bringing them out of Egypt and the glory of the latter house should surpass that of the former. The desire, or the desirable things, of all nations should come, amidst a shaking of things in the heavens and on the earth; a passage of which much is made in Hebrews 12, which would not be a bad New Testament correlative, especially in view of the sufferings of God's people. We have selected, however, Revelation 5 with its account of worship in the true Temple above and its ascription of praise to the Lion of the Tribe of Judah who was also the lamb slain from the foundation of the world and alone strong enough to break the seven seals of the Book of Life. There is a further connection between this story of a restored temple and the Easter season in our Lord's use of the analogy to the Temple of His body, saying, "Destroy this Body and in three days I will raise it again": in connection with which should be considered the final destruction of the Temple in A. D. 70 and the Christian Church, the Body of Christ, rising upon its ruins. The whole process by which Judaism passed into Christianity is a working out of Haggai's words about shaking things in heaven and earth. There is also a direct connection with the Collect for this Sunday, in the fixing of the heart where the true joys are to be found amid the manifold changes of the world. The New Testament lesson for the evening, John 16 prophesies the coming and work of the Holy Spirit, and is designed to direct the mind of the Church, after Easter, to the grand climax on Pentecost. For Old Testament Lesson, we have taken Isaiah's prophecy of the true King and of the troublous times that must be until the spirit should be poured out from on high.

The week day lessons continue Zechariah's prophecies, in which are to be found thoughts appropriate to the season, such as God's taking up His abode in Zion and the world conquest, resulting not from Kultur but from the moral power of the indwelling God. The eschatological passages are selected designedly to lead up to Pentecost; the coming of the Spirit, as the Christ returned.

O Almighty God, who alone canst order the unruly wills and affections of sinful men; Grant unto Thy people, that they may love the thing which Thou commandest, and desire that which Thou dost promise; that so among the sundry and manifold changes of the world, our hearts may surely there be fixed, where true joys are to be found; through Jesus Christ our Lord. Sundown.

When the wounded in hospital come to die, says a British officer, their last request, in the great majority of cases, is for the prayer, "Now I lay me down to sleep."

When my sun of life is low,
When the dewy shadows creep,
Say for me before I go,
"Now I lay me down to sleep."

I am at the journey's end,
I have sown and I must reap;
There are no more ways to mend—
"Now I lay me down to sleep."

Nothing more to doubt or dare,
Nothing more to give or keep,
Say for me the children's prayer,
"Now I lay me down to sleep."

Who has learned along the way—
Primrose path or stony steep—
More of wisdom than to say,
"Now I lay me down to sleep."

What have you more wise to tell
When the shadows round me creep?
All is over, all is well—
"Now I lay me down to sleep."

God dwells in the light of joy as well as of purity, and instead of becoming more like Him as we become more miserable, and as all the brightness and glory of life are extinguished, we become more like God as our blessedness becomes more complete.—R. W. Dale.

When.

If I were told that I must die to-morrow,
That the next sun
Which sinks should bear me past all fear and sorrow
For anyone,
All the fight fought, all the short journey through,
What should I do?

I do not think that I should shrink or falter,
But just go on Doing my work, nor change nor seek to alter
Aught that is gone;
But rise and move and love and smile and pray
For one more day.

And, lying down at night for a last sleeping,
Say in that ear
Which hearkens ever: "Lord, within Thy keeping
How should I fear?
And when to-morrow brings Thee nearer still,
Do Thou Thy will."

I might not sleep for awe, but peaceful, tender.
My soul would lie
All the night long; and when the morning splendor
Flushed o'er the sky
I think that I could smile, could calmly say,
"It is His day."

But if a wondrous hand from the blue yonder
Held out a scroll
On which my life was writ, and I with wonder Beheld unroll
To a long century's end its mystic clue,
What should I do?

What could I do, O blessed Guide and Master,
Other than this:
Still to go on as now, not slower, faster,
Nor fear to miss
The road, although so very long it be,
While led by Thee?

Step by step, feeling Thee close beside me,
Although unseen,
Through thorns, through flowers, whether the tempest hide Thee,
Or heavens serene,—
Assured Thy faithfulness cannot betray,
Thy love decay.

I may not know; my God no hand re-vealeth
Thy counsels wise;
Along the path a deepening shadow
stealeth,
No voice replies

To all my questioning thought, the time to tell;
And it is well.

Let me keep on, abiding and unfearing
Thy will always
Through a long century's ripening fruition
Or a short day's;
Thou canst not come too soon; and I can wait
If Thou come late.
—Susan Coolidge.

"Sacrifice, Service and Supplication."

Employees and heads of departments of the Federal Food Administration for Texas, at Houston, were addressed recently by Captain Minifie, of the British Army, who spoke warmly of the response he has found everywhere in America to the conservation program and the needs of the hour. Among other things Captain Minifie said: "Often we hear the words, 'Food will win the war,' and there is a great deal of truth in it. Food will, in a measure, win the war. We must have it, and in order to have it there must be effective units like the one in which you are now serving. In England we have three words that are the sesame of all our acts: Sacrifice, Service and Supplication. We have come to know as you know, and will more and more know, that it is for the individual to do well whatever task is presented; it is no longer what we like as individuals, but where our gifts or our qualifications can be of the greatest value."—Religious Press Bulletin.

The Lesson Learned.

Nancy Byrd Turner.

Anne and Hilda Drury faced the impending calamity—the breaking up of their home—according to their different natures, which were very different indeed. Hilda fluttered and fretted, while the older girl hardened a little, in silence. Their two brothers—Philip, whose going to war was responsible for the change, and John, whose hopelessly bad eyesight bound him, unwilling, at home—felt keenly the unpleasantness in the atmosphere, but bore it, manlike, without comment. When Philip came back from camp for the final family council the little home on Cedar Street was already subtly changed: it was almost as though the house itself sulked over the prospect of being left.

It was only a rented house, to be sure, but they had called it home since the death of their widowed mother. The old farm down-State seemed a far-away place now, and life in bustling, sociable little Seville a matter of course. The Drurys had made strong ties and gathered about them many happy interests when the long, dark arm of war reached out and touched them.

From the beginning of the war Anne and Hilda, eagerly patriotic, threw themselves earnestly into all branches of relief work. Even when Philip enlisted they took his news with good cheer and saw him off bravely. But here was something different. Were their lives to be actually uprooted, the girls asked each other? When John and Phil first broached the subject of returning to the farm they were incredulous. Surely there must be some other way to meet the new conditions. Yet the loss of Philip's substantial salary had to be reckoned with, and there was Grayfield, their own property, and full of possibilities. John had explained the situation over and over to his un-receptive audience. For some reason Clarke, the present tenant could not go on working the place as he had been doing—the girls scarcely listened to details—but if the Drurys themselves moved down, he and Mr. Clark together might manage a few of the crops. If they did not, the Clarks must give place to two brothers who had offered themselves at a rather steep price. The chance to raise stuff now meant a good deal, it seemed. And the furniture from the house in Seville would make Grayfield homelike for the family, while the Clarks would move over to a smaller house on the place. He rehearsed the matter again, patiently.

"But it will be simply burying us alive," protested Hilda, who was not reticent.

Anne roused herself with a visible effort to offer an opinion. She was fair-minded enough to see her brothers' side, but her voice was cold. "You two are the heads of the house," she said.

Philip fidgetted in his new uniform. He wished girls were not so unreasonable. There was poor old John, now, trying to keep down his eagerness—a born farmer, and longing for some outlet for his present restlessness. The young fellow glanced at his sisters appealingly, but Anne's dark eyes were cast down, and Hilda's blue ones were misty, so he looked away.

John, who had been standing at the window, hands in pockets, turned and crossed the room slowly. "Tell you what we'll do," he said, cheerfully. "You girls go down and look and see the lay of the land. If you find things absolutely impossible, why then—I promise you we'll ferret out some other scheme."

A few days later Anne and Hilda left the train at the station nearest their old home and struck out on the well remembered mile to the house. In their letter to the Clarks they had purposely omitted the hour of their arrival—somehow it was easier not to be met. The April afternoon was cold and overcast, with a keen-edged little wind. Hilda shivered in her light furs. She was fastidious, and the muddy roads gave her a kind of acute distress.

"It's different with the boys," she said, reverting suddenly to their grievance. "Phil's off into the thick of things, and John can't hide his hankering for the country. It's we two who have the hard end to stand."

Anne's voice still had an edge like the damp wind. "I can stand anything," she said. "But I can't promise to put any enthusiasm into building up a home in these wilds."

The old farmhouse looked bleak in the afternoon light. The Clarks' cordial welcome did not avail to dissipate the chill that had settled down on the two young hearts. It was evident that the farmer and his wife took it for granted they had come to make arrangements for the move. When Anne stated the real nature of their errand a curious shadow darkened the woman's eyes for an instant, but she made no comment. Anne noticed the look with listless wonder. The two girls responded half-heartedly to Mrs. Clark's invitation to go over the place.

"We'll stroll down to the big gate," Anne forced herself to say, presently. She noticed with surprise how easily the old name slipped from her tongue. Down at the gate, under the huge oak, Hilda turned and surveyed farm lands.

"The fields are gray enough, surely," she said petulantly, "to give the place its name!"

"O, but they'll soon be beautifully green," Mary Clark answered at once. She was a frail, slender little woman, but there was about her a sort of dignity and poise that puzzled Anne, who loved to study human nature.

"I like streets better," Hilda persisted, a catch in her childish voice. "And lights, and the sounds of wheels—" She broke off and was silent.

A look of comprehension came into Mary Clark's face. "You don't want to come home?" she asked, gently.

Anne took quick note of the word. "Home" is Seville, for us," she corrected. "Mrs. Clark, to be frank, we very truly do not want to come back to Grayfield."

Mary Clark turned and looked steadfastly toward the ancient house that showed above the trees. "Is it Grayfield you dread?" she asked, after a short silence, "or is it—change?"

Anne moved restlessly. "O, change, I suppose; we have nothing against the old place. Our occupations and our interests are all altered, our brother has left us for the war, and now—this! You don't understand."

Mary Clark said nothing, and Hilda looked at her quickly. "I believe you want to stay!" she exclaimed.

The other smiled. "Yes, I do," she said, simply.

"If you wanted to stay as much as we hate to come you could not take it so quietly," the girl declared. "How can you be so placid, please?"

Mary Clark did not answer at once. Then, "I am not placid," she said. "I never was that in my life. Only—" She stopped short, as though uncertain how to proceed.

"Give us your recipe," urged Hilda. "Surely we need it." Anne was silent, watching the two curiously.

"Well, you wouldn't call it a recipe," she said, slowly. "It's more like a refrain—two parts of an old prayer. Maybe you know it: something about 'loving the thing that Thou commandest'—"

She hesitated, and there was an awkward pause. Then the rest surged into Anne's well-trained memory. "'And desiring that which Thou dost promise,'" she supplemented, a little diffidently. Truly, she had heard that prayer all her life.

"That's it. I know what you mean by dreading change. I used to rebel outright when my plots and plans were overturned. People said it was all for some good reason, but I couldn't believe that. Then, a big overturning came that dwarfed all the others. Some way, somehow, I learned in my poor fashion to love the 'commanded thing'; and after that I could always see the 'promise' to be desired. I wish I could make it clear, since you ask, but it's easier to feel than to explain."

She turned toward the house, and the girls followed her in silence. There was nothing, indeed, that they could think of to say; Mary Clark seemed, in some inexplicable way, to have overtaken and passed them in the conversation. Their feet still lagged in the old Grayfield loam.

In the half hour before supper they stood at their upstairs window and stared across the darkening land. "Life is a crank-sided affair, isn't it, Anne?" said Hilda. "Now, if she wants all this—"

"She can't have it," Anne broke in, pulling the shade down with a snap. "That is, if her having it depends on our coming down. I have made up my mind. John and Philip will have to think of some other solution for the problem. Listen to the frogs in the marshes—could either of us stand that, year after year?"

"They are dreadful," Hilda agreed. Her face had brightened. "As to Mrs. Clark, she must be exaggerating about wanting to stay. Her chickens and flowers would flourish just as well anywhere else. There! Your decision has actually given me an appetite."

The evening meal was cheery and satisfying. Henry Clark, an elderly man with kindly manners and a ready laugh, was plainly inclined to make the best of his share in the matter. "Tell your brothers," he said, chuckling, "that if my two boys had stayed with me there needn't have been any trouble at all."

Anne glanced up, surprised.

"Your boys?" she questioned. It came over her all at once that she had forgotten much about the tenants at Grayfield, if, indeed, she had ever taken the trouble to know.

"To be sure, Miss Drury. They were off for war with the first bugle, weren't they, Mary?"

The mother's proud face was confirmation enough, and the girls tried to make amends for their ignorance with interested questions.

After the dishes were cleared away Mrs. Clark disappeared. The others sat by the flickering hearth-fire in the old sitting-room.

"She's gone down on the hillside where the children are," the man explained, awkwardly, after awhile. He motioned toward a familiar grassy slope.

"The children?" Anne hesitated.

"The three youngest are buried there," Henry Clark answered. "Died together the epidemic year. Mary carries flowers down this time o' day."

Neither Ann nor Hilda spoke, and he lighted his pipe thoughtfully. "It's those small mounds that makes her going hard," he went on. "I reckon most women are like that. But she can stand it. She's stood me a quarter of a century—me with a bad case of restless bones and roving feet. Every time we'd settle down snugly at a place, something inside would nudge me to move along, and I'd just pull things up by the roots and go. Why, I've even left Grayfield once, and come back." He smoked meditatively for a while. "I don't know any human being," he mused, "that's had as many changes to face as Mary. Yet somehow she faces 'em with a steady heart."

Suddenly Anne was conscious of the thread of old words caught up again . . . that so, among the sundry and manifold changes of the world, our hearts may surely there be fixed. . . . What else was it? Something about true joys. She looked at her sister. Hilda's eyes were fixed on the leaping flames; oddly, they had lost their old expression of discontent.

Mary Clark came in smiling. "The clouds have all broken away," she said, serenely. "It will be clear as crystal in an hour."

The sisters went to bed rather silently; each was busy with her thoughts. Below their light upper crust of selfishness were deeps that had been stirred. Hilda awakened early to see Anne at the east window looking steadfastly out. "I've dreamed all night," the younger girl said. "I thought we were children here again—it was so vivid."

"You laughed in your sleep," the other answered. "Come here, Hilda, and watch the dawn."

They leaned together across the worn sill, while the east deepened slowly from pearl to pink, from pink to radiant rose. When the sun's rim pushed over the hills, the new light picked out clearly, one by one, many an old familiar landmark. Presently all the drab acres were shining bright. The two watched in silence.

"Goldfield, instead of gray," Hilda said at last, under her breath. "O, Anne, maybe we could be happy again here, after all!"

"I've been thinking, most of the night," said Anne, "about many things. John and Phil, and all they've done for us, and then Mrs. Clark—" The girl hesitated; it was hard for her to speak her deepest thoughts. But she went on bravely. "And chiefly of what she said down at the big gate. Hilda, we have been hating the thing that was commanded and turning away from what was promised—don't you see?"

"I know we have," Hilda said, softly. "That was in my mind, too, when I went to sleep. And about the 'sundry and manifold changes' . . . why, every one is meeting changes, now. Maybe it depends on the way you face a change, you see; I don't know exactly how to say it."

"It is easier to feel than to explain," Anne replied, unconsciously echoing Mary Clark.

They had an earnest talk before the breakfast bell rang. Then they ran downstairs hand in hand. "Mr. Clark," Anne called, "may we have a horse to drive to the village? We've had a change of heart overnight, and I want to wire my older brother to come down and arrange for our moving in."

Mary Clark had paused to listen. She held high a vase of early flowers that she had gathered for the table. Suddenly, above the violets, a light came into her eyes that made Anne's heart sing. "And it wasn't shining only for Grayfield and the little graveyard slope," she told Hilda afterward. "Somehow I knew that she was glad for you and me as well."

When Mother Plays.

H. S. G.

Have you ever sat in the twilight
And heard your mother play
The old-time tunes of the long ago,
And the songs of another day?
How her eye with pleasure kindled,
As memories filled her heart!
And the dear hands slightly trembled,
As she played some tender part!

Ah, yes, I have sat in the twilight,
And heard my mother play,
But I was then at the thoughtless age,
And cared for music gay;
I said I disliked the old airs—
Blind not to see her pain!
Till she closed the old piano,
And would never play again.

But now when I sit in the twilight,
The others all away,
I think I'd give my very life
To hear my mother play!
Tho' my heart is aching, yearning,
And the contrite tears arise,
I shall never hear her music,
For she's now in Paradise.

Oh, you who can sit in the twilight
And hear your mother play,
Just beg her for her favorite airs,
Before she is called away!
Say how you love to hear them,
As she plays them o'er and o'er—
Then remorse will never haunt you,
When you cannot hear her more!

To live in the Spirit is the right condition of man, his normal condition; and to live in the Spirit is to live with God—hearing Him, and knowing Him, and loving Him, and delighting to do His will.—Thomas Erskine.

The Child in Church.

Virginia Stanard.

Sometimes in church the sunbeams fall,
Like rainbows through the colored glass,
And creep across the quiet wall,
And slowly to the pulpit pass.
One sets the chancel cross alight,
One hovers on the preacher's hair—
They make me think of halos bright
That saints in pictures wear.

Sometimes in church, when doors are wide
And wafting summer breezes meet,
A little flower that grows outside
Tilts over till it spills its sweet.
A little flower in the sod,
And all its fragrance blowing so!
I think of incense burned to God
By Aaron long ago.

Sometimes in church the organ makes
A roaring that is deep and grand,
And underneath the music shakes
A sound I cannot understand;
A sound like wind in whispering trees,
Like angels' trembling wings—and then,
Slowly I kneel upon my knees
And softly say Amen.

A Dog Police Station.

New York has a police force of dogs. The Police Department has built a station for them out on the Ocean Parkway. Two dozen canine policemen can be accommodated there. A hospital has been built, too, where any dog that is ill can be isolated and treated by veterinary doctors.

In the force there are twelve full-grown police dogs and nine puppies. They are Belgian shepherd dogs for the most part and some of the German shepherd variety. It takes fourteen policemen to train and exercise these dogs. The training is done mostly at night. Every policeman goes out with a dog comrade, and the two patrol the beat together.

The police dog wears a big leather muzzle, which permits it to bark, but not to bite. It is taught to take one side of the street or row of houses, while the policeman takes the other. It learns to search field, hedge and bush where there is open ground and to go into the areaways and back yards of houses. If it finds any one suspicious, it barks to call the policeman. If the suspicious person tries to get away, the dog jumps on him or pens him in a corner. The animals are large and powerful and often travel twenty-five or thirty miles at night in their quest back and forth, in and out during the seven hours of patrol teaching that is given them.

Early this year were many tramps and criminals hanging around the Flatbush section of Brooklyn. Several police dogs were sent out there and started to patrol. They soon rounded up all the loafers and suspicious characters and made the streets as safe as mid-day. One of them chased and arrested a thief who tried to steal a motor car. The dog did not injure the man, but overtook him and held him till the policeman came up and made the arrest. The record of this went on the official file at police headquarters to the dog's credit.

The Mulberry Street police station, however, has a yellow mongrel dog which the patrolmen there would not change for any high-bred foreign dog in the parkway. Seven years ago this dog, half starved, was picked up on the street by a policeman and became the mascot of the station. It has won a "hero dog medal" from the League for Animals by saving the life of a six-year-old girl.

The child was playing in the street one day and ran into the charcoal brazier of a peddler who was selling chestnuts on the curb. The brazier upset, and in an instant the girl's skirt was ablaze. She ran down the street, screaming with terror. The dog heard her cries, ran out into the street after her, knocked her down, and tore the blazing skirt from her body so quickly that she was not injured.

The yellow mongrel, with its medals, is now one of the favorites of the East Side. It is a true and valiant member of the police force and surely deserves to be mentioned with the others.—Barbara Griffiths, in Queen's Gardens.

Tad's Sister.

She was only an ordinary girl with simple frock and a sun-bonnet; and as my mind was busy, I should scarcely have noticed her at all had it not been for the kind words I heard her utter as I was waiting for my tram. "O, well, let's not wait for him!" said one of her two companions, pulling her by the arm.

"Why, I promised him, you know," was the serious reply, "and I couldn't go without him, Sarah."

"Well, he's only your brother. You need not be so particular about keeping your promise to him."

"But I need to be particular about keeping my promise to anybody, my brother just as much as anybody else," Daisy replied firmly, but in the same sweet tone. "I never disappoint Tad if I can help it. He knows it, too, and depends upon me. Mamma says breaking a promise is as bad as telling a lie; and you don't want to do that, you know."

"Well, what is he about? Where is he, anyhow? He ought to be here by this time," remarked the other girl.

"He had to go on an errand for father, but he was to meet me here at two o'clock to go with us to the picnic."

"I'm afraid we'll be late," she grumbled in reply.

"I'm sure we will," said Sarah.

"Then suppose you two go and don't wait for me," Daisy said quietly. "I shall not mind, but I wouldn't go without Tad for anything."

"O, it wouldn't be nice to go without you," Sarah objected.

"Well, here he comes now," cried the other.

And just then a lad of about ten years could be seen hurrying along the street. In a few moments he joined the group, asking anxiously: "I didn't keep you waiting long, did I?"

I looked at Tad. There was nothing about him to attract the attention of a stranger except it might be his bright, happy face; but his sister's eyes rested lovingly upon him as she replied: "No, only a few minutes, Tad."

"There, Daisy," he said; "I brought your waterproof and goloshes. It looks cloudy, and I'm almost sure it will rain before we get home. No, you needn't take them." And he held on to the things he had brought. "I can carry them; I just wanted you to know they were handy."

"O, thank you, Tad," the girl said heartily; "I shall probably need them."

They were starting now; and as Sarah took her place beside Daisy, she remarked wonderingly: "How polite you two are to each other! Are you always like that?"

As they moved off, I caught only a part of Daisy's surprised answer, and that was: "Of course. Why shouldn't we be?"

And the question will bear being repeated, with some addition: Why should not all sisters and brothers be happy in the same love and consideration that Tad and Daisy gave each other?—The Messenger for the Children.

An April Shower.

"Do 'way, Gene; I don't like you," sobbed Jennie, as her little friend went out to the walk to find out why she was crying.

"Why, I like you," was the astonished reply. "What is the matter? Has something hurt you?"

"I tell you, do 'way. I don't like you."

Gene watched her run home and shut the door. "She doesn't like me," she murmured, the tears coming to her eyes. "Mamma," she sobbed, "Jennie doesn't like me any more; I like her."

Mamma tried to comfort the wee girl with the thought that after the shower, which was just commencing, was over Jennie would be her own sunny self again and would like Gene as well as she liked Jennie. "And when the sun comes out again, I am sure you will be playing together," she said.

What ailed Jennie? Her mamma was at first quite as much puzzled as Gene. But between sobs it all came out. Sister Grace had sent her back home before they got to the corner where she took her car, "because there was a shower coming." And it rained tears from Jennie's eyes before the clouds spilled their drops. And then when Gene came out to sympathize, her tears just came faster.

"And I told Gene I didn't like her any more," explained Jennie, again bursting into tears. "And maybe she is crying about it; for she looked so hurt, as she said, 'Why, I like you, Jennie!'"

Just then the sun came out again and the shower was over. "Now," said mamma, "you can run over and tell Gene that you do like her, and that you are sorry you were cross to her."

And a few moments later the robin, which had been singing all through the rain, looked down from the high branch in the maple and saw two little girls in the swing below with their arms around each other, and smiling through their tears.—Bessie L. Putnam, in Christian Advocate.

How John Helped.

John's big brother was a soldier. He went away from home to fight in the army. John was rather small. He could not be a soldier. He was very sorry. He wanted very much to fight for the United States. He said, "I love my country. I want to help to win the war. What can I do?"

John's father was a farmer. He said, "John, the army is very large. There are many, many soldiers. They will need corn, and wheat, and potatoes, and a great many other things to eat. I will give you a small garden, and you can plant some potatoes and take care of them. Perhaps you will have a large crop, and you can send them to the soldiers to eat."

John was glad to think he could help his country. He plowed his garden and planted the potatoes. He watched every day to see them come up. When the plants were small he took very good care of them. After awhile they grew large and strong.

In the fall John had some very fine potatoes. He was proud of them. His father said, "John, I think you will be a good farmer some day."

John was very glad that he had raised the potatoes to feed the soldiers. He felt happy because he had helped his country.—Virginia Guide.

Work.

Work, when done by willing fingers,

Makes the dulllest hours slip by,

Not a listless moment lingers,

There's no time to fret or cry.

Work and sing and then for playtime—
That's the way to spend the daytime.

When our work is finished duly,

Then we'll laugh and skip and run,
Happy just because we truly

Know we've earned our right to fun.

Work and sing and then for playtime—
That's the way to spend the daytime!

"I've Thought of Somebody."

(An old game played in print.)

I've thought of somebody—a man.
He lived in Bible times and was good and great. He had many wonderful experiences, and by God's help he performed many wonderful acts. When very young his life was in great danger, and when very old he died in a lonely spot; but God was always with him. Some of the strange scenes in his life took place:

1. On a river bank.
2. With a flock of sheep on a steep hillside.
3. At a king's court.
4. On the edge of a sea.
5. In a wild land.
6. On a smoking mountain.
7. Before a great rock.
8. The top of a tall height.

Who is the man, and what are those places?

A True Story.

Eugene Blackford Noland; aged 10 years.

Once upon a time I had a little pig. He was as tame as a chicken. If you would scratch him he would lie down and turn over; if you stopped scratching him he would lie there like he was dead.

But in the fall I had to sell him. I did not like to part with him, but father said I had to do it. So the next morning we made a box and put him in it. Then we sold him. I got $23.40, and with my money I bought all my clothes.

A Good Sport.

He lost the game;

No matter for that—

He kept his temper,

He swung his hat

And cheered the winners—

A better way

Than to lose his temper

And win the day.

The Spring Fairy.

The Spring Fairy flopped down on the edge of the robin's nest and burst into tears.

"Stop crying on my eggs," said Mother Robin, crossly. She couldn't help being a little bit cross, because she had been sitting on five eggs all at once for so many days and had got pins and needles in her wings.

You know how you feel when you have to sit still for ever so long without twiddling your fingers or toes while somebody talks and talks, you get pins and needles in your feet, don't you. So Mother Robin said again very crossly:

"Stop crying on my eggs."

"I'm not crying on your silly eggs," said the Spring Fairy, "I wouldn't waste my tears."

That was a funny thing to say, wasn't it? But the Spring Fairy had to be very careful of her tears, they were very precious, each one was a bright sparkling dewdrop, and wherever she let them fall, something started to grow, either a blade of grass, or a tiny seed, or a wee baby tree, so of course she had to be very careful so that there would be enough to go all round.

And then she suddenly remembered that she was wasting them, so she took a little bucket from the pocket of her dress and started to cry into that, and then because it seemed so funny to be crying into a bucket she began to laugh, and that is just like Spring; first she cries and then she laughs, one minute the rain is pouring down and then the very next minute out pops the sun as if to say, "I was only playing, here I am again."

But then the Spring Fairy suddenly remembered that she really had something to cry about, and so she started all over again.

Mother Robin was just going to be quite cross again, when she remembered that the birds and fairies and flowers always help and are kind to each other, so she said:

"Don't cry, dear Spring Fairy, tell me all about it." So the Spring Fairy dried her tears on the backs of her tiny hands, put her little bucket carefully down where it wouldn't spill, and began.

"Well, you know, I've been so very busy for ever so many days getting ready for Spring, the Winter has been so long and the snow blanket so heavy that I've had the biggest bother to wake everyone up, they've been so warm and comfy under the earth.

"Of course, the brooks are never any trouble, they are always awake, and as soon as I unlock the ice doors they jump out and start running and dancing away to the big river and on to the sea. Then I had to unbutton the flowers' coats so that they can just throw them off and be all ready in their new bright frocks for Spring. Oh! and then, my dear Mother Robin, what do you think I found that silly little hedge-sparrow doing? Why, sitting on a cuckoo's egg, and when I told her she was so cross and said, 'Do you think I don't know my own children,' and you know she does the same thing every year (said the Spring Fairy, laughing), and when the cuckoo comes out of it's shell he just pushes the poor little thing right out of her nest and takes it for himself, isn't that silly? So I just had to leave her and go and wake the 'chestnut babies' up.

"My dear, the way those babies are wrapped up is simply awful. First I had to get inside their cradle, which is just hard green wood, and then I found them wrapped round and round in woolly blankets, and then a fine silk sheet, and then underneath all that were the 'chestnut babies,' and the biggest bother I had to wake them, I laughed over them and cried over them, and Mother Chestnut Tree shook and shook them, and at last they opened their sleepy little eyes, and said, 'Is Spring here?' If they weren't so much wrapped up they wouldn't be so hard to waken.

"After that I went to the dormouse, and hedgehog, and to 'Squeegie,' the squirrel. He had eaten all his nuts and was lying fast asleep among the shells and I had a fearful bother with him, too, I prodded him and poked him and sang to him and at last he opened one sleepy one and said, 'Is Spring here?' So you can just imagine how tired I am, but, oh, dear! I haven't told you the most dreadful thing of all, it's just terrible.

"I was all ready to fly back to Fairyland and tell our Queen that everything was ready for Spring when I thought I would just take a last peep at the daffodils and violets, and when I unbuttoned their green coats and looked inside, I found the most terrible thing had happened, someone had painted the daffodils a bright blue and the violets a bright green. Fancy blue daffodils and green violets. Oh, dear! Oh, dear!" and here the Spring Fairy began to cry again.

"Well," said Mother Robin, "I don't see that it matters what color they are so long as their frocks are nice and clean."

"Oh!" said the Spring Fairy, "whatever would the children say if they found a blue daffodil, why they wouldn't know it, and just suppose a little girl went into her garden and found a green violet, why she'd just cry her eyes out, and besides, whatever will the Fairy Queen say, I daren't go home and tell her," and she picked up her little bucket and started to cry into it just as hard as ever.

"Oh! please, please, do stop," said poor little Mother Robin, "you're making me quite damp, and besides you're wasting time, just go right back to Fairyland, and tell the Fairy Queen and then perhaps she will think of something to do."

So the Spring Fairy dried her eyes once more, kissed Mother Robin good-bye, took up her precious little pail of tears and flew straight back to Fairyland.

Now, when the Fairy Queen heard the sad story she called all the fairies together, but none of them knew anything about it.

"Well, said the Fairy Queen, "it must have been a 'pixie.'" The "pixies" are very naughty little elves who are always up to mischief.

"There is nothing to be done but to paint them all over again, and we'll just have to get the very best gold and the very best violet paint we can find."

So some of the fairies had to fly all the way to "Sunset Land" and get some of the beautiful gold that you see in the sky when the sun is setting, and others had to go right to the edge of the rainbow and steal a little of the violet and then they had to sit up all night long and paint the daffodils and violets all over again, and even then there wasn't quite enough gold to finish the daffodils, and so "if you look at the 'daffys' in your garden, you will see they are just a little bit green down at the bottom of their petals near the stalk, and that is because there wasn't quite enough gold paint to cover up the blue."—Canadian Churchman.

The Conductorette.

By G. M. Aire.

An Amsterdam Avenue car stopped at Seventy-ninth Street and three noisy young fellows in civilian dress got on. From the moment of their entrance it was quite evident that they were bent on making the little woman in the conductor's chair feel uncomfortable. An excuse for finding fault with her was taken by one of them immediately when the car started with a sudden lurch that seated all three of them unexpectedly.

"It's a wonder you wouldn't learn something!" he flung at her.

"She didn't jerk us," another corrected; "but," he added, "she's no business in a man's place, so she hasn't."

"Of course she hasn't," agreed the third.

"Why don't you go back to your own business? You've got no right to be taking a good man's place in here," the one who had first spoken snarled at her.

Not one word in reply had she made; but "a good man's place" roused her. "Did you say that I am taking a good man's place?" she asked, directing herself to the last speaker.

"Yes, I did say just that," he retorted. "You're doing some good man out of his job." He was quite proud of himself.

Her cheeks were flaming, but she answered him, quietly: "All the good men are in khaki."

At Eighty-seventh Street three silent young fellows left the car. A short ride had given them their money's worth.—The Outlook.

The Faithfulness of God.

One thing I do believe—more surely than the evidences of the senses, for they may be imposed upon—more surely than those self-evident axioms upon which mathematical truth is built, for these axioms are only spun out of the human mind, and are not external to it. I do believe that God is true. I do believe that whenever God makes a promise, He will assuredly fulfil it. I do believe that if you or I come under the terms of the promise, He will fulfil it to us.—Dean Goulburn.

Consciousness of Immortality.

Man's life seems to die out in death; to him that overcometh the world there shall be given a vitality that goes beyond this world. It is in virtue of man's power to overcome this world that he lays hold upon immortality. The reason why man in spite of every discouragement, in spite of disease, and death, and the grave, has so inextinguishable a belief in immortality of life, is the mastery which he has had over this life. If all men had been slaves of circumstances, mankind never could have believed in immortality. It is because man has proved his power to conquer circumstances that he has believed ultimately in his power to conquer that last great circumstance, and believed that death was nothing but an event, an experience in life. To him that overcometh it is given to eat of the tree of life, and to know himself immortal.—Phillips Brooks.

Once again men chosen under the selective draft law are coming in large numbers to Camp Lee. In order that the churches in Petersburg may get in touch with newly arrived Churchmen, I most earnestly request rectors of parishes to send me the names and regimental addresses of men coming to Camp Lee from their parishes. Names are useless without company and regiment. Brethren, please act on this request before you forget it.

RESOLUTIONS.

At a meeting of the Executive Committee of the Tidewater Assembly, Brotherhood of St. Andrew, held in Norfolk on April 8, the following resolutions were adopted:

Whereas, our honored Bishop and beloved friend, lit. Rev. A. M. Randolph, D. D., LL. D., D. C. L., has been called from our midst into the fellowship of the Church Invisible, upheld and strengthened by the testimony of a good conscience, in the Communion of the Catholic Church, in the confidence of a certain faith, in the comfort of a reasonable, religious and holy hope, and in perfect charity with the world.

Resolved, first, That in the death of this faithful servant of the Church, who for twenty-five years has presided over this Diocese as Bishop, with rare fidelity and zeal, the Brotherhood has sustained a real loss, the Church at large, a wise and honest counsellor, the community a pure-minded citizen, and the world a true Christian gentleman.

Second, That we, the Brotherhood of St. Andrew in the Diocese of Southern Virginia, tender to his family the assurance of our earnest and sincere sympathy.

Third, That this record of our respect and affection be spread upon the minutes of the Tidewater Assembly, and that a copy of the same be sent to the family of the deceased, also to the daily papers and Church papers.

"CHARLES JARED INGERSOLL"

Whereas, it pleased Almighty God on March 25 to take to himself at the ripe age of eighty years, our beloved friend and associate, Dr. Charles Jared Ingersoll, be it resolved, That we, the vestry of Walker's parish, Albemarle County, Va., place upon our permanent records an expression of the great grief and loss brought to us by this dispensation.

For fourteen years Dr. Ingersoll has aided by wise counsel and generous gifts in carrying forward the work of our Church. As a vestryman he was conspicuously active. The massive stone wall, two hundred yards in length fronting the church grounds, the entrance way and iron gates were all made possible through his efforts. He co-operated in every undertaking either as leader or follower. His bearing among us was one of supreme gentleness and sympathy. In the community also he made his life and his home stand for things that mean the building up of the Kingdom of God.

The Church loses in him a true, strong and loving friend, but we comfort ourselves as we remember that though to live is to bring forth fruit in good work, yet to die is gain, and to depart and be with Christ is far better; for as we believe that Jesus died and rose again, even so them also that are fallen asleep in Jesus will God bring with Him.

It is resolved that a copy of this minute, bearing testimony to our departed fellow-laborer, be sent to the bereaved family, and also to the Southern Churchman for publication.

Signed,

F. L. Robinson, Rector.

BISHOP RANDOLPH.

Whereas, it has pleased Almighty God to call into the life beyond our beloved Bishop, Rt. Rev. Alfred Magill Randolph, D. D., LL. D., D. C. L.

And whereas, for more than twenty-five years he had gone throughout our Diocese a veritable tower of strength; in the pulpit, a man of power; in counsel wise and just; in life beautiful and inspiring. One said of him the other day, "I seemed to see the divine through him."

And whereas, this parish was named for him in token of love and honor for him.

Be it resolved by the vestry of Randolph parish in regular meeting assembled, That we bow in loving submission to the will of God, and praise His Holy Name for having granted us so rich a blessing in the gift of Bishop Randolph. Resolved further, That this testimonial be spread upon the minutes of the vestry; that a copy be sent to the Southern Churchman and a copy sent to the family of the beloved Bishop.

WEST TEXAS.

Rt. Rev. Wm. T. Capers, D. D., Bishop.

The fourteenth Annual Council of the Diocese of West Texas will be held in Grace Church, Cuero, Texas, on Wednesday, May 22, instead of on Wednesday, May 8, as has been announced. PITTSBURGH.

Rt. Rev. C. Whitehead, D. D., Bishop.

A Patriotic Service: On Sunday evening, April 7, a rather unique patriotic service took place at Calvary Church, Pittsburgh, in commemoration of the end of the first year's participation of the United States in the world's war. The rector, the Rev. E. J. Van Etten made an address suitable to the occasion, and this was preceded and followed by processions, composed of the Boys' Choir, the Girls' Choir, the teachers of the Red Cross work, and the Red Cross workers of the parish, all suitably attired in their distinctive costume.

The church was decorated with the flags of the Allies, and the national flag, the State flag and the banner of the city were carried at the head of the procession, which marched to the music of trumpet and drum. Two gold stars were added to the parish service flag, which now contains one hundred and forty-five names. As part of the service, a bronze memorial tablet was unveiled in the corridor connecting the church and parish house, which bore the following inscription:

In memory of James Pettigrew Waddell, corporal Company M, Three Hundred and Twentieth Regiment, aged twenty-two years, who died in the service of his country at Camp Lee, Va., January 4, 1918. He being the first from Calvary parish in the world war to pass into the presence of his Lord. Erected to his memory by the choristers of Calvary Church. Both gold stars on the service flag are in memory of boys who were members of the choir and the Sunday-school.

BETHLEHEM.

Rt. Rev. Ethelbert Tabbot, D. D., Bishop.

At Trinity Church, Pottsville, the Rev. Howard W. Diller, rector, action has been inaugurated to have the charter amended. Under the present charter only pew-holders are entitled to vote. It is now proposed to give the vote to all adult baptized members of the parish who have been worshippers in the congregation for a period of one year and who have contributed regularly to the support of the parish by pew-rent or otherwise for two years. It is felt that this will make the parish a more democratic institution.

The total Easter offering of Trinity Church amounted to $1,391.42.

The Rev. W. H. Ziegler, vicar of All Saints' Church, Lehigh, who had determined to accept the charge of Grace Church, Dorranceton, has acceded to the urgent requests of his parishioners and decided to remain at Lehigh.

Lieutenant W. J. Beach, son of the Rev. W. B. Beach, rector of the Church of the Good Shepherd, Scranton, and a candidate for Holy Orders, is serving with the One Hundred and Sixty-sixth Depot Brigade, Infantry, at Camp Lewis, American Lake, Washington.

NEW JERSEY.

Rt. Rev. Paul Matthews, D. D., Bishop.

Sunday-school Annual Convention.

The annual Sunday-school Convention of the Diocese of New Jersey was held in Christ Church, the Pro-Cathedral, Trenton, on Saturday, April 20. The Bishop of the Diocese officiated at noonday prayers and the afternoon service. The Archdeacon presided at business sessions. The Rev. Thomas A. Conover, of Bernardsville, was Secretary.

The attendance was larger than at any previous convention, over three hundred delegates, representing approximately seventy-five schools.

A conference for superintendents was conducted by the Rev. Stewart U. Mitman, Secretary of the Third Province and editor of the American Sunday-school Magazine. Other conferences were conducted by Mrs. Loman, of Philadelphia, for primary teachers, and the Rev. Thomas A. Hyde, of Jersey City, for junior and senior teachers. The address at the presentation service in the afternoon was by the Rev. Phillips E. Osgood, of Philadelphia. Mr. William S. F. Pierce, Treasurer of the Diocesan Sunday-school Fund, announced the amount of the offering, which was $5,335.28. This is larger than the offering of last year, with further remittances yet expected.

Chaplains and the Depleted Ministry.

Congress having finally passed the measure increasing the number of army chaplains to one for each 1,200 enlisted men, about eight hundred additional ministers will be named as chaplains almost at once. About ten times that number of applications are in hand, so it is fairly idle for additional ones to be filed. The new measure was backed by both Protestant and Roman Catholics, and in the appointments of new chaplains co-operation will be had at all points between these bodies. Of the new men to be named about three hundred and fifty will be Romanists, four hundred and fifty Protestants, depending in some measure upon the applicants and their standing. It is likely that the number of Romanists will not be quite so large, for enlisted men to be supplied are coming in largest numbers from the rural districts of the Middle West and South, and are in greatest proportion Protestants.

With the additional draining of ministers, all Protestant bodies are starting new drives to get men to take their places. The outlook for additional ministers to serve churches is not promising. Many young men in college and seminary are being called in the draft or are enlisting, and the future holds out small promise of larger numbers. So far as can be learned, all that is being done is to enlist and train educated laymen to serve. This has been the course followed in England and Scotland. There training schools have been founded, and the same plan is likely to be followed here. It is declared that only by laymen taking hold can church doors be kept open.

The Title to Be Desired.

L. S. Marye.

The desire of fame is an instinctive feeling with every generous soul. There is no one of a noble nature who does not have a desire to be remembered, and remembered with honor, by succeeding generations after he has passed from the scene of existence and gone to "the undiscovered country from whose bourn no traveler returns."

This is a laudable and not an ignoble ambition; but how few realize it, how few even of the most eminent and illustrious.

"That largest son of time
Who wandered singing through a listening world,
Will be as much forgot as the canoe
That crossed the bosom of a lonely lake
A thousand years ago."

But though we be denied the glory of fame, we may each so act our part as to be remembered as an honest and upright man.

Macaulay in his Essay on Warren Hastings says that Hastings had as ruler of India so borne himself that all had feared him, that most had loved him, and that hatred itself could deny him no title to glory except virtue. What an exception. It is the rose without its fragrance, the violet without its blue.

We may all so live that though we be denied a title to fame, we may have a higher title to keep our memories green, namely, the title to virtue.

Love virtue, she alone is free,
She can teach you how to climb
Higher than the spherey chime;
Or if virtue feeble were
Heaven itself would stoop to her.

The gospels nowhere describe Christ's character. They nowhere tell us that he was dignified under insult, calm before opposition, submissive under suffering, indignant at the sight of hypocrisy, sympathetic with sorrow. These characteristics are manifested by him, but never affirmed of him. They appear only in his words and acts. The writers of the first three gospels make no attempt at delineation; they are apparently quite unconscious that they are giving to the world a portrait; they make Christ speak and act before us, and we form our judgment of His character independently, as if we had seen and heard Him ourselves. Whatever feeling may spring from reading the gospels, they are never the result of sympathy with the writers. One could not be sure, judging simply from their style, that the synoptic evangelists were not indifferent spectators of what they recorded. There is no writing for effect, no exhibition of their own opinions, but an unadorned narrative which simply recounts the words and works of Christ. From these we get a distinct conception of this divine-human character.—Josiah Strong.

Our Christ.

I know not how that Bethlehem's Babe
Could in the Godhead be;
I only know the Manger-Child
Has brought God's Life to me.

I know not how that Calvary's Cross
A world from sin could free;
I only know its matchless Love
Has brought God's Love to me.

I know not how that Joseph's Tomb
Could solve Death's Mystery;
I know there is a Living Christ,
Our Immortality.

—Harry Webb Farrington.

Thoughts For the Thoughtful

The lights of the world are stars and rockets.—Ex.

Broken vessels are most likely to be filled with blessing.—Ex.

Nothing is more perilous than popularity. Nothing is so unstable. And yet we cultivate the "avarice of praise."

If we are going to sit together in heavenly places, we had better begin to stand together in the earthly ones.—Ex.

There is no worse fate possible for a man in this life than to be compelled to live with a self that he does not respect.—Ex.

There is that in a man which leads him to crave notice from his fellows, even if it be only the compliment of an obituary notice.—Ex.

If you have the approval of your own conscience in doing work among the lowly and the neglected and the inappreciative, and to that is added the "smile of the Lord," what more do you want?

The poor man looked to Jesus Christ to heal his palsied limb; Jesus said to him, "Son, be of good cheer; thy sins be forgiven thee." So it may be that when we come to Him to dispel our doubts, He first addresses Himself to heal our sins.—Newbolt.

Look where we may, within or without the Church; review as best we can the crystallization of various tendencies of thought and action, they point to one great need: a Church so secured in God, in the Risen Christ and in religious history and experience, as to be capable of common life, common assertion, common control.—Rev. S. P. Cadman.

"Self is the only prison

That can ever bind the soul;

Love is the only angel

Who can bid the gates unroll;

And when He comes to call thee,

Arise and follow fast;

His way may lie through darkness,

But it leads to light at last."

It is a voice of power, which must attract the most careless, "Be of good cheer, I have overcome the world." And we look up and lo! it is the voice of "a Man of Sorrows and acquainted with grief." It is the royal message from a King who reigns from the throne of the cross.—Selected.

God is a refuge for every poor sinner who will flee to Him. But the fleeing is our part. We are free men and women, and God will not drive us into the kingdom. He will give us visions of the beauty of it, He will show us His own sympathy and love, and fling wide open the doors to the city of refuge; but unless we rise up and seek the refuge we shall perish outside.—L. A. Banks.

The same thing will appeal differently to different people according to capacity, sensibility, experience. One may look on a flower with the eye of a florist, another of a market gardener, another of a botanist, another of an artist. A scene which is dull and uninteresting to the listless eye may be transformed by a touch of creative and interpretative imagination; as James Swetham says, "Gerhard Dow threw a glory over our very pickled cabbage." Culture and restraint.—Hugh Black.

Coleridge's "botanical garden" is well known to readers of his works. "Thel-wall," he says, "thought it very unfair to influence a child's mind by inculcating any opinions before it should come to years of discretion and be able to choose for itself. I showed him my garden, and told him it was my botanical garden. 'How so,' said he; 'it is covered with weeds.' 'Oh!' I replied, 'that is only because it has not yet come to years of discretion and choice. The weeds you see have taken the liberty to grow, and I thought it unfair of me to prejudice the soil towards roses and strawberries."—Selected.

It is the all-pervading presence of God that makes life bearable to the Christian, and the one thing which makes the Christian life possible. If God were not in your place of business your hearts would grow as hard as nails. If God were not in your homes your sweetest affections would become stale and sour. If God were not in your places of temptation you would never enter them without falling. If the Spirit of God did not visit you in the thronging streets and the giddy world, you would degenerate into coarse worldliness. If He were not painting Himself afresh on your minds and hearts everywhere you would lose all sense of His beauty. If He were absent from your scenes of sorrow, if you did not feel His hand holding yours in hours of pain, and by the deathbed-side, you would be overcome with fear or die of heartbreak. We live because He lives everywhere.—Selected.

If it be true that Jesus Christ's death on the cross has brought salvation to all the world then it is quite plain that, His work being finished, we have no need to come in pottering with any works of ours, and that the only thing we have to do is to accept it. If it is true that Jesus Christ will enter men's hearts, and there give a new spirit and a new life, which will save them from their sins and make them free from the law of sin and death, then it is plain that the one thing that we have to do is to open our hearts and say, "Come in Thou King of Glory, come in!" Because salvation is a gift; because it is the result of a finished work; because it is imparted to men by the impartation of Christ's own life to them, for all these reasons it is plain that the only way by which God can save a man is by that man's putting his trust in Jesus Christ. It is no arbitrary appointment. The only possible way of possessing "the common salvation" is by the exercise of "the common faith."—A. Maclaren.

The Divine Goad.

Doctor Brown smiled gently as he heard the boy talk. "Did you ever hear," he asked, "of the woman who meant to take a dose of quinine, but swallowed a large dose of morphine instead? Her appearance soon became so alarming that a physician was called. He tried to rouse her from the lethargy in which she lay.

"If only I could go to sleep, I'd be all right," she drowsily insisted.

"Unless she is roused, she will die," the physician answered—which is an allegory. How often in life we face the same danger! We cry, "I want life to be easier!" "If only I didn't have this unending financial strain!" "If only I were not compelled to work so doggedly!" "If only I were relieved of this anxiety and that burden!" which is our way of saying, "If only I could sleep, I'd be all right!"

"But the Great Physician sees our need more clearly. Sometimes the doing of the thing so hard to do is exactly the thing upon which the life of our souls depend. The nerve-racking strain is given us. The heavy burden is laid upon our shoulders. The difficult task confronts us. The Physician plies us with the goad of necessity. We face the hard task only because we must. We plod on our hard way, and slowly, instead of lethargy and torpor, energy is ours. Slowly our eyes open to a new understanding of the meaning of life. Our souls are awakened and we really live. The Great Physician has saved us."—The Youth's Companion.

Shadows.

The shadow cast over the earth is because clouds pass over the sun. The sun shines in spite of clouds. Even so in human life the shadows we often see we put there ourselves, but in spite of the shadows the light of God's countenance shines about us with healing in its wings. The darkest cloud in human life has a silver lining put there by God's gracious hand. There is light around the cross; just look that way. What a comfort to know that "unto the upright there ariseth light in darkness!" What an easy matter for the sun in the heavens to scatter the darkest clouds, and what an easy matter for God to throw light gleams into the darkest experiences of life! At His bidding the clouds that may fleck your moral sky must recede and float away when God says: "Let there be light." If the clouds do not always flee, then God transfigures the clouds with supernal glory. O the wonder of God's grace! How marvelously it makes "all things," even the most untoward, work together for one's good.—Exchange.

The words and laws of Christ, which do not change, and cannot fail, must not be left in the dead print of closed and dusty Bibles or in the sermons of preachers, or the hymns of choirs and congregations. They must be faced and accepted and worked out into the warp and woof of daily life by every one of us who bears Christ's name.—Bishop Rhinelander.

The first three essays, set forth in logical sequence the arguments for a belief in personal immortality. The next three deal with the nature of the after-life and discuss the meaning and value for modern thought of conceptions like Resurrection, Judgment, Heaven and Hell. The others deal with the elements of truth and error in Spiritualism, Reincarnation and Theosophy while the final one forms and epilogue to the collection.

Ascension.

Perhaps one of the results of the world war will be a wider and wiser appreciation of the lessons of Ascension Day, which has been a rather neglected festival in the past. For, the war, with its enormous destruction of young lives on this earth, is making us ponder more anxiously what it is that we mean—or should mean—by the life beyond.

True, we cannot possibly ascertain or comprehend its details. But we can at least rid ourselves of mere carnal notions, and also of mere gaseous notions, about it.

We are prone to think of our Lord's resurrection as a return to His former fleshly conditions—because it was a bodily resurrection.

Or, rejecting that error, we are in danger of thinking His resurrection is merely a phrase for some proof of His continued existence as a soul. And to our minds there is something unsubstantial in this; we cannot conceive of a formless personality.

But if we will only take the Gospel stories of the appearances of the risen Christ—just as they stand—we shall see that He had entered another kind of life, but had entered upon it in His complete humanity. He has a body; but it is a spiritual body. It comes from His physical body; it is the blossom from that seed; and it is to lead the existence of a blossom not of a seed—as it were, in the free air, not in the dark and constricting mould.

It is quite evident from the evangelic record that the Ascension of Jesus—His passing into the realm and activity of the celestial world—was the natural, inevitable concomitant of His Resurrection. Indeed, it may be justly asserted that the Resurrection was the Ascension.

Only, for purposes of manifestance, the Risen Lord deferred the event which announced and symbolized His new life, until His disciples should have had ample proof that it was indeed He Himself whom they met and saw and listened to during the forty days after Easter.

It was what we call miraculous when human eyes beheld Him and human hands touched Him in those days.

And it did not indicate the sort of existence and operation which they who are henceforth raised from the dead are to have.

Ascension Day proclaims that it is the same Jesus who now lives, but that He lives a different life. It is a life whose manner we cannot now understand. The disciples saw Him and knew Him, and then "a cloud received Him out of their sight." It was a cloud of glory; nevertheless it veils.

We know that He has gone to prepare a place for His faithful servants, that where He is they may be also.

Which means that the human life beyond the grave will not be a mere continuance and duplication of the human life here, but will be a larger, freer, more glorious power and joy. But it will be the life of the person who once lived here.

That is the teaching of Ascension Day.—The Palm Branch.

The obtuseness of the body always disinherits the soul. For when the body usurps dominion the freedom of the spirit is impaired. The soul is like an eagle which is confined to the barnyard when he was made to wing his flight through vast reaches of the upper air. The soul is imprisoned in the inch instead of journeying in the infinite. The spiritual powers, which were intended to explore the secrets of God, move on the surface of things. And so it comes to pass that, being straitened in ourselves, the grace of God is straitened. God has no large, open medium through which to pour His holy power. And because of lack of power we cannot hurl iniquities from their thrones. We see the evil tyranny, but we cannot move it! We command it to go, but it laughs in our faces! "This kind goeth not out but by prayer and fasting."—J. H. Jowett.

The Divine energy which braces the mind and heart for noble deeds; the peace which results from perfect reconciliation to God; the consolation imparted to the soul by His Spirit—these are the open secrets of religion. They are open and clear as day light. But from the unbelieving, from the proud, from the worldly, and from the disobedient they are concealed. Being unfelt they must be unknown, for they are revealed to the heart rather than to the intellect.—T. Jones.

THE POWER OF THE PULPIT.

It has been said again and again by wiseacres of limited outlook that the preacher's day is past. In this age of intellectual activity and wide diffusion of knowledge, when men can read far better sermons at their firesides, if their taste in reading runs that way, than they can hear in their churches, and since their notions of religion have become so much wider and more practical, it is no longer to be expected that the influence of the pulpit should be what it was in former times. The people are no longer dependent upon it for instruction and guidance as they used to be before the days of sociology and liberalism and theosophy and the Sunday newspaper. So it is said and so many have come to believe: but the facts in the case do not bear out this assumption, in spite of all the arguments brought to show that it ought to be true.

A few Sundays ago the Rev. Dr. John Henry Jowett, of the Fifth Avenue Presbyterian Church, New York, delivered his farewell sermon to a congregation to which he had preached a very simple gospel with a singularly persuasive power for seven years. In point of popular attendance, we are told, all American records have been broken throughout his ministry there. One thinks of Beecher and Talmadge, pioneers in sensationalism, and of the wonderful oratory and spiritual power of Phillips Brooks, and wonders if it be true. But we are assured that none of these had a church seating as many as the Fifth Avenue, and that here it was no uncommon thing but rather the rule for from one to three thousand persons to be turned away, and that frequently the house would be packed and the doors ordered closed an hour before the time for the service to begin.

It is easy to find superficial explanations for this exceptional case. Dr. Jowett is, of course, in many respects an unusually gifted man and one who has practically devoted himself to the ministry of preaching. His reputation has gone abroad from such an influential center and his congregations were composed largely of visitors to New York from all parts of the country. All of which may be granted and yet not alter the fact that this talented man found in his office of preacher room for the development and exercise of all his intellectual and spiritual powers, and that by his simple and unadorned preaching and the power of the message which he brought he gained the ear and the assenting heart and conscience of multitudes quite as large as those which in past generations hung upon the words of the great preachers of their day.

And when these factors of unusual talent, a widespread reputation, and an unnumbered constituency to draw from are taken into account, the case of Dr. Jowett is seen to be striking rather than exceptional. Everywhere there are preachers with but ordinary natural gifts, who are almost unknown outside their little communities to which visitors rarely come, who preach Sunday after Sunday to congregations proportionally larger than those that have crowded the broad spaces of the Fifth Avenue Church. Men who are without the great preacher's exuberant imagination, keen insight and ready flow of language, who have never known the inspiration of a great audience, who are awkward, who are overworked, who are slow of speech, yes, who are positively dull and uninteresting except to those who love them, still gain and hold their regular, not transient or occasional, congregations of hearers far larger, all things being taken into account, than those which have crowded to hear the more unusual preachers of our own or of other times whose popularity has been considered phenomenal. Great preachers arise from time to time and deliver the message God has given them and pass away, but the power of preaching, the influence of the Christian pulpit, the readiness to hear the gospel spoken by the lips of men, does not and will not pass away. The fashion of the world's thought, and to some extent of the Church's thought, changes as other fashions change. Ideas and fads, methods and expedients, come and go with each generation. But the great facts of religious experience and the great needs of the human soul remain the same. They were perfectly known to Him who made it the primary charge and the essential duty of His ministers from the Apostles down that they should be preachers of His gospel. The power of their mission He lodged in the word itself rather than in the ability or the personality of the preacher, but the Holy Spirit is able to use both for the furtherance of His gracious purposes. The humblest preacher, therefore, if so be that with singleness of mind and with his utmost of prayerful preparation he approaches his sacred task, may be assured that he will not lack a hearing and that his words shall not be without power.

Most unhappily there has been a tendency in our own Church in the recent past to speak slightly of preaching and to deprecate the value of the sermon as compared with other parts of the Church's ministrations. And strange to say, this sadly mistaken view is insisted upon by the Clergy of a certain type rather than by the laity, whose instincts, perhaps, are more to be trusted. We have heard and seen it asserted with tiresome reiteration that the purpose of church-going is to worship and not to hear sermons; which is as sensible as to assert that the purpose of breathing is respiration and not inspiration. "We know what we worship" is the ideal, or, as the Revised Version has it, "We worship that which we know." The worship of God waits upon the knowledge of God. The deepest craving of the Christian soul is to "know Whom I have believed"; and it is pre-eminently the province of the prophet, that is, of the preacher, to interpret God to the spiritual apprehension of His worshippers, that they may "worship Him in spirit and in truth." That the element of worship is somewhat slighted as we suppose by some of our Christian brethren in their assemblies is no reason why we should slight the preaching of the word. And because the very honorable and worthy title of "preacher" is popularly given to their ministers is no reason that our own should scornfully repudiate it while insisting upon the ambiguous and, in its popular meaning, the far weaker and less significant designation of "priest."

Nay; let those who are sent to preach the gospel magnify their office, not by vaunting themselves in it but by making full proof of their ministry therein, and though the world in its wisdom shall think scorn of its effectiveness the hearts of sincere men will still make response and the Spirit of God will yet be found making use of His ancient and chosen weapon. The tremendous, unestimated and inestimable power of the Christian pulpit has not passed, and will not pass so long as a true preacher stands there with a message from God upon his lips and the fire of God burning in his heart.

Rogation Days. We must not fail this year to offer with especial faith and sincerity our Rogation-tide prayers. Certainly the season has a meaning at this momentous time which in the days of our superabundance and careless wastefulness it may have seemed to lack. When our supplies were more than we could use and prices too low to recompense the farmer for his toil, and when in case of failure of our own crops the resources of the world were put at our command by our great systems of transportation, it seemed to our self-sufficiency an almost superfluous thing to ask importunately for that of which we thought ourselves assured. It is very different to-day. The smiling earth has not refused to yield her increase nor the vast highways of the seas to bear our commerce, yet all human prevision is found at fault. In perhaps the most momentous crisis in the world's history men's faces blanch with apprehension as they view the narrow margin between the supply of available foodstuffs and the point of starvation for thousands and the breaking down of the defenses of human rights and liberties. If our harvests should fail this year, fail of an abundance far beyond our own necessities, it would entail consequences of incalculable disaster so far as our foresight can discern. The issue is too great to be left to an insensate aggregation of so-called laws and forces which men call nature. To that reasonable Power and Goodwill which is in nature and above nature, to the God of lovingkindness we will make our plea, with a deepened consciousness of our dependence upon His bounty and of our past folly in trusting so complacently to the abundance of our resources or our possessions.

Suppose we want to be good; truthful, pure in heart, single in purpose, Christlike in temper. Are these wrought in us on the instant? No, you and I know it is not so. We know that each morning we wake to a two-fold fight, with the world outside and with the self within. God help us if patience fail. God help us if there be not something within which keeps firm hold of the exceeding great and precious promises: which will not suffer faith to fail, that He that hath begun a good work will perfect it; which will not be disheartened at slow progress and which keeps our faces turned towards the place where the crown and glory are.—M. R. Vincent.

PATRIOTISM IN SUNDAY-SCHOOLS.

Mr. Editor: Several weeks ago you referred in an editorial to the puzzling situation which confronted both scholar and teacher when they are urged to give their funds to missions, and at the same time to conserve their funds to purchase Thrift Stamps. We have partly solved that matter in our Sunday-school. Every class has a Thrift Stamp card; with their offerings stamps are purchased and inserted in the card, then at the end of Lent the cards, together with the contents of the mite boxes, were given to the missionary work of the Church. I have no doubt that the Board of Missions would be willing to accept these stamp cards all filled out, but we had some one in the congregation to buy them from the Sunday-school at their face value, and then this money was sent as our Lenten offering.

We are using the Thrift Stamp cards in every class. It serves to bring constantly before the children the importance of aiding the government in this way, encourages them to have their own stamp cards, and at the same time has had the effect of increasing their offerings in Sunday-school.

At Easter, instead of our usual custom of giving a potted flower to each child, we gave a tomato plant in a pot much to the delight of the children. Those plants are in several instances the beginning of war gardens, they have served to interest the children in food production, and the children have interested the parents.

BISHOP ISRAEL'S ACTIVITIES.

We take the following from a private letter from the Rev. Roy Irving Murray, who it will be remembered, accompanied Bishop Israel to France, and afterwards took charge for a season of the American Church at Rome. The letter is dated at Rome, March 17th:

"The Bishop is getting to be a well-known figure along the American line, as it is called, and when the men in any one camp hear that he is to visit them again, they do not hesitate to express their delight in a truly American way.

"It may be of interest to know that the Bishop, as Bishop in charge of the American congregations in Europe, visited our church here in Rome on the second Sunday in Lent, preached, confirmed and met with the vestry. The rector is in America, or rather, is at the moment, on the sea, returning to Rome. Later that same week, the Bishop visited one of our aviation camps in Italy, and, finally, left Rome for the Italian front. I have since had a letter from him, telling of his safe return to Paris."

Mr. Murray also incloses a letter from an American boy who had just qualified as a civilian pilot in the Italian aviation service, and had but twelve more stunts to do before becoming a military aviator. He writes:

"The dear old Bishop was fine and the boys enjoyed him as much as was possible under the circumstances. The services were largely attended, and I had to warn him about the numbers that I thought would communicate. He did not expect so many. We have been talking about his visit ever since. He was to have a 'ride' in one of the big 'busses,' but I think the weather did not permit. I hope that you will tell him how much we enjoyed his presence with us and also how sorry I am that my time happened to be fairly well occupied, making my attention to his needs, etc., very poor. He is a grand man and a Bishop that the Church may hold before the world as a mighty fine example. I only wish we had a whole raft of priests like him—we need them."

THE LATE ARMENIAN PATRIARCH. RELIEF WORK FOR HIS PEOPLE IN DESPERATE CONDITION.

Mar Shimun, head of the Assyrian Church, has been slain, according to a cablegram received by the State Department at Washington recently. This same cablegram brings word that the Russian troops in Persia have been completely withdrawn from the region west of Lake Urumia. Fighting is still going on between the Mohammedan tribes and the Assyrian Christians. Severe famine conditions prevail and it is feared that most of the Assyrian men may be killed and the women and children left desolate and unprotected.

Mar Shimun is the first political head of a nationality who has paid the supreme sacrifice in this war. The kings of Belgium, Servia and Montenegro and the former czar of Russia still live, but the civil and religious head of the Assyrian Christians has fallen. To his people he was both King Albert and Cardinal Mercier; and the Assyrian Highlanders who mourn his loss are a gallant remnant who perhaps at this very hour are defending their women and children against armed Mohammedans.

In 1903, when a boy of sixteen, Mar Shimun was selected to become Catholicos, or patriarch, to succeed his uncle, Ruwel (Reuben) Mar Shimun, who was on the point of death. He was consecrated Catholicos on the 12th of April of that year. His later development brilliantly justified the hopes set upon the youth. In 1915 he was physically very handsome, with red cheeks and black hair, already sprinkled with grey. To all he showed the fine courtesy traditional in his family; and to his own people he was fatherly.

He was educated by native teachers and by members of the mission established by Archbishop Benson of Canterbury at the patriarchal seat, Qudshanis (Kochannes) in Kurdistan. As one hundred and thirty-eighth Catholicos of the East, he maintained the ancient tradition. Consecrated from birth to the service of God, like the Nazirites of old he never ate meat in his life. In Lent he and his flock underwent a most rigid fast for fifty days, Sundays included. He is in every way a model to his people, who almost worshipped him.

Benjamin Mar Shimun was the eldest of five brothers. One of these, Hormuzd, was a student in Constantinople when the war broke out; he was carried to Mosul and has not been heard from since. Another, Eshia (Isaiah), died amid the hardships of the summer of 1915. David has been the leader of the Assyrian forces in holding the border against the Kurds; his son, brought up as a Nazirite will, if approved by the people, normally become the next patriarch.

Next to Mar Shimun in influence was his elder sister, Surma. Finely educated in English and Syriac by the Archbishop's Mission, she became a recognized authority on canon law and Church history, and at the same time used to show hospitality to the visitors, who formerly flocked to the patriarchate twenty-five to a hundred at a time.

The late Bishop Collins, of Gibraltar, visitor Mar Shimun in 1907, and was deeply impressed by the patriarch and his people. He wrote: "The poorest Syrian of the mountains has preserved a national dignity, courage and a freshness which are lovable."

Paul Shimmon, personal representative in America of the late Mar Shimun, on hearing of the latest calamity in Persia, expressed a profound sense of his race's loss in the death of the patriarch. He said: "The five thousand Nestorian Christians who have made their home in America are in deep mourning for their racial and religious head. They are also very anxious about the safety of their relatives in Urumia and Salmas." Mr. Shimmon has a daughter, a mother and three brothers, and many other relatives in present peril; nearly every Assyrian family in America is in similar anxiety. Bishop Burch, of New York, Honorary Vice-President of the Assyrian Committee, was deeply pained on receiving the news of the death of the Assyrian patriarch.

Officials of the Presbyterian Board of Foreign Missions expressed their deep solicitude for the sufferers; and at the offices of the American Committee for Armenian and Syrian Relief, 1 Madison Avenue, New York, the Executive Secretary, Mr. Charles V. Vickrey, expressed his sorrow at the death of Mar Shimun and gave immediate assurance that all American relief workers in the district would remain on the field. "The cablegram just received," said Mr. Vickrey, "does not diminish, but rather increases the necessity of relief work in that section. It will be noted in the cablegram that it is the Syrian men who are in danger of extermination by death and that thousands of women and children will be left destitute, dependent upon American aid for food and shelter. All of our relief workers, including missionaries, physicians and teachers remain on the field. They have lived for years among the people, know their language and are held in high esteem by all. We feel assured that they will stand at their posts and other American workers will be sent to relieve these just as soon as conditions make it possible."

As early as 1915 America began to help feed and clothe sixty thousand refugees, in the plains of Urumia and Salmas. As the time went on conditions grew worse and despite the systematic relief carried on under the auspices of the American Committee for Armenian and Syrian Relief, here in America, in raising of money and planting seed corn, the supply of foodstuffs in Persia is still inadequate; the last cablegram dispatches have brought reports of terrific famine and of an increasing death rate from starvation.

The total amount of money appropriated by the American Committee for Armenian and Syrian Relief, of which Cleveland H. Dodge is Treasurer, for relief work in Persia up to April 3, 1918, is $1,931,732.48. The money has been cabled through the State Department and has been given out in the form of food and clothing to the most destitute refugees, by the American relief workers.

The cablegram referred to above is this:

Following from Tabriz: "No communication, Urumia, Salmas several weeks. The last reports were of famine Urumia. Mar Shimun killed, and fighting continues. Most of Syrian men may be killed, leaving the women and children absolutely desolate and unprotected."

JAPAN'S POLICY TOWARD ASIATIC PROBLEMS.

By Dr. R. B. Teusler.

(In a recent voluminous supplement to the New York Evening Post dealing with Japanese problems, Dr. Rudolph B. Teusler, our distinguished missionary physician of Tokyo, than whom few men are better prepared to speak intelligently on Japanese sentiment, contributes the following interesting article.—Ed. S. C.)

All the world save Germany has at last realized that the old standards of secret diplomacy and coercion of weaker nations by force must go, and that in their place justice and liberty must prevail in international life. In one sense, if it is possible, this issue between right and justice on the one side, and selfish ambition backed by force on the other, is fraught with more serious consequences to the Orient than it is to the Occident. The people of the East have afforded a happy hunting-ground to the nations of the West for more than a hundred years, and the establishment of self-determination for nations as one of the fruits of victory to our arms in this war will change the destiny of the Orient.

Peace based on justice and equal rights to all nations, whether they are great or small, is one of the fundamental issues of this war for which we are fighting, and only through the destruction of the aims of Germany can this be attained. Otherwise, if the examples of the past are to furnish the lessons for the future there will be no peace, but only a temporary cessation of hostilities in preparation for a still greater war. In clearer terms the demand is the Christianizing of international relations and the establishment of social righteousness and fraternity between the nations of the earth. The task of applying these standards is immense, but the benefits to the whole human race are immeasurably greater, and we should not shrink from facing the issue squarely. Systems of commercial monopoly should cease. Colonial expansion, "spheres of influence," the domination of weaker nations for the benefit of their conquerors, all this exploitation as practiced to-day has not only deep-seated wrong in it, but it forms a constant source of friction between the great nations of the earth, and there will be no permanent peace until it is done away with.

Back of it all and largely responsible for it all is the Phariseism of the white races. They make what they are pleased to call international laws which they apply to themselves only, and they make quite a different set of rules to govern their relations with the other races of the earth. Until the European races realize and are ready to admit that in the last analysis they are not superior to the nations of the East it will be impossible to apply international law with equal justice to all. The intellectual horizon of natural life throughout the Occident has not kept pace with its mechanistic and economic development. As a result our people are intensely provincial and intolerant in their conception and application of race questions.

Some one has truly said that the three great curses of the world are famine, pestilence and war. Transportation can and does relieve the first; the science of medicine is fast alleviating the second; the application of Christian principles to international relations will do away with the third. But to accomplish this the people of the West must individually learn to view their relations with the people of the East in an entirely new light, and grant to them exactly the same privileges and treatment they exact from one another for themselves. Because Germany is thinking in terms of the Middle Ages and has lapsed into barbarism is no excuse for us to trim our international relations by nineteenth century standards, or hesitate to insist upon the spread of liberty and justice throughout the world. Race prejudice is largely the product of ignorance and back of it stands the grim reality of war. Until we learn to put aside racial valuations and substitute the law of justice and right in international life we cannot hope to do away with it.

As an evidence of both our ignorance and our unjust prejudices, note how the people of the West criticize Japan for doing the very things which she has learned from the governments of the West, both by example and precept to be right. The ambitions of her capitalistic and the clash of economic forces drove Europe to her policy of colonial expansion at the expense of the East, and yet because Japan, overburdened with population and struggling for her very existence, has put into practice these same principles she has been looked upon with suspicion by the people of the West, and it is almost impossible to make them realize or appreciate that she has done no more than follow the lead of the great powers of Europe. Great danger lies in this example which the West has set for the East. Until the status quo is changed we cannot blame Japan if she applies to her neighboring countries of the East the same treatment she has seen Europe apply to the whole of Asia. Remember that the four great nations of Europe before this war had staked out in Eastern Asia, each for their own individual use, spheres of influence totalling in all some 3,406,000 square miles of territory, including parts of Manchuria, Mongolia, China proper, and Tibet. It is interesting to compare with this figure the sphere of influence marked out by Japan, which totals a little over 200,000 square miles, less than 6 per cent of the amount reserved by Europe. In spite of this great disparity between the influence of European nations in the mainland of the Far East and the influence of Japan, it should be remembered that there are nearly 350,000 Japanese in China, and that she has invested there some 500,000,000 yen, which about equals the British investments in China. As the world to-day interprets international relations, therefore, Japan possesses very definite rights and responsibilities in China.

It was Europe, not Japan, who originated "spheres of influence" and started the partitioning of China. Also we must not forget that Japan was forced into the greatest war of her history through the advances of Russia in Asia, secretly urged on by Germany; and that following the victory over her powerful enemy she had no alternative except to follow suit in establishing on the mainland of Asia special privileges, which if acquired by other nations would seriously jeopardize her very life. Remember that the problem of the Far East is the problem of Japan, and if "territorial propinquity creates special relations between countries," certainly Japan has more rights on the eastern mainland of Asia than any other country, because her possessions are contiguous. Until international custom and usage is changed, Japan is well within her rights. This is not stating that present international customs are right, but we cannot make one law for Japan and another for Europe, and then object if Japan refuses to abide by it. The recent Lansing-Ishii agreement makes this fact pretty clear. In reality, Asia is powerless to assert her rights, except as Japan can speak for her.

The Great Commission

THE LEPER COLONY IN PORTO RICO.

A recent number of the "Porto Rico Progress" describes the leper colony, established on Cabras Island, near the entrance to the harbor of San Juan. The surroundings are described as desolate in the extreme, and the provisions made for the comfort as well as the amusement of the unfortunates segregated there are very meagre. The lepers, however, are not without their friends, of whom they speak loyally; and especially of one, the Rev. Harvey P. Walter, a missionary of the Church in San Juan:

"Mention his name at Cabras and you will hear a sort of litany that runs thus: Que bueno es! Bendito sea! Que buen hombre! And whether you know Spanish or not that will tell you that it is heartfelt love and gratitude. Mr. Walters is the one regular visitor the island knows outside of the Sanitation Department. He goes there twice a month and he does not go empty-handed to preach. There is a society already formed among the lepers; an organization with a long, dignified name—the Benevolent Recreational and Lucrative Society of Cabras. Officers are elected and meetings held. Just what the lucrative ends are it would be hard to say, but if it allows pleasant play to the imagination of hopeless sufferers it can justify any name in the world.

"The women have their quarters apart, there are fifteen of them, ten less women than men. But they are just as cheerful in the face of as terrible a fate.

"The doctor stopped in front of the first door in the women's section. 'Buenos dias, Concepcion,' he called. 'A good morning, doctor,' was the answer of a voice that in its cheerfulness had a note of resignation. The door was opened and Concepcion, eighteen years old, sweet-faced and smiling, though three years a sufferer, came out. She was glad to see Dr. Corona and he was glad to see her.

"She's always happy because of her goodness," he said in her presence. 'She has faith in God and knows that her suffering will have its reward. Isn't it so, Concepcion?' And Concepcion smiling said it was so, that God was very good and she would be patient. 'How do you spend your time?' she was asked. 'I sew now,' was the reply, 'but it is getting harder and in a little while I won't be able to.' She held up her hands to show why she wouldn't be able to, and the visitor wished he had asked some other question.

"The story is the same throughout. All know and all accept their lot. There is the inevitable undercurrent of sadness, but very little surliness."

Alaska.

A telegram to the Board of Missions from our Mission at Fort Yukon, Alaska, gives the information that Dr. Grafton Burke, in charge of St. Stephen's Hospital, left Fort Yukon on April 15th in response to an emergency call from Vilhjalmur Stefansson, the Arctic explorer. When he sent the message asking for help from our missionary physician, Mr. Stefansson was lying at Herschel Island seriously ill with what was supposed to be typhoid fever.

Dr. Burke will make a three hundred-mile journey on foot through one of the most desolate sections of Alaska in order to save Mr. Stefansson's life, if possible. It is probable that Archdeacon Stuck, who has been making a winter journey along the Arctic coast, reached Herschel Island soon after Stefansson's messengers started for Fort Yukon. When Archdeacon Stuck was last heard from, he was at Point Hope. This was in January. He expected to start about February 1st for Icy Cape, Point Barrow, Flaxman Island and Herschel Island. From the last point, he expected to journey overland to Fort Yukon, arriving probably about May 1st.

The Presbyterian Board of Foreign Missions has just closed its fiscal year with a surplus of $5,000. Its total expenditures for the year were just under $3,000,000, the gifts of congregations and individuals for regular work were $350,000 more than for 1917.

During the whole time Christ was on earth, only two people gave enough to attract His attention, and they were both women.—E. J. Brown.

Bishop Brent; Senior Chaplain, American Forces in France.

Under a new organization of the chaplain forces in France, word of which has just been received, Bishop Charles Henry Brent, D. D., has been appointed by General Pershing as senior headquarters chaplain. According to this plan, the chaplain forces in France will be under the control of a chaplains' office at general headquarters, which will represent the body of chaplains to the commanding general and his staff. This office will consist of three chaplains appointed by the commanding general, and known as general headquarters chaplains, one of whom is designated as senior chaplain. To this post Bishop Brent has been appointed, with the rank of major. He has two aides, one a Roman Catholic, the other a Protestant. It will be their duty to keep in touch with every sector occupied by the American forces, provide for ministrations wherever needed, and in many other ways have a general oversight of the commissioned chaplains.

Bishop Brent has been in France for a number of months, actively interested in the work of the chaplains and of the Y. M. C. A. General Pershing and Bishop Brent have long been on terms of close personal friendship and mutual attachment.

Planning For Better Equipped Ministers.

Representatives from all the theological seminaries will be in New York May 1st and 2nd, to attend the fifth meeting of the Theological Council of the General Board, which is formulating a new canon for the training of ministers. Besides the representatives of seminaries, there will be representatives from the Provinces.

The most important business will be the Council's action on a report offered by Dean Bartlett. After a year's work they are ready to propose to the Council changes in the present canons. These changes will correct much of the indefiniteness of the present canons, and bring the requirements of those seeking the ministry more in harmony with the modern needs by allowing elective and alternative subjects of examination, thereby recognizing specialized training and unusual attainments on the part of the candidate. The new proposals allow a large amount of freedom in dealing with candidates of a mature age, with those of foreign birth and with those from other communions.

The report of the coming Council meeting will be published for the consideration and suggestion of all interested. It is hoped that Church-wide discussion will enlighten the Council, and enable it to make a final report to the General Convention, that will be representative of the wisdom of the Church. The one ambition in the minds of the Council is to have free discussion before the General Convention so that the action of the Convention will embody the conviction of the Church and become a canon obeyed as well as enacted.

Mr. Blanchard Randall, of Baltimore, Md., has been appointed by the Board of Education of the Province of Washington as its representative on the Council for the Education of the Ministry. Mr. Randall has been a delegate to the General Convention for many years; he is a member of the Board of Missions and will bring to the Council valuable suggestions.

The Authorized Church Flag.

Churches and Christian societies have been quick to order the new Church flag. This flag has been selected by the joint action of the government, the Protestant and Catholic Church authorities, and is the first official emblem of its kind. It is the one thing that may be legally placed above the American flag, and that during religious services in church, on board ship, at cantonment or army post. It is stated that flags provided at this time may be retained after the war and used as a flag of worship and service wherever it is deemed appropriate by Church authorities.

The flag in question is a triangular white pennant with a blue Latin cross placed horizontally in the center. A good size for outdoor use is three feet by eight feet six inches. The pennant is three times as long as it is wide. The long bar of the cross is the same as the width of the pennant, and the short bar one-half the length of the long one. The other form of the flag is a blue Latin cross on a white rectangular ground, the latter being one and a half times as long as wide. The proportions for the cross are the same as those first given. Both flags may be used for draping within a church, but only the pennant should be flown from a vertical pole.

The Bible Society and Its War Job.

The American Bible Society is out with its books in a Hospital Edition, ready for American boys who have been wounded in France, brought home to get well, and are far enough advanced toward recovery to be able to read. Friends of the venerable Society are saying that it is about as forward on its job as anybody in sight. These editions are in large type, with suggestive binding, and are the Psalms bound in one book, and the New Testament complete, bound in another. The editions sell for five and twenty-five cents, respectively, a little less than their cost to the Society, and apart from sales direct they are intended to be sold in numbers to people who are equipping hospitals. Insofar as the Society is able to command funds through gifts its purpose is to distribute the editions to hospitals everywhere.

These hospital editions of the Scriptures have at the back blank entries for names and dates, so that convalescents may keep them as souvenirs. Exactly similar books, with blank entries, have been made by Roman Catholics, the Douay version. Illustrating the spirit of co-operation which the war has fostered, the American Society offered to the Roman Catholics a set of New Testament plates, that duplication of expense and valuable time might be saved.

When the war came a year ago the Society immediately took steps to supply troops with the Scriptures. This the Society had done in all previous wars in which the United States was engaged. Within the first year of the war, wherein America has been concerned, the Society has offered to all chaplains pulpit Bibles for their own use, and New Testaments and other portions of the Scriptures to all troops reached by chaplains. Fearing this plan might not reach all, the Society promised the Y. M. C. A. one million copies of the New Testament khaki bound for the army, and blue binding for the navy. So far as known, this is the largest single grant of the Scriptures ever made.

The record of the first year in the war is the distribution by the Society of 2,231,831 copies—a record far surpassing anything thought possible to attain, when the obstacles of manufacture and considered. The Society buys much of the peculiar thin paper which it uses in Minnesota, and last winter it was found impossible to get the paper through. Moreover, owing to lack of coal and the extreme weather, Bible presses were shut down. In addition to Bibles made and sent out by the Society, other publishers have entered the trade, and practically every set of plates in existence has been drafted into service. The Society states that it is ready at this time to supply hospitals with its hospital editions, but that it is going on with a second year of Bible distributing among men still at the front.

Seamen's Friend Society.

Caring for the hundreds of sailors who have landed at the port of New York in the course of their work in transporting war supplies has in the past year assumed an increasing importance, judging by the records of the American Seamen's Friend Society, 76 Wall Street, New York, which has just closed its fiscal year. It is estimated that more than 200,000 sailors constituted the aggregate attendance at the Sailors' Home and Institute on the North River water front.

During the coming year a new field of opportunity for the Society's international work will probably be opened with the establishment of a social headquarters for sailors in Cristobal, Colon, at the Atlantic end of the Panama Canal Zone. This work was first undertaken with the co-operation of former Governor George W. Goethals, and plans are now being completed with the approval of Governor Harding of the Zone.

Training School For Chaplains Opens Second Session.

Sunday, April 21st, at three o'clock, the second session of the Training School for Chaplains was formally opened at Camp Zachary Taylor, Louisville, Ky., with an enrollment of ninety-one newly appointed chaplains and approved candidates.

Churchmen at A. and M. College, Bryan, Texas.

Great numbers of men chosen under the selective draft law are coming daily to A. and M. College. In order that St. Andrew's Church, Bryan, may get in touch with newly arrived Churchmen, I most earnestly request rectors of parishes to send me the names of men coming to A. and M. College.

I have found Churchmen from Buffalo, N. Y., to San Francisco, and from Denver to Galveston here, but up to the present have received no information from the rector of any parish in the United States.

The Rev. H. B. McC. Jamison, Rector St. Andrew's Church, Bryan, Tex.

Clergymen Wanted in Y. M. C. A. Work in France.

According to a cable received in this country from the Y. M. C. A. headquarters in Paris, twenty ministers of different communions are wanted in France for six months to speak to the American troops. The names of the clergymen of the Episcopal Church given in the cable are: The Rt. Rev. Dr. T. F. Gallor, Bishop of Tennessee; the Rt. Rev. Dr. C. E. Woodcock, Bishop of Kentucky; the Rev. Drs. Stires and Slattery, of New York, and the Rev. Dr. Mann, of Boston.

Bishop Lloyd and Archdeacon Schofield Reach New York: A telegram received from Dr. John W. Wood announces the safe arrival in New York on April 29 of Bishop Lloyd and Archdeacon Schofield, and states that both are well.

CUBA.

Rt. Rev. H. R. Hulse, D. D., Bishop.

Lenten Services.

Throughout the Island of Cuba and the Isle of Pines the Lenten and Holy Week services were very largely attended, and the Easter congregations were much larger than usual. The Archdeacon of Havana spent Holy Week and Easter on the Isle of Pines delivering the addresses at the "Three Hours" service, and preaching on Palm Sunday at Santa Barbara, and McKinley, and on Easter at Columbia Santa Fe and Nueva Gerona.

The Rev. W. H. Decker has charge of all five missions on the Isle of Pines, and ministers to them all once every fortnight. Every other Sunday he must make a trip of seventy miles and hold three services, and deliver three sermons. For his work he makes use of an automobile.

He and Governor Pack, formerly of the Philippine Islands, have held patriotic meetings at all the centers of population on the island. About fifty young men from this little island have gone to the front, and the Red Cross Society of the Isle of Pines has a larger membership than that of Havana.

Dean Myers as Chaplain: It is likely that when these notes appear, the Very Rev. G. B. Myers, Dean of Holy Trinity Cathedral, will have gone to Santiago de Cuba to act as chaplain pro tem for the American troops stationed there.

NEWARK.

Rt. Rev. E. S. Lines, D. D., Bishop.
Rt. Rev. W. R. Stearly, D. D., Coadjutor.

The Sunday-school Lenten offerings of the Diocese were presented at a service held in Trinity Cathedral, April 20, with an unusually large congregation and representation of the Sunday-schools. The address was made by the Rev. C. E. Betticher; the offerings for General Missions presented amounting to about $7,500.00, a very considerable increase over the offerings last year. It is believed that when all the reports are received, they will amount to $10,000.00; one-fourth more than last year.

The Rev. Robert F. Law has accepted the call to St. John's Church, Bayonne, as the successor to the Rev. A. S. Winslow, removed to Western Massachusetts.

The Rev. John C. Donnell has succeeded the Rev. Charles W. Popham, of Belleville, in the Y. M. C. A. service at Building No. 4, at Camp Dix, and any letter concerning soldiers in the camp, addressed to him there, will have consideration. The Clergy of the Diocese of Newark are in terms of three or four months, each doing work at the place named.

The fifth and last call for the year ending in May, for the Bishop's Church Extension Fund, has gone out to help the Church of the Incarnation at Ampere purchase a rectory on land adjoining the church property. A call from this fund made five times in the year is worth $1,500, and it goes far to stimulate the mission church to provide a church rectory or parish house.

VIRGINIA.

Rt. Rev. R. A. Gibson, D. D., Bishop.
Rt. Rev. W. C. Brown, D. D., Coadjutor.

The Richmond Convocation.

The Richmond Convocation convened for its seventieth session on Tuesday, April 23, in St. Stephen's Church, Westhampton, Richmond, the Rev. James D. Gibson, rector. At ten o'clock A. M., a devotional service was held, lead by the Rev. P. A. Arthur. At eleven Morning Prayer was said, the preacher being the Rev. Cary Montague, Richmond's new city missionary. At one o'clock Convocation had lunch at the Ellett Country School for Girls, at which time they had an opportunity of seeing the splendid new school with its up-to-date and modern equipment. The first business session was held at two P. M. At this meeting the question on the raising of convocation funds was brought up. After much discussion it was made the order of the day at the following business session. At eight o'clock a special service in the interest of religious education was held. The Rev. J. F.

Ribble, President of the Diocesan Board of Religious Education, presided, and introduced the two speakers. Mrs. E. E. Osgood, of Emmanuel Church, Brook Hill, spoke on the particular problems confronting Sunday-school teachers and the value of conferences and training classes in helping to solve these problems. The second speaker was Mrs. Randolph Watkins, of Holy Trinity Church, Richmond. Mrs. Watkins in a very clear and convincing way persuaded all those present that the art of teaching, pedagogy, was absolutely essential in modern teaching.

Wednesday, April 24, after a Quiet Hour service held at ten o'clock, Holy Communion was administered by the Dean of the Convocation, the Rev. Charles Sydnor, at eleven o'clock, the preacher at this service being the Rev. W. E. Cox, rector of the Church of the Holy Comforter. At one o'clock a luncheon was served by the ladies of the congregation at the rectory. At two P. M. a business meeting was held and the order of the day called for. There was much to be said on both sides of the question as to the advisability of the Convocation, as such, endeavoring to raise funds for the benefit of some missionary work or other religious enterprise within its bounds. It seemed wise to the Convocation to take some definite action in this respect and a resolution was offered to the effect that for the time being the Convocation endeavor to raise no funds. This action, while apparently expressing the consensus of opinion of the members of the Convocation, does not, however, commit them to a final policy of entirely doing away with missionary work supported as heretofore by the Convocation. It does, however, give time for the thought of the men of the Convocation to crystallize before another meeting and to determine whether or not in this day of efficiency in the Church as well as in the business world the time has not come for the doing away of unnecessary machinery in the raising of the Church's funds. At three-thirty, an interesting essay on the subject of Church Attendance was read by the Rev. W. H. Burkhardt. The speakers for the essay were the Rev. G. Freeland Peter and the Rev. W. R. Bowie, D. D. Many constructive suggestions were made and keen interest among all those present was held throughout the entire discussion. At eight o'clock a missionary service was held, at which time the Rev. Cary Montague spoke of the work of the city missionary.

Thursday, April 25, the devotional service was led by the Rev. Walter Williams. At eleven o'clock Morning Prayer was said. The sermon was preached by the Rev. G. Freeland Peter, rector of St. James Church, immediately after which Convocation went into business session to hear the parochial reports. At one P. M. the Convocation was entertained at luncheon by the vestry of St. Stephen's at the Country Club of Virginia. At three P. M. the Convocation reconvened, finished hearing parochial reports, and after passing suitable resolutions of thanks to the congregation, vestry and rector of the church, adjourned sine die.

The Rev. D. Campbell Mayers, rector of Emmanuel Church, Greenwood, has arrived safely in France and taken up his work in connection with the Y. M. C. A. Mr. Mayers' congregation have adopted resolutions, which have been sent to him, assuring him of their pride in the fact that they have a representative engaged in this great work, that they are behind him in all his efforts and that their constant prayers will go up for his safety and strength for his duties.

The spring meeting of the Convocation of the Rappahannock Valley will be held in St. Paul's Church, King George County, beginning Wednesday morning, May 1. All the members who can attend please notify the rector, Rev. W. Herbert Mayers.

S. S. WARE.

The vestry of Christ Church, Bowling Green, Ky., has extended a call to the Rev. Alexander Galt, rector of Ridley Parish, Brandy Station.

SOUTHERN VIRGINIA.

Rt. Rev. R. D. Tucker, D. D., Bishop.
Rt. Rev. A. C. Thomson, D. D., Suffragan.

Convocation of Southwestern Virginia.

The one hundred and second Convention of the Convocation of Southwestern Virginia was held at Amherst and Sweet Briar, April 23-25. Twenty Clergy were present. The Dean, the Rev. F. H. Craighill, presided.

The devotional meetings were conducted by the Rev. G. Floyd Rogers. His general theme was "Religion in War Times." These meetings were exceedingly helpful and timely. The congregation of Ascension Church with the visiting Clergy enjoyed them greatly. Sermons were preached by Bishop Tucker, Tuesday evening; the Rev. J. B. Dunn, D. D., Wednesday evening, and missionary addresses, Thursday evening, by Mr. E. C. Hughes, of the Archdeaconry, and the Rev. T. K. Nelson, formerly of China.

On Wednesday morning the Rev. R. B. Nelson preached the Convocation sermon, setting forth the necessity and activity of the voluntary chaplain in the camp. The practical essay was read by the Rev. W. G. McDowell on Church Music. Many entered into the discussion. The theoretic essay was read by the Rev. F. H. Craighill on "Psychic Evidences of Immortality." He showed much thought and reading and gave a clear exposition of the subject. Several entered into the debate.

Business meetings were held each morning and afternoon. The report of the Convocational Board of Religious Education, through its chairman, the Rev. T. D. Lewis, lent special emphasis to the prospects and claims of the Summer School for Christian Workers, which is to be held in Lynchburg, June 17-21. A strong faculty has been provided, and if the rectors of the Virginia parishes will co-operate, there will surely be a large attendance. The Diocesan Record, the official organ of the Diocesan Missionary Society, received cordial endorsement and commendation of the Convocation.

The most important action of the Convocation was a memorial to the next meeting of the Annual Council of the Diocese as to the division of the Diocese, in the following words: "Be it resolved, That a committee of three, of whom the Dean shall be chairman, present to next Council of Southern Virginia a memorial from this Convocation of Southwestern Virginia, requesting that a committee be appointed to secure data and consider the feasibility and advisability of dividing the Diocese along such lines as the Council in its wisdom shall deem best." The Rev. F. H. Craighill, Wytheville; the Rev. J. B. Dunn, D. D., Lynchburg, and the Rev. J. W. C. Johnson, Roanoke, are the committee appointed.

The Treasurer, the Rev. Thomas Howell, reported that with the balance at last report and receipts during the last six months, his books showed $625.66, with expenditures of $455.38.

A most delightful event in the meeting was the visit to Sweetbriar. A business meeting was held in the college chapel. Then at four o'clock a reception was given to the Clergy at the home of Rev. Professor Lewis, but between the two the members of the Convocation enjoyed luncheon with the faculty and students. There is a delightful and wholesome atmosphere at Sweetbriar; and Miss McVea, the President, is already making a strong impression upon the general character of the institution. The members returned to Amherst late in the afternoon for the closing missionary service at 8 o'clock.

Christiansburg was chosen as the place of the next meeting.

Norfolk Bells Call For Noon-Day Prayers: For a year past, Christ Church, Norfolk, has had a service of Holy Communion and intercession every Wednesday at 11 o'clock, when the men and women of the parish who are in the service are especially remembered. Ninety-five names are now on the service flag. St. Mary's Guild was formed to keep in touch with these brave men and women and to serve them. Following an example set by a California community, Christ Church bell has been rung daily, at 12 noon, and will continue to be rung as long as the war lasts, that at this hour all may silently say the Lord's Prayer and offer a petition for our country and our men. The mayor of the city pledges likewise, the ringing of the City Hall bell at twelve noon if it be the desire of the Christian community that all at that hour may unite in prayer for our country, our soldiers and sailors.

St. Peter's Church, Norfolk, the Rev. W. E. Callender, rector. A very interesting service was held in this church on Sunday night, April 28, when a service flag containing twenty-six stars was unfurled, and also an Honor Roll placed in the vestibule of the church. The special preacher at this service was the Rev. R. S. Patrick, senior chaplain of the Naval District, who preached an inspiring sermon from the text, "Lay hold on life." The Rev. Mr. Callender expects to commence next Sunday at St. Helena Training Station, early celebrations of the Holy Communion for the number of boys, members of the Episcopal Church, who desire this service.

The Rev. T. Carter Page, of Bedford, left the third of April for Camp Lee, where he will spend a month studying Y. M. C. A. methods, with a view to taking up the word permanently.

WEST VIRGINIA.

Rt. Rev. W. L. Gravatt, D. D., Bishop.

The Rev. H. B. Lee, Jr., Secretary of the Diocese, having accepted a parish elsewhere, I hereby appoint the Rev. R. E. L. Strider, Wheeling, W. Va., Secretary until meeting of the Council.

The names of delegates to the Council should be sent promptly to him.

W. L. Gravatt, Bishop.

April 25, 1918.

Bishop Gravatt's Visit to Wheeling: Bishop Gravatt visited St. Matthew's Church on Palm Sunday morning, and St. Luke's in the evening, and confirmed candidates at each church.

During Lent, the rector of St. Matthew's Church, Rev. R. E. L. Strider, in addition to the regular Lenten services, held noon-day service each Friday, at which he delivered addresses bearing specially on the war, and its present and probable affects on Church life. The services were well attended and the interest well sustained.

At St. Luke's Church, the Rev. Jacob Brittingham, D. D., rector, and at St. Andrew's Church, Rev. J. Logan Fish, rector, the Lenten and Easter services were well attended, large numbers of people communed at all the three churches. Up to date sixty-three young men have left the three churches in Wheeling, in answer to the country's call, the son of the rector of St. Andrew's being among the number.

St. Matthew's Mission, Chester., Mr. L. O. Forqueran, lay worker, in charge, has sent four young men to training camps. According to the report of Mr. Forqueran, this work is progressing.

Sheltering Arms Hospital: This hospital is maintaining its reputation for helping the needy. It is overflowing with patients. Members of the various Auxiliaries in the Diocese have in the most praiseworthy way provided for the needs of the hospital, and are at present appealed to for shirts, sheets, pillows, pillowcases, etc. Mrs. Peterkin, on a recent visit to the hospital, found one hundred and twenty patients, many of them foreigners who could neither speak nor read English. The Sheltering Arms Hospital is a constant exhibition of practical Christianity.

Trinity Church, Moundsville: During the past fall and winter, Rev. J. Henry Garner, rector of Trinity Church, has been working a mission in Cameron, giving service on Tuesday evenings. A lay reader has been appointed so that there may be service on Sunday, in addition to the week-night service. During the past year, thirteen persons have been presented for confirmation in Trinity parish, and seventeen have received the sacrament of baptism.

ASHEVILLE.

Rt. Rev. J. M. Horner, D. D., Bishop.

Trinity Church, Asheville: On Sunday evening, April 21, the Bishop visited Trinity Church, the Rev. Willis G. Clark, rector, and confirmed a class of forty-four. In the class there were nineteen men and boys and twenty-five women and girls. The rector has presented within the past two years one hundred and fifty-three people for confirmation. The congregations at Trinity Church are large, frequently taxing the capacity of the building. Within the past two years the membership of the Church has increased nearly fifty per cent. The total membership now numbers eight hundred and two enrolled members. These people represent all walks of life. Trinity Church to-day is one of the most democratic congregations of any Episcopal Church in the South. Mr. and Mrs. Harmon A. Miller recently gave to Trinity Church four large and very handsome alms basins as a thank offering for the recovery from a serious illness on the part of Mrs. Miller.

The District Convention will meet in Trinity Church, Asheville, on May 15, 16 and 17. The Woman's Auxiliary will meet at the same place and time.

The Rev. H. N. Bowne, for the past five years rector of the Holy Cross Church, Tryon, has accepted a call to All Souls' Church, Biltmore, to succeed the late Rev. R. R. Swope, D. D., as rector. Mr. Bowne will enter upon his work in Biltmore on the first of June. He will have in his parish the large Government Base Hospital, No. 16, called Kenilworth Hospital. At this hospital there will be about five hundred soldier patients brought from overseas and two hundred officers and soldier attendants.

Hendersonville: On the morning of April 21, the Bishop visited St. James' Church, Hendersonville, the Rev. A. W. Farnum, rector, and confirmed fifteen people. Mr. Farnum, in the afternoon, presented nine for confirmation at St. John's Church, Upward. The work at both of these places shows every sign of progress, and Mr. Farnum is proving himself to be the very man for this field.

The possibility of changing the district into a Diocese seems encouraging. This matter will be definitely considered at the coming Convention. Trinity Church, Asheville, has pledged one-fourth of the amount of money necessary to accomplish this purpose.

GEORGIA.

Rt. Rev. F. F. Reese, D. D., Bishop

Woman's Auxiliary.

Mrs. I. A. Sims, of Savannah, has accepted the Diocesan office of Secretary of the Spirit of Missions, made vacant by the removal of Miss Norma Palmer from the Diocese.

The spiritual life of the Georgia Branch has been greatly helped and uplifted by the wonderful Quiet Day services conducted in Savannah, Augusta and Brunswick by Bishop Edward Osborne, now of Savannah, who most graciously offered his services to this Province during the Synod held in Charleston, S. C., last November.

The annual meeting of the Georgia Branch was held in St. John's Church, Bainbridge, the Rev. Roberts P. Johnson, vicar, on April 24 and 25. The Corporate Communion was celebrated by Bishop Reese, who also delivered the opening address. After the address of the President, Mrs. J. K. McIver, reports were read by the Treasurer, Vice-Presidents, Box Secretary, Educational Secretary, Junior President and Custodian of the United Offering.

On April 25 an address was made by the Rev. John D. Wing, rector of Christ Church, Savannah, who also conducted the Quiet Hour. Reports were made by the Secretary of the Spirit of Missions, of the parish branches, of the committees and of the Church Periodical Club.

The meeting was well attended and deep enthusiasm prevailed.

Bishop Reese, in his annual address to the recent Convention of the Diocese of Georgia, which met in St. John's Church, Savannah, spoke thus of the approaching decennial of his episcopate:

"Nearly ten years ago I was consecrated a Bishop in the Church of God, and at the same time became Bishop of this Diocese. That I was permitted to enter upon the duties of my office and have been permitted to continue therein during all these years causes me to realize more than I can tell the goodness and mercy of God. At the time of my consecration I gravely doubted whether it would be His will that I should be able to exercise the ministry to which I had been set apart and to which I had been called by your generous suffrages. I cannot forbear, therefore, to express my gratitude to Almighty God for the joy and happiness which He has permitted me to realize in this ministry, and I must also express to the people of this Diocese, of every parish and mission and to my Clergy my sincere and earnest thankfulness for their loyalty and forbearance and for the support and encouragement they have given by their loving faithfulness to me and to the Church. I thank you, my brethren of the Convention, and through you the people whom you represent."

The Bishop's decennial will be celebrated at a special service in Christ Church, Savannah, on May 20.

LEXINGTON.

Rt. Rev. L. W. Burton, D. D., Bishop

The twenty-third Annual Council of the Diocese of Lexington will meet this year in Calvary Church, Ashland, beginning Tuesday, May 28, 1918. A minute program has been prepared, giving the business of every hour for a two days' session.

The Woman's Auxiliary in the Diocese will meet at the same time in the Guild Hall of Calvary Church. The Corporate Communion will be celebrated Wednesday, May 29, in Calvary Church at nine o'clock in the morning.

MISSISSIPPI.

Rt. Rev. T. DuB. Bratton, D. D., Bishop.

Special Council for Election of Bishop-Coadjutor.

Official notification is given of the Special Council for the election of a Bishop-Coadjutor, the Bishop having given the required sixty days' notice. The meeting will be held in Jackson on Tuesday, June 25, for the special purpose of electing a Coadjutor-Bishop and for such other business as may be incident thereto.

In accordance with the canon governing the election of lay delegates, the Bishop has ruled that the lay delegates to the last (ninety-first) Annual Council are delegates to this Special Council; and that any vacancies which may occur may be filled by the usual method of election by the parishes and missions.

NEW MEXICO.

Rt. Rev. F. B. Howden, D. D., Bishop.

Missionary Bishop.

The Bishop on his return from the meeting of the House of Bishop resumed his visitations. Here, where there are many foreigners connected with the coal mines in the vicinity, the work has many difficulties, yet at the same time some success has been obtained. Individuals from as many as eight different nationalities were in attendance on Easter Day, including Syrians and Koreans.

Two churches have been consecrated recently. At La Union, N. M., a country location, the little church, recently built, was consecrated on Saturday, April 20. The Rev. C. S. Sargent, of El Paso, now ministers regularly at that place.

Then, the next day, Sunday, Bishop Howden consecrated the church at Mesilla Park. This is a beautiful church, and was built some years ago, but owing to a debt on it, had not been consecrated. It contains a memorial window to the Rev. Henry Forrester, the pioneer missionary of New Mexico. Some forty years ago—before railroads were built here—Mr. Forrester made the long trip in the stage coach from Santa Fe to Las Cruces and Mesilla. In that vicinity is the present Mesilla Park, where the Rev. Hunter Lewis is now rector.

El Paso: The Bishop visited El Paso on Palm Sunday and confirmed a good class, making seventy in all confirmed under the present rector, the Rev. Fulmer Swift.

LOUISIANA.

Rt. Rev. David Sessums, D. D., Bishop.

Annual Council.

The eightieth Annual Council of the Diocese of Louisiana convened in Christ Church Cathedral, New Orleans, on Wednesday morning, April 17. Bishop Sessums was celebrant at the Holy Communion, and the Rev. A. W. Skardon, rector of Grace Church, St. Francisville, preached a sermon on the Relations of Christianity and Science. Immediately after this service the Council organized for business, with the re-election of the Rev. H. C. Duncan as Secretary, and the day was largely taken up with routine work.

On Wednesday evening Bishop Sessums delivered his annual sermon to the Council. Denunciation of German military ambitions and failure to find in history any Divine purpose justifying military tyranny, were brought out in this sermon, which has been printed and sent over the State as Third Liberty Loan propaganda. Arrangements have also been made by a prominent firm in New Orleans to have the sermon distributed to every Episcopal church and banker in the State.

On Thursday morning officers for the ensuing year were elected. Mr. Edwin Belknap, who had been elected Treasurer for the past twenty-six years, refused to run for re-election, and Mr. R. P. Mead, for some years Treasurer of the Diocesan Board of Missions, was elected Treasurer of the Diocese. The Rev. C. W. Bispham was elected Registrar. Rev. H. C. Duncan, of Alexandria, was elected Secretary, and Herman J. Duncan, his son, was made Assistant Secretary of the Diocese. Rev. Dr. W. A. Barr, Rev. Alfred R. Berkeley, Rev. A. R. Edbrooke, Warren Kearny, James D. Haywood and F. S. Shields were elected members of the Standing Committee. The following were elected deputies of the Provincial Synod: The Rev. G. L. Tucker, the Rev. W. E. Vann, the Rev. A. R. Berkeley, the Rev. W. A. Barr, the Rev. C. W. Bispham, the Rev. Matthew Brewster, Reginald P. Mead, Warren Kearny, George W. Law, F. H. G. Fry, W. S. Cudlipp, S. M. Cate.

Reports showed that $4,200 had been contributed during the fiscal year for Home Missions and that $3,300 had been raised by the Episcopal churches in the State as a cantonment fund. This money will be expended in America and France. The Woman's Auxiliary has agreed to give $950 toward a new church at Eunice.

That war's call has left a "mere" handful" of theological students at the University of the South (Sewanee) was put before the Council at its afternoon session in the chapel of Christ Church Thursday by the Rev. G. L. Tucker and the Rev. Rowland Hale, trustees of the university. Mr. Hale stated that increases in other departments, especially the military academy, had made the total enrollment of Sewanee this year higher than ever before.

The Rev. Mr. Tucker said seventy or eighty students were taken from the university this year by war. The university service flag has six hundred and twenty-four stars, three of which are gold, representing men who died in war.

The annual meeting of the Louisiana

Branch of the Woman's Auxiliary opened Tuesday with a "Quiet Hour" under the Rev. Mathew Brewster at Christ Church. Tuesday night the Woman's and Junior Auxiliaries presented "The Province of Blessed Isle" at Trinity Parish House, with Miss Laura Fry in the leading role.

There were devotional services Wednesday forenoon at Christ Church Cathedral with conference hour for the United Offering for parish custodians and the Executive Board of the Woman's Auxiliary, followed by an educational review.

The conferences continued the rest of the week, closing on Saturday, with Junior Day at Trinity Church.

DALLAS.

Rt. Rev. A. C. Garrett, D. D., Bishop.
Rt. Rev. H. T. Moore, D. D., Coadjutor.

Confirmation: Sunday, April 21st, Third Sunday after Easter, Bishop Moore visited St. Andrew's Church, Fort Worth, the Rev. E. H. Eckel, rector, and confirmed a class of twelve, four of which were soldiers presented by Chaplain Godolphin, of Camp Bowie. A large congregation was present. In the evening at Trinity Church, Fort Worth, the Rev. F. T. Datson, rector, he confirmed a class of twelve persons.

The twenty-third Annual Council will meet in St. Matthew's Cathedral, Dallas, on Tuesday, May 14, 1918.

BETHLEHEM.

Rt. Rev. Ethelbert Talbot, D. D., Bishop.

The vestry of the Pro-Cathedral of the Nativity, South Bethlehem, has called the Rev. John Insley Blair Larned to be the new Dean. Mr. Larned is now rector of St. John's Church, Kingston, N. Y. It is understood that Mr. Larned will accept the call.

The annual meeting of the Woman's Auxiliary of the Diocese of Bethlehem will be held at St. Stephen's Church, Wilkes-Barre, May 14 and 15. Dr. W. H. Jeffreys, of the Philadelphia City Mission Society, will be one of the speakers.

NEW YORK.

Rt. Rev. David H. Greer, D. D., Bishop.
Rt. Rev. C. S. Burch, D. D., Suffragan.

St. Simeon's Church, the Rev. Ralph J. Walker, rector, is building a handsome stone church, costing, with its site, considerably more than $100,000. The architecture is modern Gothic, and the complete plant includes a rectory. Ten years ago the rectory and basement were built. The location is just off the Grand Concourse, the finest section of the Bronx, and in a region long famous as the site of the Fleetwood race track, where General U. S. Grant ran his stable. The site of St. Simeon's was given by two former race track owners, and is a unique plot wholly surrounded by an avenue and two streets. The site is high, and the region rapidly growing. A station of the new subway, not fully opened as yet, is not far distant.

St. Simeon's was begun in a barn by James H. Falconer, a Brotherhood and Seabury layman, and was part of the Church extension work done under the Rev. Dr. G. F. Nelson as Archdeacon, now Secretary of the House of Bishops. It was assisted to the extent of $7,000 through grants by Trinity parish.

For the second time Bishop Greer tried successfully the plan of asking Bronx rectors to bring persons to be confirmed to the Cathedral on a Sunday afternoon. The occasion was the fourth Sunday after Easter, and the number exceeded two hundred, coming from ten parishes and missions. Fourteen Clergy assisted or were in the line and there was a great attendance of Bronx church people. The choir sang. It is said a second such service will be held if there be further need. A Bronx speaker some years ago, in an address, at which Bishop Potter presided, pointed out that as the Cathedral Church of the Diocese stands, the Bronx is on its Gospel or greater side, whereas Manhattan is on the Epistle side only. The hit told with the late Bishop, and he several times quoted it to emphasize the importance of Bronx Church extension.

The Seabury Society and Institute of Applied Christianity announce two plans, both connected with enlisted men and helpful to the Church. One is the free use of the offices and workers at 52 East Twenty-fifth Street, to do errands for parents of the South and West whose sons are in the service, such errands including that of providing for entertainment while in New York, if compelled to come to that city on war needs. Mail, banking and similar facilities are offered, together with parlors for the making of appointments with sons or other having to do with war work.

The other plan is a Summer School, held in New York, to give information to ministers and Christian workers concerning work for enlisted men. It is found that even some well known preachers have failed utterly on their initial attempts to speak to companies of enlisted men in the cantonments. It is also found that Christian workers are often unable to tell what to do for enlisted men. The Y. M. C. A. finds conditions to have changed completely, and it to be needful for speakers and workers to change with them. The society will seek to give the help by inviting preachers and workers, successful at the camps, to tell what are the new methods and how to employ them. Especially is the school held for Clergy who may be spending Sunday or week night in New York this summer. The sessions will cover June and July, and if the need continue, August as well.

PITTSBURGH.

Rt. Rev. C. Whitehead, D. D., Bishop.

The Pittsburgh Clerical Union held their regular monthly meeting Monday morning, April 22. There was a record attendance for the last twelve months. The place of meeting was Calvary Church. The essayist for the day was the Rev. R. E. Lee Strider, rector of St. Matthew's Church, Wheeling, W. Va., who presented his essay, which had already elsewhere aroused most favorable comment, the subject being, "The Church, the Ministry and the New Age." Mr. Strider was received by the Clergy most enthusiastically, and his treatment of the vital subject was unusually able, and created a remarkable discussion.

The Rev. David Vincent Gray will on the first Sunday in May assume charge of St. Mark's Church, Pittsburgh, to be worked by him in connection with Holy Trinity Mission, Monessen, instead of St. John's, Donora. Donora will be under the care of the Rev. Dr. A. A. Houbert, of St. Mary's, Charleroi.

The Rev. Floyd W. Tomkins, late of Wilmington, Delaware, on April 21 assumed the rectorship of All Saints' Church, Pittsburgh.

KANSAS.

Rt. Rev. F. R. Millsbaugh, D. D., Bishop

Grace Church, Chanute, the Rev. R. Y. Barber, rector, has taken on new life since the parish has had a resident rector. The church school has made the most substantial growth. The rectory is turned into a parish house on Sunday morning for the Primary Department, and four classes with thirty pupils are provided for. Miss Nellie Smith is the primary supervisor. She is also conducting a Teachers' Training Class, giving the G. B. R. E. course on Pedagogy. The new Junior Plan has also been put in effect. Every baptized child in the parish has a red Junior box for its daily prayer and weekly offering. The children are gathered together on Friday for instruction in the work and practice of the church.

A branch of the Woman's Auxiliary has been organized and a course of study will be pursued in the fall. In the meantime the rector will give some talks on the work of the church from the missionary viewpoint. One talk will be on the Virginia Seminary and its contributions to missions.

Two brass vases and a brass alms basin have been given the church in memory of the former rector, the Rev. George H. Mueller.

CONNECTICUT.

Rt. Rev. C. B. Brewster, D. D., Bishop.
Rt. Rev. E. C. Acheson, D. D., Suffragan

The Hartford Archdeaconry held its Eastertide sessions, in St. James' Church, Glastonbury, April 11. The sermon was preached by the Rev. F. W. Harriman, D. D., rector of Grace Church, Windsor. It was a very able presentation of present day problems arising, and yet to arise, out of war conditions, now prevailing. The remarkable unity among workers of various religious affiliations was emphasized, and the work of camp pastors was duly appreciated, as rendering valuable service for all men; and yet it is worth while, for the Church of Christ to steadfastly commend the fundamental truths of sacrament and worship.

This meeting was also the occasion for celebrating in a simple manner the tenth anniversary of the faithful work of the Rev. E. G. Reynolds as rector of the parish entertaining this meeting. Glastonbury is only about seven miles from Hartford, beautiful for situation, and the church property is well located and very attractive, within and without. Mr. Reynolds has done excellent service, with every prospect of continuing in the same line unto his life's end.

The patriotic spirit is very active in this State, and the Clergy of the Diocese are alert at home and in the nearby camps, and in the effective service of our country. In addition to the Rev. W. P. Williams, of New Haven, chaplain in the navy, and the Rev. E. C. Thomas, of Hartford, chaplain in the army; the Rev. Ernest de F. Miel, D. D., of Hartford, has returned to his Red Cross work in France. The vestry and congregation of Trinity parish, which he has served twenty-five years, voted him a leave of absence, with full stipend continued, till the end of the war.

On board the same ship with Dr. Miel, the Rev. John L. Lewis, D. D., rector of St. John's Church, Waterbury, sailed to engage in Red Cross or any other work over there in France. He not only takes with him the best wishes of his parishioners, but a gift of $4,000.00 in cash as an expression of their esteem, and has a leave of absence with stipend continued in full.

The Rev. Dr. Cyrus Townsend Brady, of New York, devoted the second Sunday after Easter to Cheshire, Southington, and Plainville, preaching in each place with much power, blending harmoniously fundamental spiritual truths with essential patriotic principles. He has a vision and a message.

LOS ANGELES.

Rt. Rev. J. H. Johnson, D. D., Bishop.

The New St. Luke's Church and Parish House, Long Beach, Calif., the Rev. Arnold G. H. Bode, rector, was dedicated on Sunday, March 17. The church is an attractive building of brick and cement; and will seat six hundred; the parish house is frame and cement and will also seat six hundred; the whole costing $30,000.

The Ascension of Our Lord.

There is real gain to the Church through the Ascension of our Lord. We gain a closer and more constant Presence. While Christ was upon earth, His presence was only a local presence. If He was at Bethany He could not be at Nazareth; if he was in Capernaum, He could not help those who were in Jerusalem. But now His presence is universal. Wherever two or three are gathered together in His name there He is really spiritually present. The real spiritual presence of the risen and ascended Lord is the strength and bulwark of His Church. We gain also in that Christ has by His ascension received fuller authority and power. He ascended to the right hand of the throne of God. From that vantage ground He is able to do more for His disciples than He would ever be able to do if He were with them in the flesh. It certainly was so with those early disciples. Christ was more to them after the Day of Pentecost than He was while He was with them upon earth. We are in the same position as they were; we have to fulfil the same ministry; we have to face the same difficulties, we have to overcome the world's opposition and apathy and unbelief, but we need not envy the apostles, for we have the same endowment of power, which they possessed. The promise holds good: "I will not leave you comfortless. I will come to you." "When the Comforter is come" our sorrow is turned into joy, and our lives become rich and radiant with the presence of the conquering and all-sufficient Christ.—Rev. F. S. Webster.

Christianity and the Community

Thy Kingdom Come on Earth

THE SOUTHERN SOCIOLOGICAL CONGRESS.

The Rev. N. C. Duncan.

The Southern Sociological Congress met in Birmingham, Ala., April 14-17.

This Congress is a voluntary organization of Southern men and women who are deeply interested in social service. An annual meeting is held and expert leaders selected to lead the discussions. The meeting this year was a win-the-war session, and all the subjects discussed were related to the war—the present situation and the problems which are expected to arise after the war. The Congress was fortunate in its selection of speakers, each bringing a message which was the result of clear thinking and actual experience. Among the speakers were Dr. Charles S. McFarland, Secretary Federal Council of Churches of Christ in America; Congressman Albert Johnson, of Washington State; Dr. Stockton Anson, General Secretary of the Red Cross; Dr. C. W. Stiles, United States public health officer; Dr. P. P. Claxton, United States Commissioner of Education; Major Bascom Johnson, Commission on Training Camp Activities; Dr. Max Exner, Secretary International Y. M. C. A. Committee; Miss Jane Adams, Hon. William Jennings Bryan and Rabbi Rudolph Coffee, Principal R. R. Moton, of Tuskegee Institute; Miss Grace Abbott, Mr. Frank Morrison and many other well known people, including English, French, Canadian and American officers.

Delegates were present from all the Southern States and the general sentiment reflected was that of the slogan of the Congress, "The loyal South advancing level with the firing line." The South is solidly behind the government in its prosecution of the war, and this Congress, representative of the whole South, met to consider how to mobilize, conserve and utilize all the available forces towards winning the war and making the world safe for democracy.

The sessions were held in the First Methodist Church, whose pastor is the Rev. George Stuart, who is well known throughout the country for his evangelistic and platform work. He is now doing a remarkable and constructive work as a pastor.

The principal address of the opening session was delivered by Dr. McFarland, his subject being the moral causes and aims of the war. He showed, by hitherto unpublished documents, that the attitude of Germany towards the league of nations was that Germany proposed to take the lead in any such league as might be proposed, and that it would be a league between victor and vanquished—with Germany as the victor. The issue was summed up in his closing words: "Thus we are engaged in the defense of the very principles and ideals by which we live and move and have our being; in a conflict between the sword of autocracy and the spiritual weapons of democracy; in a war against war; in the liberation of enslaved nations and peoples, among whom are the people who so blindly submit to their own enslavement."

And this summary accurately reflects the feelings of all who participated in the Congress—congressmen, Red Cross workers, officers and visitors to the battle fronts—also the whole country is coming to grasp the situation so well pictured by men from the front in their stories of German barbarity and Allied heroism—it is a struggle against barbarism and aggression.

Stress was laid on health, food and labor as essential factors in winning the war.

Never before has an army had its health and morals so safeguarded as the present American army. At the very outset it was recognized that contagious disease, and especially venereal diseases, threatened the fighting ability of our army. Immediately measures were taken to eliminate these dangers, and it is recognized that it is the duty of the Church and all social forces to see to it that the fighting capacity of the American soldier is not impaired, and the welfare of future civilization not endangered through the use of alcoholic drinks, and the immoral women who would infest the camps. These dangers are constantly being brought under control, and our boys have the reputation of being clean, high-minded fellows—they must be kept so.

Also, food was recognized as being one of the main factors in winning, and food production and conservation were urged. It is vital that every person produce some food, conserve what they have and send every available ounce to Europe. Few people realize how near the whole world stands to starvation should this year's crop fail. It is unpatriotic, sinful to waste an ounce of food when it is such a vital necessity in winning the war, as well as to alleviate the hunger of the world.

Labor's part of the program showed the need of protection of women and children in industry during the war, improved living conditions for the workers and wages sufficient to meet the high cost of living.

Some features which deeply impressed the writer were the wide representation of all classes, and the wide range and freedom of the discussions. Jew and Gentile, white and black, frankly and in friendly spirit, discussed the great social problems which confront us. The colored people had one section of the building and whenever one spoke he had something to say, and to which it was well worth while to listen. The simple fact of their being present and speaking for their race, suggested, as one delegate expressed it, that the solution of the whole negro problem was the best of both races getting together and frankly talking things over.

We are fighting the battles of democracy. We are fighting for the ideals which give justice to every man. We are fighting for the organization of society wherein the strong help the weak, where love reigns and justice is done. Only a Christian attitude towards the negro problem can solve it. The spirit of the race is reflected in a statement of one who sat in the negro side of the Congress: "We do want equality—not that equality on which designing, unscrupulous politicians plan, but the equality of justice."

At the business session of the Congress Bishop Bratton, of Mississippi, was elected President for the coming year, and certain recommendations were made which show the scope and aims of the Congress. The recommendations are given below.

Recommendations of Board of Governors.

1. That the Southern Sociological Congress lend its full effort in effecting a thorough organization of a State conference of social workers from each State participating in the Congress.

2. That the annual gathering of the Congress be continued and strengthened and that increasing numbers of the social workers participating in the State conferences be urged to attend the central Congress in order to prove experience and information.

Further, that the Southern Sociological Congress print in volume form the proceedings of the annual meeting, and also issue other bulletins which might be found necessary to publish selected proceedings of the various State conferences throughout the South.

This annual report and these special bulletins to be sent to all members of the Southern Sociological Congress, who by virtue of such membership would be members of the State conference of social workers in their respective States.

The Board further recommended and earnestly requested that the social workers in each respective State undertake to secure a minimum of one thousand of the Southern Sociological Congress at a membership of three dollars per member. It was recommended that of this three dollars one dollar should be turned over to the State conference, approximately one dollar should be used by the Southern Sociological Congress for publications and other educational material to be sent into the hands of the members paying such fee, and that the remainder should be used by the Congress in maintaining its executive offices and carrying forward the annual session of the Congress.

It was further recommended that an executive secretary be called at the earliest possible moment, and that such secretary, and that the present Educational Secretary, Dr. J. E. McCullough, be given clerical and other assistance in order to make an effective executive office, which could co-ordinate social work throughout the South and act as informational bureau for all social workers and social organizations in this territory.

To be loved is precious, but to love is far better. The power of loving is the noblest capacity and purest and deepest joy which is known to a human spirit, whatever may be the return that is made to it. Jesus loves the objects of His Divine friendship from the very fullness of His own infinite heart, and not because of their love. He came not to be ministered unto, but to minister; and, therefore, He loves us, not for what we do for Him, but for what He does for us. It is difficult for our cold, hard hearts to enter into this Divine feeling.—H. Macmillan.

Knowing as I do what the revelation of God means to me, knowing what God's fatherhood and the presence of God's Spirit is to my own life, my whole heart goes out in infinite pity towards those whose lives are unblest by what is to me the very pole-star of my existence. I cannot bear to think of some stumbling blindfold through the pitfalls of life while my hand is clasped by a never-failing Guide; or of others who look forward to the end of their earthly life with dread and trembling while I see only the outspread arms of the everlasting Father and the welcome of a life-long Friend.—Quintin Hogg.

Fifth Sunday After Easter: At last the Temple was completed "and the Children of Israel, the priests and the Levites and the rest of the Children of the Captivity kept the dedication of this house of God with joy." It is to be noted, also, that they "kept the Passover," thus linking together the two deliverances, that from Egypt and that from Captivity. The New Testament lesson, taken from Revelation, contains that announcement from "the seventh angel" which is the goal of all human history, and may be said to have begun with Pentecost: "the kingdom of this world is become the kingdom of our God and of His Christ"; and also a description of worship in the true temple, in heaven. This use of Revelation is appropriate as treating of the work in heaven and on earth of the Ascended and reigning Christ, and also is correlated with the restored Temple. The imagery of measuring the Temple with the reed and of the two olive trees is taken from the Book of Zechariah (Chapters 2 and 4). Furthermore, St. James' exposition (Epistle for day) of "religion," strictly speaking, of "worship," with a direct reference to what goes on in Church buildings, viz., that true "worship" is a visiting of the needy in their affliction and a keeping of one's self unspotted from the world, is a fine background against which to consider the ancient temple of God; while the devotional exercises on that glad day of dedication, with the obedience to the law of sacrifice, are the Old Testament background of that prayer in our Lord's Name with which the Gospel for the day is concerned. Equally appropriate is the Old Testament Alternate in which the prophet exhorts Judah to "wait upon Jehovah" and "to be glad and rejoice" when their captivity should be at an end, a prophecy now fulfilled.

The New Testament lesson for Sunday evening begins the Epistle to Hebrews, which is read in course during two weeks. This Epistle not only fits the season by its treatment of the Ascension and Heavenly Priesthood of our Lord, but fittingly accompanies the morning lessons on the ancient Temple and its spiritual counterpart in heaven. Inasmuch as the Ascension of our Lord ushers in the dispensation of the Spirit and the New Covenant, Ezekiel's prophecy of the latter as following after Judah's "Resurrection" from exile, is taken for the corresponding Old Testament lesson.

Week days are mainly Rogation and Ascension. In the use of Daniel 7 for the latter (recognized as appropriate by the English Lectionary), there is no departure from our Historico-topical plan. John 20:10-17 for Wednesday evening would do for Eve of Ascension and also fittingly close Rogation by making prayer itself ascend from earth to heaven.

In accordance with a request made by a correspondent, the attempt will be made in this and subsequent articles to include a brief reference to Sunday lessons one week ahead. Nehemiah's prayer (Sunday after Ascension) that God would help those whom He had redeemed is a connecting thought linking Easter to Pentecost; while the marriage supper (Rev. 19:9), leading up to the Son who goeth forth to war, would seem to be a fit prelude to the coming of the Spirit who wields the sword of truth. In the evening Joel's prophecy of the Spirit is accompanied by the work of Him "who is set on the right hand of the majesty in the heavens."

Lessons On the Ascension.

When we declare our belief in Christ's Ascension, we declare that He has entered upon the completeness of spiritual being without lessening in any degree the completeness of His humanity. The thought is one with which we need to familiarize ourselves. We cannot, indeed, unite the two sides of it in one conception, but we can hold both firmly without allowing the one truth to infringe upon the other. And as we do so we shall see how the Ascension illuminates and crowns the lesson of the Resurrection; how it brings home to us now all that the apostles learned by their companionship with Christ, their earthly Teacher, and with Christ, their risen Lord. By the Ascension all the parts of life are brought together in the oneness of their common destination. By the Ascension Christ in His humanity is brought close to every one of us, and the words "in Christ," the very charter of our faith, gain a present power. By the Ascension we are encouraged to work beneath the surface of things to that which makes all things capable of consecration.—Bishop Westcott.

We are stepping down from resurrection ground when we begin to talk about nature and temperament. Unquestionably these are powerful factors in the ordinary experience of mankind, but the "Children of the Resurrection" have left mere nature—and most of all their fallen nature—behind in the place of death; and so they are to compute the possibilities of attainment that lie before them not by a reference to nature, but to grace. Surely it is of the glory of grace that it raises us above nature, and the strength of God is made perfect in human weakness.—W. H. M. H. Aitken.

Ascension.

N. B. T.

He led them out as far as Bethany,
By the old way—the little trusting band
That lately had received Him joyfully
Back from the shadow land.

And while they stood upon the hill's green slope,
Their hearts yet shining with the Easter light,
Suddenly He—their guide, their stay, their Hope—
Was taken from their sight.

Yet as He went He blessed them, and the cloud
Grew luminous above each upturned
face;
Angel-attended, comforted, they bowed
And worshipped in their place.

Still for the spirit there is Bethany;
Though the strange years are fraught with endless strife,
Still Thy disciples' vision men may see
On the high hills of life.

Still we may feel Thine angels at our side,
Thyself beyond the shadows that en-fold,
And still return serene and satisfied
As they returned of old.

The earth is full of tumult and of doubt,
We know not what the hidden end may be—
O strong ascended Saviour, lead us out
As far as Bethany!

Personal Peace.

The peace of which Christ spoke in the upper chamber at Jerusalem that last turbulent night of His human life, differs definitely from what we usually name as peace. It stands over and beyond peace after pain, peace after war, peace after storm, peace after reconciliation or remorse—being all these, yet more than they all. No heart can comprehend it who has not experienced it, and no heart that comprehends it can put it into mere terms of language. Jesus Christ Himself coined for it the one and only adequate phrase—"that passeth understanding." Sometimes we name it, in our human vocabulary, "personal peace."

That dim evening in the upper chamber the Lord had spoken long of many things; it was toward the end of His memorable farewell that He suddenly turned an illuminating light, as it were, upon all that had gone before: "These things have I spoken unto you that in Me ye might have peace." The wistful band had listened to a discourse that night that must have vaguely disturbed even while it thrilled them, for not only did the Master speak of love, of prayer and profoundly of heaven, but now and then in His talk there sounded strange prophecies of unhappy things—of trial and persecution, of imminent loneliness, of "weeping and lamenting" while the world should rejoice. Surely their hearts warmed to the sudden golden pledge: "that in Me ye might have peace." Even though the next sentence sounded again the solemn note of tribulation, they must have rejoiced. An hour later they crossed dark Cedron to take part in the awful drama of Gethsemane, but who can say that in all the stress and shame of that dark hour they utterly forgot? Years afterward they met gloriously the fire and the sword, unperturbed—strongly panoplied with this selfsame peace.

The natural world furnishes us an illustration of the difference between the two kinds of peace in the spiritual world—outer peace, that is dependent on comparison, or on external stimuli, and the inner or personal peace that has its origin within. The ocean knows two varieties of peace—the calm that descends on its tired waters after the tempest has passed, and the zone of perfect tranquility far below the surface that did not stir during the storm's worst fury. After a hurricane has finished its work of destruction the stillness of the atmosphere means peace to the tortured land below; but at the height of the terror there existed, in the very heart of the whirlwind, a pocket of peace—a little area, so the scientists assert, that was altogether still. It is this inner, central peace that parallels the personal peace which Christ bequeathed to his followers those centuries ago, just before the storm overtook them. Peace I leave with you; My peace I give unto you—a legacy as valid now as then, and as truly ours as theirs.

The influence of this inner, personal peace is not confined to times of great sorrow and stress. Through all the petty difficulties of daily living it pervades and keeps the soul. Most of us can search our memories and bring to mind at least one human being who seemed the unmistakable possessor of the spiritual serenity. As we remember them, they moved happily enough along the commonplace lanes of daily life, busy and serene—smiling in the cross face of petty worry, gauging small trials at their negligible value, refusing to fret—overcoming the heaviest obstacles by the very strength of their still-hearted calm. And invariably we shall recall, also, that these were the men and women who were able to stand when their hour of disaster came. They were already in the cleft of the rock when the tempest passed by.

Surely today, of all times, we need to avail ourselves of that legacy. The red wrath of war is upon us; all the old tranquil habits and customs of life are being set aside. Our eyes are weary with the vision of stricken fields, our ears, with the cry of the world's unprecedented anguish. It seems unbelievable that peace in any sense or any form should have survived this cataclysm. Yet the calm Voice in the upper chamber at Jerusalem speaks on, not to twelve men alone nor for their brief life-times alone, but to each of us, now, in this incredible hour. If nature cannot precipitate a mighty tumult without intensifying the peace of that strange, secluded, inner part of the storm, so the most turbulent hour of life deepens and broadens in the trusting heart that still small area that the tempest cannot touch. Three days after St. John descended from the upper chamber he climbed Calvary and endured its earthquake and its agony with a calmness he could never have known before; at the very centre of his soul there was peace. Moreover, time is nothing when it comes to these things of the spirit. The very same peace that wrought for the beloved disciple has place today in those hearts that receive and retain it. The soldier's wife or mother, who rests on God even while she hears the thunder of battle, knows what it is; the soldier himself, quiet in the thick of the fight, acknowledges it. All of us, whatever the nature of our sorrow or of our pain, realize its power. It is the resistless, incomprehensible peace that overcomes the world.

The Land Where the Big Guns Boom.

"What is Flanders?"

It is the western part of Belgium.

If you know nothing or little about Flanders, let us tell you something of this wonderful part of a wonderful country, the land of chivalry and romance, the home of brave women and brave men, the inspiration for many arts and the birthplace of many artists.

All that, however, is in the past. Flanders of the present is a nightmare—its people depleted, its villages destroyed, its homes in ruins, its art treasures lost to the world forever by the mailed fist of the German war machine.

War is no stranger to Flanders. For the last 1,500 years the Flemish people have had a strange and varied history, partaking in many wars under many different leaders, owing allegiance to many princes and countries. Yet they have continued to preserve their own art and to maintain their love of the picturesque and the simple life.

The Flemings are in origin a Germanic people, while the Walloons, as the Belgians living in the eastern part of the country are called, are more French in their ancestry. The Flemings are kin to the Dutch and at one time were a part of the United Netherlands.

And now for a bit of history: In the Middle Ages Flanders was a powerful principality, which, while under the suzerainty or guardianship of the French King, was virtually independent. The northeastern provinces were added to the Holy Roman Empire, an empire of central European States similar to the German Empire of today, in the eleventh century.

In those days the Counts of Flanders were regarded as the richest princes in Europe and said to be far more wealthy than many of the kings.

At one time Flanders came into the possession of Spain, when Spain was one of the mightiest of world powers. It again returned to the rule of French kings and at one time was governed by Holland. In 1830 it finally liberated itself from both Holland and France and the modern kingdom of Belgium was formed.

Flanders is noted for its historic cities, particularly Ghent and Bruges. Ghent has been called the City of Flowers and the Soul of Flanders. It was the home of the Flemish art. It was here that the peace of 1815, which concluded the war of 1812, was signed by the commissioners of Great Britain and the United States.

Bruges is a picturesque old city, a city of bridges and the Venice of the North. There the early printer Mansion taught his art to the English merchant Caxton, who carried the art to England.

All the arts have flourished in Flanders. Indeed, in the early Middle Ages it might be said to be the centre of industrial art in Europe. Even now the tapestries of Bruges, the laces of Ghent have their praises sung, and the towers of the ancient country have inspired a host of poets, for its old bells and its ancient architecture have been the joy of artists from every part of the world. Alas! The cruel invasion of the Germans has reduced to ruins the historic Cloth Hall at Ypres, which was built by that Count Baldwin who afterward led a crusade at Constantinople, and have made other towns unrecognizable.

The loss to the world of art by the invasion of Flanders cannot be estimated, and now most of its art objects are merely a memory.

The people of Flanders have seen their beautiful cities reduced to ruins and their people enslaved by a cruel conqueror. At the same time they have seen France and England come to their assistance. Flanders will be grateful. It will look with more favor on the studying of French, and English, too. Its Low Dutch language will give way to the more friendly tongues of its allies and, as we hope, its rescuers.

What will happen to Flanders after the war? Why, it will return again to its former happy state in the course of time. Its courageous people will face with gladness the task of reconstruction. The world will remember the gallant stand of the Flemings against the advancing German host and will lend all its power to restore the beauties of the valiant country of the Lowlands.—Eagle.

Right of Way for Uncle Sam.

This is all that we need to know about the laws of war as they concern women in their homes: Give Uncle Sam and his army the right of way; employ no unnecessary labor, whether you can afford it or not; don't waste; buy what you need when you need it; make things last longer; save and lend your savings to the government so that the war, well fought, may be over the sooner! It is not much, really. Yet it is the complete answer to the puzzling question, Why not business as usual? and it contains in its spirit the answer to that even more puzzling, though less financially important question, Why not pleasure as usual?

Recreation is not a luxury; art is not a luxury. Give the war the right of way and take all the pleasure that life affords after that. It is again just a question of priority in time and money. If you cannot free your maid for war service and at the same time leave your home to go to a concert, do without the concert; if you cannot buy your share of Thrift Stamps and pay the price asked for seats at a good play, don't go to the play until the managers reduce their prices. Whatever the evil gifts which war carries in her hands she brings one good one, the best possible cure for boredom, which is work for idle hands to do.

To thousands of American women whose leisure was a burden because they did not understand the priorities of peace the work of war is itself a recreation that takes the place of dancing and cards and restaurants. And the work of war which is done in the home, the quiet, unostentatious freeing of materials and labor, is as important a war work as nursing or Red Cross service. Measure your time as you do your money; leave a margin for companionship and recreation—for whatever to you is recreation—and then add the gift of your leisure to the loan of your savings. Your country needs them both.—Edith J. R. Isaacs, in Good Housekeeping.

Thanks.

Eugenie du Maurier.

Father, I thank Thee for the love that called me to Thy fold;
The Hand that held me when I sought to loose its gentle hold.

I thank Thee for temptations past when Thou didst hide away

To let me learn the feebleness of my poor heart of clay.

I thank Thee for the trials sent to crush my haughty pride;

I thank Thee, too, that I have learned my very weakest side.

I thank Thee for the silent fight—the victory Thou didst win;

Though hidden Thou hast aided me to conquer self and sin.

I thank Thee for the broken ties that bound me to the earth;

I thank Thee for the sorrow-seeds that to bright buds give birth;

I thank Thee for the lesson taught to lean on none save Thee,

That rest in any human heart must ne'er be sought by me.

But, oh, my God, I thank Thee most for coming back once more

And bringing e'en a greater peace than e'er I felt before.

The Heart Giveth Grace to Every Art.

Emily Orne Bensel.

Whatever objects we may have in life, whatever duties to perform—whether the task be difficult or easy, all can be accomplished if done with a willing and cheerful heart. If the artist has a picture to paint his heart must be in the task in order to make it easy and graceful. When a poem is to be written the thoughts must come from the writer's heart if it is to reach the heart of the reader. In the construction of a handsome edifice, the heart as well as the hand of every employee from the architect to the mason must be in the work with earnestness of purpose, if the design is to be perfected and grace and finish are to be given to the structure.

In the adornment of a house or of a person, if the heart does not accompany the handiwork the lack is made evident by awkward, ungraceful results. In the efforts made for the attainment of our education, slow indeed would be the progress without a willing mind; our teachers would become discouraged, their exertions would prove futile, and our requirements would amount to nothing because of their incompleteness. This subject suggests the labor of the convicts, those doomed to penal servitude for a series of years: how tiresome must be their lot—going through their round of duties in a mechanical way, with no purpose in view save that of expiating their offenses; their employment uncongenial, performed in monotonous silence; their hearts, if they are not wholly hardened, far distant with those they love!

Every individual must have some duty assigned him in life, whether it be great or small, and its success depends upon the application of the whole heart and soul to the matter. During the Revolution, when the country was in a precarious condition and the struggle for independence was great, the people entered heartily into the cause with their slender resources. History tells us that "when Israel Putnam heard that American blood had been spilled, he left his oxen yoked in the field, and, without changing his working clothes, mounted his fastest horse and hurried to Boston." His interest in agricultural pursuits vanished, while his heart beat high with patriotism.

Life-time devotion to a pursuit would seem to broaden rather than to narrow one's nature. Longfellow, whose heart was large enough to make his art great, is a pleasanter picture in the midst of the love given him by the whole world than is the moody Tennyson, whose friends were kept from him by an icy barrier which gradually narrowed down until it shut him away from all but the admiration that genius can always command.

Let us remember, then, that devoting one's heart duly to a chosen aim requires unselfishness and the conviction that the greatest beauty of any art lies in its power to help and instruct others. To the really great man praise from the humblest of his brothers is as sweet as honor from the highest, and the heart that is in the art must show through the entire work, giving to it its completeness and beauty. Then the life-work will have been a success, effort and talent not thrown away, and the world (even though only the little world immediately about us) will be better and wiser for our having lived, worked, suffered and given of the best we had to give.

"No man whose heart can sing at need
Will find earth's praises hollow;
The true brave song deserves its meed,
And the soul the song must follow."
July, 1882.

How Canning Widens Food Use.

Canning is not only a means of preserving food, but of making available to the public articles which would otherwise be consumed only in limited quantities. An instance is sauerkraut, the canning process being directly responsible for a tremendous increase in consumption of kraut which could be widely distributed in no other form. The packing of beans in cans has brought about an even greater increase in their consumption. It has multiplied the demand many times. Hominy is eaten today in tens of thousands of households which scarcely would have so much as heard of the existence of this most wholesome, nourishing and economical food product. People are enabled by the canning business to have pumpkin pies the year around. Before the canning of pumpkin began, it was possible to have this vegetable during a period of the year not exceeding about two months.—Food Conservation Notes.

How She Had Used It.

George Miller, a Bible agent, called on a lady with the intention of selling her a new family Bible. She replied that the one she had was good enough for her use, that she had used it for a long time, etc. Mr. Miller asked to see it. On opening it a pair of spectacles fell out, whereupon the lady exclaimed: "Well, I declare, if there ain't my specs I lost two years ago!"—Ex.

Hearers and Doers.

Virginia Stanard.

"Myra is the best listener in my class," Miss Duncan often said. "She pays the closest attention of all the children; I wish more of them would take her for a pattern."

Myra overheard the speech one day, and it made her a little vain. She repeated it to her friends, Ellie Hale and Marjory Deane, who heard it with envy; they loved Miss Duncan and were always eager for her praise.

"I listen, too," Marjory said, "but sometimes I do fidget—when it's warm, you know."

Ellie sighed; she thought it must be wonderful to have lovely Miss Duncan say such a thing about you. "I listened last Sunday," she remarked. "It was the lesson about 'a soft answer,' and it turned two of my sharp answers soft that very afternoon."

"I liked the lesson the Sunday before," Marjory put in. "Do you remember it, Myra?"

"Of course I do," Myra answered with pride. Beginning at the beginning, she went over a part of the lesson in question. "It was about hearers and doers of the word, and Miss Duncan did make it so interesting!" The others were astonished to find that she could repeat the teacher's talk almost word for word.

"I don't wonder she calls you a good listener," Ellie said, admiringly. Her blue eyes looked a little wistful, for Ellie's memory was very short, and she knew it.

The next Sunday the lesson subject was loving kindness, and the six twelve-year-old girls in the class thought they had never seen Myra more quiet and attentive. They noticed, too, that Miss Duncan's eyes turned to her oftener as she illustrated the lesson with a little parable. After the classes were dismissed Miss Duncan came up to Myra, as she waited at the door for Ellie and Marjory.

"Myra," she said, "a new family has moved in on your street, and I want my class to call on the little daughter of the family and if possible bring her to Sunday school with you. She is about your age, I think. I haven't time, now, to tell the others, but you will see to it, won't you?"

Myra wrote down the address in her little note-book. "I won't bother the others with it," she thought. "At least, not till after I've gotten acquainted with this girl myself." In the back of her head there was a vague idea that it would be fine to surprise Miss Duncan and the others by bringing Lucy Bates unannounced next Sunday. Ellie was diffident and Marjory forgetful, so she would not trust the task to them; and the other three girls had already disappeared. As she walked home with her two friends she felt pleased at the thought of taking the whole duty on her own shoulders.

But somehow, as the week went by, she put off from day to day calling at the Bates home. Once or twice she saw shy little Lucy in the street, and started to speak to her, but something interrupted. When Saturday evening came she realized with dismay that nothing had been done. She was almost glad to hear that Miss Duncan had been called out of town and that a substitute would have the class next day. "I'll know Lucy before Monday night," she said to herself.

But on Monday company came, on Tuesday Ellie brought in a fascinating new book, and so the week went. Meanwhile news came that Miss Duncan was not well and that she would be absent for a month. Myra grieved honestly for her teacher, but she could not help feeling a little relieved to think that now she need not hurry about getting acquainted with Lucy Bates. "I want to know her," she thought, "but there are so many other things to do."

Ellie and Marjory surprised her one day by reporting that they had been to see the little girl, who was not at home, they said. "Why, I didn't even know you two had heard about her," Myra replied. She was somewhat worried. "I am going as soon as I can," she told them. "Miss Duncan asked me to."

A few days afterward Myra went to stay with her little cousins a few miles out of town. When she boarded the train, coming home, she was overjoyed to see Miss Duncan in the seat just ahead. But her heart sank as she realized that her companion was Lucy Bates. When Miss Duncan introduced them she tried to smile at the pale little girl, but the smile twisted somewhat wryly.

"It was Lucy's grandmother whom I was visiting," Miss Duncan explained. "Lucy came up to stay, too, for a little while."

"Oh!" was all that Myra could say.

"I got homesick," Lucy said, shyly.

"She means homesick for her grandmother's," the teacher explained. She looked at Myra a little keenly. "I am sorry to say Lucy does not like our town very well. The truth is, she is lonely."

Miss Duncan's eyes were kind, though she did not smile. But Myra would not look up. She gazed at the toe of her slipper, instead, and wished the train would go faster. When they reached the station, however, she turned to Lucy with a little catch in her voice, "I have been horrid," she said, "in every way. But I am coming tomorrow, if you will let me in."

Lucy's little face flushed with pleasure, and she smiled brightly. "I'll be at the gate," she said.

After Lucy had been turned into her own yard the other two walked along in silence for a while.

"At last Myra spoke. 'I am thinking about the 'hearers and the doers,'" she said, moving a little closer to her teacher.

Miss Duncan understood. "It's good to be a hearer, dear," she said. "But by itself hearing doesn't amount to much, you see. It's like a tree all blossoms and leaves, that never bears any fruit."

Myra told Ellie and Marjory the whole story; she did not spare herself. "I don't deserve it," she finished, "but Lucy is coming to class with me next Sunday." She lifted her head and looked at the two girls. "And I'm going to try to be more than a good listener," she said.

Five Little Brothers.

Five little brothers set out together

To journey the livelong day;

In a curious carriage all made of leather

They hurried away, away.

One big brother and three quite small

And one wee fellow, no size at all.

The carriage was dark and none too roomy.

And they could not move about;

The five little brothers grew very gloomy.

And the wee one began to pout.

Till the biggest one whispered: "What do you say?"

Let's leave the carriage and run away."

So out they scampered, the five together

And off and away they sped,

When somebody found the carriage of leather,

O my, how she shook her head!

'Twas her little boy's shoe, as every one knows.

And the five little brothers were five little toes.

Booj and the Fire.

By Addison Howard Gibson.

("Booj" was a real dog, and this story is based on a true incident.)

Rex Rogers had wanted a dog ever since he was old enough to express his boyish wishes. But his mother, with strong prejudices against dogs, had always supplied something else. Rex, however, had never been backward in objecting to the "something else," whether it was a stuffed calico dog or a ball for himself and Ruth. He wanted a life dog; and the wish had grown with his years.

One day a covered wagon had stopped at the ranch, and the travelers had camped for the night. With them came a brown dog, wayworn and footsore from his long tramp, following the wagon from New Mexico to Oklahoma. Rex found him back of the stable on some straw where the tired dog had dragged himself to rest. He was very friendly, and when Rex brought him a pan of milk the shaggy fellow lapped it eagerly, and seemed to thank his kind-hearted host with a wag of a bushy tail.

Noticing the attachment that had sprung up between Rex and Booj, as the dog was named, the owner left the dog at the ranch. Mrs. Rogers would have refused the gift, but she was sorry for the dog whose feet were too sore to travel farther. So she unwillingly permitted Booj to stay at the stable, where the kind attentions of Rex and Ruth in a short time restored the exhausted animal to good condition.

Booj was a large, intelligent fellow, a mixture of Shepherd and Newfoundland. He responded to kindness and soon displayed great fondness for the children of his new home. Whenever they walked out into the fields or played about the ranch, Booj was their faithful attendant. No sentinel on duty was more watchful than he, and no stray animal, or the hissing fussy gander that sometimes intruded on the playground behind the house, was allowed to disturb their pleasures.

Booj became especially attached to Baby Teddy, a toddler of less than two years of age. While Rex and Ruth engaged in a lively game, Booj would lie in the shade of the lilacs nearby, with Teddy playing by his side. No amount of rough pulling of his ears or shaggy hair ever drew sterner reproof from the dumb guardian than a certain mild look of protest from the beautiful brown eyes. If the toddling Teddy's roughness became too unbearable, Booj would simply get up and walk away. There was no ill-natured growling about it, and he was sure to be back on guard if Teddy ventured too near the corral or the stable where the calves and the colts were too handy with their heels for the safety of the young adventurer.

The good points of Booj won favor with Mrs. Rogers' brother, who was a visitor at the ranch. Uncle Amos had sheep in Colorado and it was secretly planned that he should take Booj with him when he left for his own home. The night before Uncle Amos was to leave Rex overheard the plan and caught sight of a new collar bought for Booj.

Rex was a young soldier. He would not cry, neither would he go to his mother and make a scene. He lay awake, however, for an hour, thinking of some way to defeat Uncle Amos' plan. After breakfast he confided in Ruth, and while their parents talked to Uncle Amos in the house, Rex coaxed Booj back of the orchard. Then the three entered a hollow and hurried toward a straw stack in a stubble field on the ranch.

They hadn't gone far when Ruth discovered Teddy toddling after them. To take him back to the house would delay them and perhaps spoil their chance to hide Booj till Uncle Amos had started to the station. So Teddy was made an innocent ally in the scheme and taken with them.

The straw stack reached, Rex and Ruth made a deep hole far into it. Here Teddy and Booj were held captives until the sound of their father's car on the road assured them that Uncle Amos had given up the search for the missing dog and had gone to take his train. By this time Teddy, tired from the tramp across the rough stubble, had fallen asleep. The faithful dog threw himself in front of the hole to keep guard.

Happy in their success in hiding Booj, Rex and Ruth went over to a pond nearby in the hollow to sail stick-boats. They had steered their mimic fleet with long cat-tails once around the pond, when a crackling sound was heard behind them. Running up the bank, they were frightened to see the dry stubble on fire. A careless traveler had not put out his camp-fire, and the tall dead grass by the hollow had caught and had quickly carried the blaze to the stubble-field. As they stood for a second undecided what to do, the wind flung the fire forward. In a flash the straw stack was in flames!

With cries of terror Rex and Ruth ran toward the blazing stack, calling wildly to Teddy and Booj. At the same instant the mother, hunting for the runaways, saw them from the orchard and the danger they were in. As she ran toward them she called in frightened tones for them to come away from the stack.

"Teddy's in there!" she caught Rex's agonized shout.

"Dear God, save my baby!" she prayed as she hurried on.

But even as she stumbled over clods and tangling weeds, she knew she would be too late! The heat of the roaring stack had sent Rex and Ruth back toward the hollow. Suddenly the despairing watchers saw a brown form emerge almost from the heart of the fire. It was Booj and he was not alone. He carried the wriggling, shrieking Teddy in his mouth!

As the dog hurried toward the hollow, they could see that Teddy's dress was beginning to blaze. Mrs. Rogers panted forward, trying to snatch Teddy from Booj's strong jaws. He bounded past her, past the screaming Rex and Ruth, who tried to stay him, and with a splash plunged into the pond, where he buried himself and his charge under the water.

"He's drowned Teddy!" shrieked Ruth, as the mother, wild with fear, rushed to the edge of the pond.

The next instant, however, Booj arose to the surface and swam to the bank, where he dropped Teddy, drenched but safe, at Mrs. Rogers' feet. With his superior dog intelligence he had used the surest means within easy reach to quench the fire in Teddy's clothing and save his life.

The ranch hands put out the fire before it did any real damage. Booj was treated as a true hero ever after. Nothing would induce Mrs. Rogers to send him away from the ranch.

"I've Thought of Somebody."

I've thought of somebody—a woman. When her story begins she was young and beautiful and living at her father's house. In the first Bible picture of her she is showing kindness to dumb animals and talking to a stranger.

When she went to marry her cousin, who lived in another part of the country, she rode with the stranger to meet him. She had two sons who quarreled. Who was the woman, and who were her husband and sons?

Answer to last week's questions:

Moses.

1. Among the bulrushes by the river in Egypt.
2. Mount Horeb, by the burning bush.
3. Pharaoh's court.
4. The Red Sea.
5. The wilderness.
6. Mount Sinai.
7. The smitten rock in Kadesh.
8. Mount Zebao.

Lead Pencils.

If you had lived a hundred years or so ago, you would have felt in vain for a pencil to scribble a memorandum on your cuff, reminding you to stop at the store on your way home from school. The reason the pencil would not have been in your upper, left-breast pocket is that pencils were a rare possession.

Goose-quill pens were plentiful, but it was not always convenient to carry a bundle of these, nor was it safe to trust an inkwell in your hip pocket. So when one wished to transfer one's thoughts to paper there were many things that had to be gotten together; and what is now a simple act, in those old days resolved itself into a State function. One had to find the ink, sharpen the quill, and get a cupful of dry sand to use in place of blotting paper.

An ancient manuscript of the thirteenth century shows evidences of having been ruled with a lead pencil. There is no proof that there was such an article, however, until more than two hundred years after this, during the reign of Elizabeth, when graphite mines were discovered in Cumberland. At once the idea of making pencils of this new mineral was thought of. Graphite is a metallic, iron-black, or steel-gray, flexible form of carbon, sometimes known as "black lead." It is found in the oldest rock formations in various parts of the world.

When first used for the manufacture of pencils, graphite was sawed into thin sheets, and these sheets cut into strips until they were small enough to fit into the groove in the piece of wood that was to serve as a protection. This method of cutting graphite entailed a great loss of material, nearly half the graphite being wasted in the process.

These pioneer pencils were anything but a joy to the user, as one was likely to get all grades, from the hardest to the softest, in a single pencil. For a time the point might move smoothly over the paper, leaving a clear, distinct line, and then, all at once it would become as hard and scratchy as a piece of flint, and make no line at all. Then some genius struck upon the plan of grinding the graphite and pressing it into shape, the particles being held together by some kind of binder.

For this purpose glue, gum and many other substances were tried, but without success. Whatever they used rendered the graphite only more brittle and unreliable. Sharpening a pencil in those days was a matter not to be entered upon lightly; the tough wood, for they had not begun to use cedar, had to be chopped away, and the point heated over a flame to a degree of softness that allowed it to be drawn out and rolled into a point between the fingers.

In 1795 a Frenchman by the name of Conte conceived the idea of pulverizing the graphite and mixing it with clay; the result that pencils of different degrees of hardness could be made, the grade being determined by the amount of clay used. Improvement followed improvement after this, and it was not long before a pretty good grade of pencil could be bought—that is, if one had the price. For that was before the day of penny pencils. One of the greatest improvements in pencil-making was in substituting red cedar for the tough, uneven woods once used as holders for the graphite core.

For many years Germany made most of the world's output of lead pencils. In early times the pioneers of the pencil-making industry came from that country to America; among them were the Fabers and the Backendorfers.—Barry Klegg in King's Treasuries.

Duty.

This truth comes to us more and more the longer we live that on what field or in what uniform or with what aims we do our duty matters very little. Or even what our duty is, great or small, splendid or obscure. Only to find our duty certainly, and somewhere, or somehow, to do it faithfully, makes us good, strong, happy and useful men, and tunes our lives into some feeble echo of the life of God.—Phillips Brooks.

But for the mirroring waters which cross our pathway, many of us would never see the stars.—Peil.

The death of General Thomas T. Munford will be heard with regret by his many friends, and will send a pang of grief to the heart of many an old Confederate veteran.

General Munford had lived to the octogenarian age of eighty-six, sixteen years beyond the allotted span of human life, according to the Psalmist, but he retained to the last the full possession of his mental faculties, and was in the enjoyment of comparatively good health.

He was prepared for the great event and heard without alarm the knock of the last enemy at the door, and we may believe that in the silence of a receding world he heard the billows breaking on the farther shore, and felt upon his brow the breath of the eternal morn.

May the sod rest lightly on his grave, and may the flowers of each returning spring distill their sweetest fragrance on the mound that covers his mortal remains.

RESOLUTIONS.

At a meeting of the Valley Convocation, held in Grace Church, Berryville, Va., on April 23, 1918.

On motion, Revs. Josiah R. Ellis and Giles B. Palmer were appointed a committee to draft suitable resolutions touching the death of Rev. Edward Wall.

A copy—Teste:

J. R. ELLIS.

Meeting at this time as a Convocation in the church of which he was for many years the beloved rector, and in the town where his many ministrations of love and sympathy are tenderly remembered, we deem it fitting and proper to place on record some note of appreciation and esteem, affection and regard for our departed friend and brother in Christ, Rev. Edward Wall, who departed this life August 2, 1917.

Resolved, therefore, That in the passing of Rev. Edward Wall into the fuller life in Christ we recognize and realize the loss of an able minister of the Church; a Christian gentleman in the community; a warm-hearted and loyal friend. As preacher he was a man of ability and striking force, profound in reasoning and sound in theology; as citizen, he cordially rendered to Caesar the things that were Caesar's; as friend, rejoicing to do with glad heart and mind the things which proved his warm-hearted devotion. We miss him in all these relations—we miss him to-day, but bowing to the will of the Almighty we note his "falling on sleep" as those sorrowing not without hope of his joyful resurrection.

Resolved, further, That these resolutions be spread on the minutes of the Convocation; that a copy be furnished the vestry of this church; to the members of his family and to the Southern Churchman for publication.

J. R. ELLIS,
G. B. PALMER, Committee.

BISHOP RANDOLPH.

The vestry of Emmanuel Church, Baltimore, places on its records this expression of the sorrow of the congregation at the death of the Rt. Rev. Alfred M. Randolph, D. D., Bishop of Southern Virginia, who at the time of his consecration as Bishop had been for more than sixteen years the rector of Emmanuel Church.

His praise is in all the churches, but nowhere will his memory be more revered than in this church where he served so long and faithfully. After more than thirty-four years of separation the impression of his edifying preaching, of his genial and loving spirit, and of his saintly life still abides.

To his bereaved family and Diocese the vestry extends heartfelt sympathy.

Hugh Birckhead, Rector.
James A. Latane, Register.

JOSEPH PATTON HALL, JR.

JOSEPH PATTON HALL, JR., for many years a vestryman and junior warden of St. Paul's Protestant Episcopal Church, Suffolk, Va., entered into life eternal on Tuesday, April 23, 1918.

His fellow members of the vestry desire to place on record their deep sense of the loss they have sustained and their sincere appreciation of his long years of faithful and devoted service. His quiet, but strong and helpful influence and example will be greatly missed and long and lovingly remembered.

As soldier in time of war, as citizen in time of peace, in business and community life, as well as in Church relationship and the closer links of friendship and family ties, Joseph P. Hall fulfilled every obligation with a conscientious regard for the welfare of others and a singular spirit of self-effacement.

We tender our sincere sympathy to his family and, in this hour of our mutual bereavement, sorrow with them in the pain of parting, yet rejoice with them in thankful realization of the ever unbroken tie.

Oh! blest communion, fellowship divine,
We feebly struggle, they in glory shine.
Yet all are one in Thee, for all are Thine.
Alleluia.

Be it resolved, That a copy of this minute be sent to the family, that it be published in the Southern Churchman and inscribed upon our records on a page dedicated to his memory.

Signed

John F. Coleman, Rector.

In Memoriam.

AGATHA LEWIS SAUNDERS.

In recording the departure of the deceased from this world to the "Father's house" of "many mansions," to those regions of light prepared by our blessed Lord Himself for those who love and serve Him, I am recording a grievous loss to the writer, a grievous loss to the Church militant here on earth, and more especially a grievous, not to say irreparable, loss to the mountain work in the Diocese of Southern Virginia at St. Peter's-in-the-Mountains.

After a lingering and painful illness, borne with the most wonderful courage and unflinching patience, MISS AGATHA LEWIS SAUNDERS, elder daughter of the late Peter Saunders and Elizabeth Dabney, his wife, departed this life on Friday, January 11, 1918. On the following Sunday, January 13, from the house of her brother, Hon. Edward W. Saunders, she was buried in the family plot in the cemetery of the town of Rocky Mount.

In loving remembrance of a beautiful life, the writer desires in this manner to record his sense of the great loss sustained by this community and by the Church at large in the death of the deceased.

For many years she was not only a most efficient helper in the work of her rector in Franklin Parish, but she was a most valued counsellor and adviser in the prosecution of that work, and a most intimate and dearly cherished personal friend.

For all these functions she was most admirably fitted. A trained and beautiful musician, she solved the question of church music in a country parish. Reared in the mountains, she not only knew its people—their virtues and their faults—but she loved them and gave herself to them in beautiful and unstinted service. Not only her native people called forth her love. She loved her native hills. Not a fern or a flower, not a bird or a tree, not a peak or a hollow, which in the aggregate make up the mountain scenery in the vicinity of her old home, escaped her knowledge and her love. She knew and loved them all. She revelled in the beauties of nature and saw in the gorgeousness of the landscape and the glory of the setting sun the reflected glory of their Lord and Maker and her Lord and Saviour.

To an instinctive and inherited love of natural beauty was added a highly cultivated and thoroughly trained mind of unusual strength and clearness. The beautiful poise of her mind was the most remarkable the writer has ever known in the case of a woman. Her judgment was rarely at fault. Nothing could divert it, nothing turn it aside from the right direction and its true objective. This trait of mind was doubtless an inheritance from her grandfather, Judge Fleming Saunders, a distinguished jurist of the old regime. Her father, the late Peter Saunders, exhibited in a marked degree the same judicial mind. She was, therefore, always a wise and most valued counsellor.

To speak of the beautiful home life of Miss Saunders, the years of quiet, gentle thoughtfulness and the years of beautiful unselfish hospitality, so lavishly extended at her ancestral home, "Bleak Hill," would be to prolong this brief tribute beyond its scope. It is sufficient to say that in the home she was always the cultured gentlewoman whose unaffected, unselfish sweetness won all hearts.

But if our dear helper and friend adorned the home, she glorified the school. In all the years in which she was a member of the staff of teachers at St. Peter's-in-the-Mountains, all the above mentioned qualities of head and heart shone most conspicuously. She gave herself wholeheartedly and unreservedly to her work. She believed in the mountain child. She knew his needs. She toiled for his good. Her faith was sure and her patience near akin to divine. And in the hearts and lives of many of her pupils, "She being dead, yet speaketh." May her mantle fall upon worthy shoulders, and may she herself dwell in perpetual light! A joyful resurrection awaits her. And then—the "perfect consummation and bliss, both in body and soul," in God's eternal and everlasting glory.—R. I. P.

Her rector and friend.

Iron Is Greatest of All Strength Builders

A Secret of the Great Endurance and Power of Athletes

Physician Says: Ordinary Nuxated Iron Will Increase the Strength of Delicate, Nervous, Rundown People in Two Weeks' Time in Many Cases.

MOST people foolishly seem to think they are going to get renewed health and strength from some stimulating medicine, secret nostrum or narcotic drug, when, as a fact, real and true strength can only come from the food you eat. But people often fail to get the strength out of their food because they haven't enough iron in their blood to enable it to change food into living matter. From their weakened, nervous condition they know something is wrong, but they can't tell what. If you are not strong or well, you owe it to yourself to make the following test: See how long you can work or how far you can walk without becoming tired. Next take two five-grain tablets of ordinary nuxated iron three times per day after meals for two weeks. Then test your strength again and see for yourself how much you have gained.

Numbers of nervous, run-down people who were ailing all the while, have most astonishingly increased their strength and endurance simply by taking iron in the proper form and this after they had in some cases been doctoring for months without obtaining any benefit. But, don't take the old forms of reduced iron, iron acetate or tincture of iron simply to save a few cents. You must take iron in a form that can be easily absorbed and assimilated, like nuxated iron, if you want it to do you any good, otherwise it may prove worse than useless. Many an athlete or prize fighter has won the day simply because he knew the secret of great strength and endurance which comes from having plenty of iron in the blood, while many another has gone down in inglorious defeat simply for the lack of iron.

Manufacturer's Note: Nuxated Iron, which is recommended above, is not a secret remedy, but one which is well known to druggists everywhere. Unlike the older inorganic iron products, it is easily assimilated, does not injure the teeth, make them black, nor upset the stomach. The manufacturers guarantee successful and entirely satisfactory results to every purchaser or they will refund your money. It is dispensed by all good druggists.

What we, when face to face we see
The Father of our souls, shall be,
John tells us, doth not yet appear;
Ah, did he tell what we are here!

A mind for thoughts to pass into,
A heart for loves to travel through,
Five senses to detect things near,
Is this the whole that we are here?

Rules baffle instincts—instinct rules,
Wise men are bad—and good are fools,
Facts evil—wishes vain appear,
We cannot go, why are we here?

Oh, may we for assurance sake,
Some arbitrary judgment take,
And willfully pronounce it clear,
For this or that 'tis we are here?

Or is it right, or will it do,
To pass the sad confusion through,
And say: It doth not yet appear
What we shall be, what we are here.

Ah, yes, when all is thought and said,
The heart still overrules the head;
Still what we hope we must believe,
And what is given us receive;

HATCHED 117 CHICKS.

John A. Clark, of Jonesboro, Ark., writes: "I hatched 117 chicks and did not lose one. Not a weak one in the flock." Mrs. J. B. Courson, Cordova, Ala., writes: "I have been using your tablets and did not lose a single chick. My neighbors want your tablets."

You will not lose a single chick either, if you will use Reefer's Ready Relief, which every poultry raiser knows saves baby chicks from dying of that dreadful white diarrhoea plague. A package of this new scientific discovery will save 500 baby chicks. Aren't 500 of your baby chicks worth $1.00? That is less than one-half cent apiece. I take all the risk and will refund every penny of your money if Reefer's Ready Relief fails to save your chicks. A million dollar bank backs up this guarantee. Thoughts For the Thoughtful

Contentment is not laziness.—Ex.

Fidelity in little things is one of the sweet tests of character.

We learn more from our own follies than from the wisdom of others.—Ex.

May we expect light on our difficulties when we refuse it on our duties.—Ex.

Opportunities improved are fragrant flowers; neglected, they are thorns of regret.—Ex.

All human love is the reflection of the divine in the life of the upward looking man.—Ex.

Do you make it a rule to ask the Lord to go with you when you start for your place of business?—Ex.

Nobody ever gets a real blessing from God without immediately wanting somebody else to do the same thing.—Ex.

Grace is power. That power whereby God works in nature is called power. That power whereby He works in the wills of His reasonable creatures is called grace.—J. H. Mozley.

Though we had all that God hath made, The joy of earth, the bliss of heaven, Yet were we still unsatisfied.

Unless the Giver, too, be given. His gifts are beautiful and dear; Without Himself how poor they seem—

The earth a desert, bare and drear, And heaven the phantom of a dream.—Selected.

Be not uneasy, discouraged, or out of humor because practice falls short of precept in some particulars. If you happen to be beaten, return to the charge!— Marcus Aurelius.

All sound beliefs or convictions are based on truth or reality. Without love all is selfishness, and selfishness is the essence of sin. Without truth, all is sham, and sham is the curse of the world.—Homilist.

If we lift up our eyes to heaven, God's glory shineth forth; if we cast them down upon the earth, it is full of His goodness. The hills and the valleys rejoice and sing; fields, rivers and woods resound His praise. We will think of God when we play and when we work; when we walk out and when we come in; when we sleep and when we wake; His praise shall dwell continually upon our lips.—Anna L. Barbauld.

"When the low sob dwells deep within the burdened heart,
And the wide nostrils breathe with closely hidden pain,
And all before is but a stretch of darkened years,
Met with a meek acceptance of the will of God,
There is a joy eclipsing every high delight,
As golden dawn eclipses all the morning stars."

I heard men speak continually of going to a "better world" rather than of its coming to them; but in that prayer which they have straight from the lips of "the Light of the World," there is not anything about going to another world; only of another government coming into this, which will constitute it a new world indeed; new heavens and new earth: "Thy kingdom come; Thy will be done on earth as it is in heaven!"—Ruskin.

Preaching is an institute peculiar to the Gospel. Nothing can be preached but the Gospel, so nothing can be done with the Gospel but preach it. It is not a mere law to be enjoined, or a philosophy to be developed by human thought, or a series of articles to be taught. In its naked essence, it is a fact of God's doing, a divine datum, a salvation provided, stored and offered in the person of a Saviour. As such, it is to be asserted, declared, published, heralded.—J. O. Dykes.

Life's journey almost past,
Tottering I stand at last
Close to the door;
Weary the way hath been,
And often sad through sin,
Now all is o'er.

The friends I walk'd beside
At noon and evening tide
Went long ago.
And evening's travel, grown
Ever more chill and lone,
Seem'd to pass slow.

Yer was it night, not day,
Thus slowly waned away—
Now dawn is nigh;
The day star's warning bright
Tells me the shades of night
All soon will fly.

Beyond that welcome door
I know—and, oh, for more
Why should I care?
I shall, my Saviour see
As now He seeth me;
Jesus is there!

If You Value Your Health

It is told by one who has himself experienced the Regeneration in Health which he encourages you to seek by the self - same means.

THE STORY OF A GREAT DISCOVERY.

The hardships of a traveling salesman's life had wrecked my health. My family physician diagnosed my case as chronic gastritis, brought on by disease of the liver and complicated by kidney trouble. I consulted specialists in Columbia and New York who confirmed his diagnosis. Months passed, I grew worse and was finally compelled to give up my work.

By chance I heard of some wonderful recoveries which had resulted from drinking the water of a little spring in the Mineral Belt of South Carolina, a picture of which spring appears on this page. In desperation I tried it. On the second day I thought that I could notice some improvement; at the end of the first week my appetite and digestion had returned and I was much stronger; at the end of the third week I felt that I was completely restored. That was eight years ago and I still enjoy perfect health.

Knowing that it had restored my health and believing that it had saved my life, I bought the Spring.

I then determined to see whether the water would restore others as it had me. During the year I shipped ten gallons absolutely free of charge to each of one thousand sufferers from chronic diseases. Only four reported "no benefit" from the ten gallons. The other nine hundred and ninety-six reported decided benefit or complete restoration. Many claimed that the water had saved their lives.

I realized that I had discovered one of the world's greatest mineral springs, and I decided to devote the remainder of my life to it. But how could I make the world listen; how could I make them believe my story? The precious water was running to waste while thousands were suffering. I said, I will make them believe me by showing my faith in them and in the restorative power of the Spring. I will tell them that the water shall cost them nothing if it fails to benefit.

The world listened!

Some wrote for proof and I sent them the letters which I had received from their fellowmen. Others accepted my offer without question. Thousands have written me reporting relief and permanent restoration from a great variety of chronic diseases.

But some of the water still ran to waste for lack of belief. I determined that every drop should be used to relieve the suffering of humanity. To this end I requested a physician friend of mine to come to see me. At my desk I opened my mail and showed him the letters from men and women from all parts of the country who had suffered and who had found relief. I gave him my letter file and induced him to spend several days reading my past correspondence with those who were using the water. I showed him the chemical analysis and letters from physicians explaining the medicinal properties of the water.

He believed, and as a result he has written this announcement for me.

WILL YOU BELIEVE?

I do not ask your implicit faith; only enough to try the water for three weeks as I did. I estimate that I drank about ten gallons, and I, therefore, offer gladly to ship you two five-gallon demijohns on my guarantee that if you find that it does not benefit you I will promptly refund the price, which is only $2.00. You must promise to drink the water in accordance with the instructions which I will send you and return the empty demijohns. I make you the sole judge as to whether the water has benefited you. I guarantee to refund your money if you are not benefited. I hope you will feel perfectly free to accept my offer.

This offer is extended to all who suffer with any chronic disease, except cancer and consumption; but I especially recommend the water for the treatment of stomach, liver, kidney and bladder diseases and for rheumatism, gout, uric acid poisoning, gall stones, diabetes, nervous headache and general debility resulting from impure or impoverished blood. These are the diseases most frequently mentioned in the thousands of letters which I have received; but my offer is open to any one who suffers from any chronic ailment. Yours sincerely,
N. F. SHIVAR, Proprietor.

Mr. N. F. Shivar, Shelton, S. C.:

Dear Sir—As you are well aware, in 1909 I was suffering with indigestion, stomach and liver disorders and all its train of horrifying phenomena for several months. I had lived on milk, soft eggs, shredded wheat, a very insufficient diet for an active working man, and of course, from disease and starvation was in a very low state of nervous vitality and general debility. I ordered 10 gallons of your Mineral Water, which I used continuously, reordering when necessary, and in four months from date I began drinking I gained 29 lbs., was strong and perfectly well and have worked practically every day since. It acts as a general renovator of the system. I prescribe it in my practice, and it has in every instance had the desired effects. It is essential to use this water in as large quantities as possible, for its properties are so happily blended and in such proportion that they will not disturb the most delicate system. It is purely Nature's remedy.

Gentlemen—I have suffered for years with nervous indigestion and kidney troubles. Derived more benefit from the Shivar Spring Water than from months at Hot Springs, Ark., and numerous other springs. I consider it the very best water extant.

Mr. N. F. Shivar, Shelton, S. C.: Dear Sir—I suffered with intestinal indigestion and the Shivar Spring Water has completely restored me. I would gladly recommend it to all suffering with indigestion, kidney and liver trouble. My father had kidney trouble last fall and he thought Shivar Spring Water saved his life. Respectfully, MRS. HARVEY DIXON.

I am anxious to get more of the Water. It has done me more good than anything I have ever tried for rheumatism.

MRS. H. C. EDWARDS,

It is doing my rheumatism so much good. My limbs are beginning to feel like new ones.

MRS. JAMES L. CARTER,
Columbia, S. C.

Mr. N. F. Shivar, Shelton, S. C.: Dear Sir—Until a few weeks ago my wife was a chronic sufferer from gall stones. She was stricken critically ill and nothing but morphine seemed to relieve her pain by rendering her unconscious. Rev. A. J. Foster, pastor of Shandon Baptist Church of Columbia, S. C., advised me to take her immediately to Shivar Spring. On consulting my physician he agreed that it would be best to do so without delay. In about three days after arriving at the Spring, she was apparently relieved and had regained her appetite. She has suffered no ill effect of the trouble since. Please publish this for the benefit of sufferers.

J. P. D.

P. S.—I suffered for eight years with kidney trouble and inflammation of the bladder. After using this water only a few days, I am entirely relieved and suffer no more effect of the trouble whatever.

FILL OUT THIS COUPON AND MAIL IT TO-DAY.

SHIVAR SPRINGS, Box 64-P, Shelton, S. C.:

Gentlemen—I accept your guarantee offer and enclose herewith two ($2.00) dollars for ten gallons (two 5-gal. demijohns) of Shivar Spring Water. I agree to give the water a fair trial in accordance with the instructions which you will send, and if I report "no benefit" you are to refund the price of the water in full, upon demand and upon receipt of the two empty demijohns, which I agree to return within 30 days.

Discovering God.

God loves to be discovered. From the time that man fell in sin, and before, God has eagerly, persistently sought to have man discover Him, sought to make Himself known to man, that God and man might be in closest fellowship and in perfect understanding with each other. But there is one key to the discovery of God; and those who will not use that key can never know God. Both Job and the Apostle Paul cried out in reverent wonder and worship that God's ways are past finding out. That is God's word to us, and is therefore true; at the same time there is a blessed truth, found also in God's Word, that as some one has well put it, "God's ways are past finding out, save by trusting." If we want to know God, we must first believe Him. If we want to understand some of His ways, we must first believe without asking to understand. The man who says he will wait until he understands exactly why God does this or that, and after he understands will then believe God, will never either understand or believe. Doubtless those who are lost because of their unbelief will never, through all eternity, understand God and God's ways. But a multitude of puzzling questions as to God's ways are instantly illuminated to us when, abandoning all our questions, we simply believe Him in blind faith. And the end, the glorious crown, of this complete and unquestioning faith in God is that some day we shall see Him "face to face," and shall know fully even as also we are fully known.—Sunday School Times.

The Quest.

O, Lord, the most fair, the most tender,
My heart is adrift and alone;
My heart is a-weary and thirsty,
Athirst for a joy unknown.
From a child I followed it, chased it,
By wilderness, world, and hill,
I never have reached it or seen it,
Yet must I follow it still.

In those olden years did I seek it,
In the sweet, fair things around;
But the more I sought and I thirsted,
The less, O, my Lord, I found.
When nearest it seemed to my grasping,
It fled like a wandering thought;
I never have known what it is, Lord,
Too well I know what it is not.

"It is I, it is I, the Eternal,
Who chose Thee mine own to be—
Who chose Thee before the ages,
Who chose Thee eternally.
I stood in the way before Thee,
In the ways thou wouldest have gone;
For this is the mark of My chosen,
That they shall be Mine alone."

The Time For Prayer.

"It seems to me that this is a proper time for prayer," the father of the family said as the clergyman rose to go. "Will you be good enough to lead us, sir?"

It was the last request the young minister had expected, and he was so much surprised that he faltered and stammered over the opening petitions. The home upon which this great sorrow had fallen was counted as an utterly godless home. The head of the house had the reputation of being an infidel, and the untimely death of the eldest son was the tragic close of a life of wild dissipation. The minister had not gone to offer spiritual consolation—that, he fancied, would be useless—but merely because his sympathies were stirred by the sad occurrence. As he left the house he said to himself that the request for prayer was probably a polite concession to his office; when later advances of his were met somewhat coldly the conviction grew.

Be that as it may, the fact seems to be incontestable that the basic ideas of religion are deep-rooted in the human heart, and are likely to come to the surface under the strong pressure of a critical experience. The tales of godless men praying fervently on the deck of a sinking ship are true to human nature. When desperate circumstances force us back upon our own weakness and helplessness, a natural instinct prompts us to appeal to a Power that is outside ourselves.

Such emotional appeals to God are always pathetic, but never logical. If God's help is valuable in a great emergency of life, it follows that His aid and guidance would be a real asset in the multitude of minor emergencies that occur daily.

If God has no active concern with the details of our lives, there is no good ground for calling upon Him in a crisis; but if the contrary is true, God's help all along the way promises us far more in results than a single interference can do. The best time for prayer in that godless household had passed when the son had run his profligate course. An earlier resort to God might have helped to avoid the unhappy experience that must have embittered the life of even the careless and worldly-minded father.

There is a suspicion of insincerity and unmanliness, too, in habitually neglecting God until we find ourselves helpless to turn elsewhere. We would not put any earthly friendship to so severe a test. It is an unconscious tribute to the patience and long suffering of our heavenly Father that we have the faintest expectation that our infrequent emergency prayers will reach His ear and command the blessing we seek.

If prayer is a mere pious delusion, there is no proper time for it. If, on the contrary, it is a dependable resource, we cannot consistently exclude it from any day of our lives. Too much that intimately concerns us is obscure and doubtful to admit of our picking and choosing the times when we need God's help, and the other times when we can get along very well without it.—The Youth's Companion.

"Look straight into the light, and you will always have the shadows behind." Yes, but more than that, you will see more clearly how to walk. Look straight into the light, and every year you will see more things that you must do, and more clearly the things you must avoid.—Bishop W. Ingram.

STATISTICAL.

We are publishing in another column extracts from two communications given to the press last week by the Census Bureau, containing some of the statistics of the religious bodies of the continental United States as at the close of the year 1916. The clergy will recall the questionnaire that was sent to them several years ago from the Bureau in its work of collecting these statistics, and where this failed to elicit the information sought diocesan and other Church officers were called upon for aid. The government officials had also, of course, the published statistics of all the different bodies at their elbow. Their figures, however, as regards our own Church, differ quite materially from those gathered at about the same time by our statisticians. The Census gives us 1,098,173 communicants in the United States in 1916, which is more than 40,000 in excess of those reported to the General Convention of that year and about 31,000 above those given in the Living Church Annual. Of ministers the Census gives us 5,544, the General Convention report 5431, and the Annual 5,598. The Census gives 7,425 "organizations," the General Convention report gives 7,862, and the Annual 8,054 "parishes and missions." These figures do not include our insular or foreign missions.

It is plain that absolute accuracy cannot be attained in such reckoning, nor is it to be expected. None the less the long array of figures given in this preliminary view are sufficiently exact for comparisons and generalizations, which is their chief value; and they furnish food for thought of a very serious and sober kind.

The population of the United States is now estimated as being considerably over one hundred millions. Of these a trifle over forty-two millions are reckoned as being members of some kind of religious organization. These, however, include not only our Jewish citizens who adhere to their old faith, but Mormons, Christian Scientists, Spiritualists, and adherents of numerous smaller cults which, whatever fantastic forms their religious beliefs and practices may assume, can hardly be called Christian. Eliminate these, and taking into account infants and children under the age of accountability, both those included in the Church membership and those who are not, and we have the result that not nearly 50 per cent of the American people are adherents of any Christian Church or sect or make any profession of the Christian faith at all.

This surely ought to give us pause. Modify these numbers as we will, take full account of the many who we may believe are Christians in heart and conduct, though making no confession of their faith, and even of the many more who would claim Christianity as their religion if they were challenged to identify themselves in this regard, but who do not feel at all bound to be governed by its precepts, and we still have a remainder of startling proportions so large that it almost forbids our calling ourselves a Christian people. It is a rebuke to our complacency which ought to sting. It is a challenge to heart-searching thought and questioning as to the methods of American Christianity in propagating itself and making of this country a truly Christian nation. Are they wise and efficient or are they weak and wasteful?

As Churches go, we do not suppose that the Churches in the United States are particularly chargeable with lack of enthusiasm or zeal. The amount of energy expended, of money contributed, of man-power and woman-power engaged in distinctively Christian work or Church work is beyond computation. And there are forces in reserve ever ready to respond to any special call that commends itself to a sound judgment as well as a religious impulse. It is not for lack of these, and certainly not for lack of the power of the Divine Spirit which God has promised shall go forth with His word and the faithful service of His people, that we must acknowledge so large a degree of failure. But a glance at our Census returns will show to any practical mind one source, at least, of our weakness. They represent two hundred and one religious bodies; or, eliminating those which are professedly or practically non-Christian, probably about one hundred and eighty-five separate denominations of Christians. These are working for the upbuilding of God's spiritual temple, are fighting against the hosts of spiritual wickedness, not only independently of, but in no little degree in opposition to, each other. There is, we greatly fear, more jealousy than sympathy, more distrust than confidence, more ignorance and misunderstanding than candor and good fellowship, among the discordant factions of such a divided host.

Denominationalism still has its apologists, but they have had their day and must soon disappear before the progress of plain common-sense. Ask the head of a great modern business or manufacturing corporation what he could do with a body of employees no better organized or co-ordinated than the servants of God in the United States. Ask any commander in France what he could do against the Germans with an army modeled after the one the Lord has to put up with in America. Are we never to forget anything or to learn anything? Has the triumph of the Kingdom of Heaven to wait forever on the discords of quasi political parties therein? Are we Christians going to discover nothing from the mighty events of these stirring days, when we see nations become invincible the moment they become united in a great cause, and another nation wasting away and threatening the integrity of civilization because it stupidly becomes divided against itself; when we see even national lines wiped out on the world's battle-field and broken armies standing firm and unconquerable from the moment they are consolidated under one command? Or have we no prescience to see that when the great things we are fighting for have been won, when a league of nations shall command international peace and comity and all the world has been knit in closer bonds, men will turn from these mighty tasks with a new sense of the oneness of man in God, a new reverence for Him who is "not the author of confusion but of peace," and a new contempt for the differences over which a divided Church will be found wrangling and misrepresenting the character and purpose of its Divine Head?

While the Evangelical forces of Christian America are divided into nearly two hundred denominations, it is to be noted that the greater part of these are merely sub-divisions and are frequently demarked by geographical lines. Thus the Lutherans are represented by twenty-one bodies, the Methodists and Baptists by seventeen each, white and colored, and the Presbyterians by ten. Eight denominational families contain nine-tenths or more of the non-Roman church membership, but five of the eight are subdivided into sixty-eight independent organizations. This illustrates the natural tendency of Churches that lose a sense of the value of historic order and continuity to break up into fragments, whether over indifferent points of polity or for other unnecessary reason. It shows that the divisions in Protestant Christianity arise from no inherent necessity as some suppose, but only from an over-insistence upon the doctrine of Christian liberty until it amounts almost to individualism; that they are man-made and not God-made; and that they will largely disappear when the great body of Christian people recognize the relative value and need of a working organic unity as compared with sectarian preferences and prejudices, pride of opinion, and the defense of outworn points of controversy which no one who really counts has any longer the time nor the inclination to attack.

If the energy, means and enthusiasm which are now expended on merely sectarian propaganda and defense were liberated for aggressive and united effort in behalf of the upbuilding of Christ's Kingdom, and the distracting and numbing and belittling influence of denominational narrowness and jealousy could be obliterated for wider vision and a mightier aim, the Church of God, with a single front and a single purpose, with all needful diversity of views and methods, could hold America true to the faith and obedience of Christ and bring the world to His allegiance. As at present divided, failure to an increasing extent will mock its efforts and the cause of God will suffer from the faithlessness of men.

Our own Church, preserving its organic unity with wide differences of view on certain matters, and somewhat boastful of its favored and recognized position in regard to this question of Church Unity, must lay to heart the problems presented by our divided Christianity for the sake of the larger whole. A supercilious or indifferent attitude, a narrowness all her own, a too careful looking upon her own things to the exclusion of the things of others, will condemn her of unfaithfulness to her trust just as surely as the most anarchistic sectarian of them all shall be condemned. Let us see to it that our own hearts are purged of pride and prejudice and uncharitableness, and then seek for something practical, something real and heart-inspired, to say or to do toward healing the needless breaches in other sectors of the defenses of Zion.

WAR NOTES.

Men Wanted for Y. M. C. A. Work in France: Dr. John R. Mott, now in France, cables that there is immediate need for large addition to the forces of the Y. M. C. A. to meet the demands being made upon the Association by the increased transportation of American troops to the scene of war. He wants at once a large number of first-class business men, capable of handling the business end of the greatly increased work for the welfare of our soldiers for which the government looks to the Association. He needs also additional workers on the ordinary lines of the Association's activities in the camps, etc., to take a course of training first in the cantonments here and then to take their places with the troops at the front. Needless to say, only men of the highest character and of a high degree of adaptability and common-sense are desired.

A Brotherhood Man to Be in Charge of the Religious Work of the Y. M. C. A.: Mr. G. Frank Shelby, who has had the task of selecting and placing the Brotherhood of St. Andrew workers in the various cantonments throughout the country, has been appointed by the Y. M. C. A. authorities to have supervision of all the distinctively religious work of the Association among the soldiers in France. He will have twenty-five Secretaries associated with him in this particular work. The methods of the St. Andrew's men in dealing with the soldiers in training and the character of their work has so impressed the Y. M. C. A. officials that they want Mr. Shelby to organize the work at the front on the same lines, which are just the old Brotherhood ways of working. It is likely that Mr. Shelby will accept the appointment.

Red Cross Week—Another Hundred Millions to Be Raised: The week of May 20-27 has been set aside as "Red Cross Week," when the American people will be asked for a second Hundred Million Dollars for the prosecution of the great and inestimably valuable work of that national organization.

It ought to, and doubtless will, require nothing more than that our people be told that the Red Cross needs the money for it to flow into its treasury in full measure. Most things about the war are too big for our comprehension, and this Red Cross work is no exception. In bleeding France especially, but into almost every war-stricken country of Europe, it has gone bearing the charity of America; feeding the starving, nursing the sick, mothering the orphaned, ministering to the prisoners, sheltering the homeless, relieving the destitute. Wherever hell has broken loose in a new place the Red Cross is there, ready for whatever min-istrations are demanded. The full story of its work for suffering humanity will never be written, unless the angels are making a record of it, but no man or woman can afford to miss having a share in it. May 20 is the time; and remember, this is no Liberty Bond business. This money is to be invested in the bonds of Heaven.

CHURCH ORGANIZATIONS AND MEMBERSHIP IN 1916.

Preliminary Statistics Issued by the Bureau of the Census.

Washington, D. C., May 2, 1918.—The Bureau of the Census has recently completed a compilation of the statistics of religious bodies in continental United States as of the close of the year 1916. These statistics are collected decennially under the authority of an Act of Congress, the last previous collection referring to the calendar year 1906. The decennial census of religious bodies for 1916 covers numerous items of inquiry, and the full report, to be published in the near future, will afford comprehensive information regarding more than 200 denominations and will give, in addition, comparative statistics for 1906 and 1890. The statistics have been collected mainly by correspondence with the local Church organizations, for the most part directly by the Bureau of the Census, but for certain denominations through some denominational officer or representative. The figures contained in this preliminary statement, therefore, are based upon actual returns for the individual churches, and, although some churches failed to make returns as requested, the figures may be said to represent a substantially complete report for each and all of the denominations represented.

During the ten-year period ended December 31, 1916, the total Church membership in the United States increased from 35,068,058 to 42,044,374, or by 19.9 per cent; the number of churches, from 212,230 to 228,007, or by 7.4 per cent; the number of ministers, from 164,830 to 191,722, or by 16.3 per cent; the number of Sunday school scholars, from 15,337,811 to 20,569,831, or by 34.1 per cent; the number of Sunday schools, from 192,722 to 207,789, or by 7.8 per cent; and the number of Sunday school officers and teachers, from 1,746,074 to 2,049,293, or by 17.4 per cent.

The total number of denominations covered by the statistics was 201, an increase of 13 over the number reported for 1906. This increase is the net result of the consolidation or dropping out of 16 small denominations and the addition of 29 small denominations, the latter comprising some which were actually in existence in 1906, but not then brought to light, and others resulting from consolidation of formerly independent churches, reorganization within existing denominations, etc.

Church Organizations.

The term "church organization" includes any organization for religious worship which has a separate membership, whether called a church proper, congregation, meeting, society, mission, station or chapel, etc.

The total number of church organizations in 1916 was 228,007, as reported by 201 denominations. The report for 1906 showed a total of 212,230 organizations, as reported by 188 denominations, and that for 1890 a total of 165,151, as reported by 145 denominations.

Church Membership.

Of the 42,044,374 Church members reported, 15,742,262, or 37.4 per cent, were Roman Catholics; 250,340, or six-tenths of 1 per cent, were adherents of the Eastern Orthodox churches (mainly Greek Church and Russian Church); 359,998, or nine-tenths of 1 per cent, were members of Jewish congregations; and the remainder, 25,691,774, or 61.1 per cent, comprised the membership of the various Protestant churches, together with that of a few bodies, such as the Latter Day Saints, the Spiritualists and others, not usually considered as belonging to any of the groups named.

In comparing the figures just given, it should be borne in mind that the Roman Catholic and the Eastern Orthodox churches include in their membership all infants and the children who have been baptized, whereas the Protestant churches do not, as a rule, receive young children as members; and that in the case of some of the more orthodox Jewish organizations only the male incorporators of the institutions or those who have bought shares or memberships in them are treated as members. The foregoing percentages, therefore, overstate the relative strength of the Roman Catholic and Eastern Orthodox churches and understate that of the Jews.

The canvass showed 9 denominations which had a total membership of more than 1,000,000 each and an aggregate of 32,468,732, or 77.2 per cent of the entire membership reported for all religious bodies. These organizations, with their membership, were as follows: Baptist, Northern, 1,227,448; Baptist, Southern, 2,711,591; Baptist, National (colored), 3,018,341; Disciples of Christ, 1,231,404; Methodist Episcopal, 3,718,396; Methodist Episcopal, South, 2,103,061; Presbyterian in U. S. A., 1,613,056; Protestant Episcopal, 1,098,173; Roman Catholic, 15,742,262.

The aggregate membership of the several Baptist denominations (North, South, Colored, and 14 others) was 7,236,650; of the various Methodist denominations (Methodist Episcopal, Methodist Episcopal, South, Methodist Protestant, African Methodist Episcopal, African Methodist Episcopal Zion, Colored Methodist Episcopal, and 11 other Methodist denominations, 5 of which are white and 6 are colored), 7,165,986; of the Presbyterian denominations (Presbyterian in U. S. A., Presbyterian in U. S., United Presbyterian and 7 others), 2,257,439; and of the 21 Lutheran denominations, 2,463,265.

Ministers.

The total number of ministers reported, 191,792, comprised 20,287 Roman Catholic priests, 356 priests of the Eastern Orthodox churches, 719 Jewish rabbis, and 170,359 ministers of other churches, mainly of Protestant denominations. The percentage of increase in number of ministers during the ten-year period, 16.3, was somewhat less than that in membership, 19.9. The average number of Church members to each minister for all denominations in 1916 was 219. For the Roman Catholics, however, the corresponding average, 776, was much larger.

Sunday Schools.

The canvass showed 207,789 Sunday schools, with 2,049,293 officers and teachers and 20,569,831 scholars. These totals comprise 195,276 Sunday schools, with 1,959,918 officers and teachers and 19,951,675 scholars, conducted by Church organizations, and 12,513 undenominational and union

Sunday schools, with 89,375 officers and teachers and 618,156 scholars. The average number of officers and teachers to each denominational Sunday school was thus almost exactly 10, and the average number of scholars was a small fraction more than 100; whereas in the case of the undenominational and union Sunday schools the average number of officers and teachers was a little more than 7 and the average number of scholars not quite 50. The number of scholars in the Roman Catholic Sunday schools, 1,853,245, was equal to 9.3 per cent of the total for all denominational Sunday schools. This proportion was very much smaller than the corresponding one, 37.4 per cent, which Roman Catholic Church membership represented of the total. This difference is due in large part to the fact that the attendants at Protestant Sunday school include many adults, whereas practically all scholars in Roman Catholic Sunday schools are very young children, and in many cases the parochial school takes the place of the Sunday school. Moreover, as already pointed out, the total membership of the Roman Catholic churches includes all infants and children who have been baptized, whereas that of Protestant churches consists almost entirely of youths and adults.

A MODERN SYMBOL OF THE TRINITY.

The Rev. Oscar Woodward Zeigler.

Some time since a lecturer who had referred incidentally to some of the symbols with which the Church theologians in times past had analogued the idea of the Trinity, remarked it seemed impossible to discover or to invent a symbol which would have like cogency to modern thought. The statement clung in my mind as a matter of curious revery, until it finally took the form of a problem. The conviction grew upon me that there must be some such analogue, or it was bad for the doctrine of the Trinity, and even worse for modern thought. So warning to the scent, I started out with a series of eliminations to discover the road which would lead me to the discovery of that modern symbol of the Trinity which was needed for my peace of mind. I finally reached an exceedingly interesting, and, to my thinking, a thoroughly satisfactory philosophical statement. I decided that the elemental fact of modern ratiocination, which distinguished it from that of other ages, was that it is mathematical. I decided to extend to the intuition of "being" certain conceptions which were fundamental to the analysis of quantity; and lo! I had no sooner taken foothold of the ideas than my symbol of the Trinity swung beautifully into view on my intellectual horizon. Here it is: It is modern, cogent, real, and has exact polemic value! I confess it is a little bit difficult to understand, but not so much so as to require one to flee, as to a city of refuge, to the canon: "credo quia impossibile est." Mathematicians regard quantity as either continuous or discontinuous. Quantity regarded as continuous is conceived geometrically; regarded as discontinuous, it is conceived arithmetically. The former conceives quantity as an infinite unit; the latter as a series of waves of finite units. Identifying quantity as being: Man is being existing materially in time; God is being existing spiritually in eternity, which is something different from time raised to the infinite power. Both man and God exist in persons. Personality in man exists in multitudinous waves of being subsisting discontinuously in time. Personality in God exists continuously in eternity without beginning, continuance or ending. Man is a series of personal manifestations, who are born, exist in a complex of other like manifestations and die. God, on the contrary, either as ultimate fact of being, or as a limitation of revelation because of the limitations of the human mind, is conceived as a trinity, being existing continuously in three co-existent, co-eternal persons. The creeds of the Catholic Church are great outlines which in terms of human analysis compress and express these basal ideas of the Christian belief of God as a Trinity of personality and man as a real person. The credal statement is most beautiful. According to the creeds, One Person of this Trinity of being migrates from the Bosom of the Father, is incarnated and so becomes united in time and space with the real being man, in a real manifestation thereof, and after so living as man resumes His relationship with the Father, no longer in the Bosom of the Trinity, but by sitting at the right hand of the Father. That is, he relates himself under conditions of the cosmos with deity, of which he is co-being, as the agent of divine power. This is the full exposition of the symbol from the credal standpoint.

It opens up a pretty conception from the philosophical or human standpoint. The world is conceived as a poesis of God. Man, as his poema, rises from the stuff of life at the breath of God's bidding voice into divine consciousness in the person of Adam. He rises by the indwelling life of the Son of God into a divinity of being in Jesus of Nazareth.

JAPAN'S POLICY TOWARDS ASIATIC PROBLEMS.

(The following is the conclusion of the article by Dr. R. B. Teusler, published in last week's issue, which was accidentally omitted by the printer in making up the paper.—Ed. S. C.)

There are definite and weighty reasons why Japan is justified, considering world conditions, in establishing protection over certain areas of Eastern Asia, and insisting upon what is in one sense a Monroe Doctrine of the Far East. She knows that Germany will stop at nothing to gain her ends, and Russia has always been a serious menace to her national position, and even her national life. Russia dominated by Germany would constitute an immense danger to Japan and the whole of Asia. The greatest service Japan can render the Allies and humanity is to forestall the Germanizing of Russia in Asia. Japan seems ready and willing to protect Eastern Siberia. In agreement with the Allies, she should do this. German intrigue in Vladivostok could well excite serious consequences, and the sooner that important harbor is controlled by Japan the safer it will be for the cause of the Allies and the peace of Asia. The day will come when America will recognize the difficult problems which have faced Japan in this war, and applaud her loyalty and discretion in the way she has discharged her obligations to her allies in protecting the peace of the Pacific, and fully maintaining her treaty pledged with Great Britain.

Her attitude towards the Chinese is marked by increasing consideration, and her leaders are insisting upon a policy of kindness and justice rather than force in dealing with China. Japan is learning the value of applying Christian principles in international relations. This great war is dwarfing all issues except internationalism, and this it has pushed to the forefront and made the most tremendous problem of all. The old aristocratic tendencies of imperialism are giving away before the insistent demands of democratic forms of government, and with the new order there must be sweeping readjustments in international contacts and standards. The prophets of old believed in the salvation of nations, and nothing less than the Christianizing of international relations will bring permanent peace. This is the one great task for the nations to-day.

As a member of the same class in the Virginia Seminary, that of 1878, with the Rev. Frank Page, and one who had the privilege of his intimate friendship for more than forty years, may I express my appreciation of the notice of his life and work which appeared in the Southern Churchman last week.

Frank Page represented a type of man which is every year becoming rarer in our land. He was brought up in the country, on his plantation home, Oakland, in Hanover County. It was not a "country place" to which people went occasionally from their town homes, but the constant home of the family, who lived and made their living at their home. It was an old home, simple, godly, cultured, refined; a home with its traditions of Rosewell and of Yorktown, and its more recent memories of the peaceful days "before the war," and its experiences during that fateful period, in which the men of the family had borne their full part, and when Frank himself, though but a lad, had, with the ladies of the household, and with his younger brothers and the faithful old servants, passed through scenes not to be forgotten. And Frank was like his home, natural and the soul of honour; without a trace of affectation or sophistication, but rock-bedded in Christian principle and ingrained in Christian culture. The Bible and the Prayer-Book were his most familiar books, as they were the daily spiritual food of that home. Tell him the day of the month, and he could generally tell you from sheer familiarity how the Psalms for the day began. I never saw one whose home had made a more distinct and indelible impression on his mind and character.

When he returned home from Washington and Lee University the question of a vocation had to be settled. He had a strong leaning towards politics, and if he had entered the political field he would not have stopped short of marked success; for he had the easy manners and approach, the insight into men, the shrewd sense of good policy, the loyalty of nature, the ambition to succeed, and the capacity for honest work which would have served him well. But being his mother's son—her first fruits—he could not but give solemn consideration to the work of the ministry; and above all other qualities he had deep spirituality, and an honest desire to serve God and his fellow-man in the highest concerns of life, and this settled the question of vocation and made him a fit instrument for the ministry of the things unseen and eternal.

At the same time Frank Page was an eminently practical man, and it was just this combination of blunt honesty and wise policy, deep spirituality and every-day common sense, together with the broadest sympathy, which made his ministry acceptable and fruitful and gave him such influence, whether in a country parish in his own State, or in Texas or New York. The lasting impression he made in the first years of his ministry in Fairfax is shown by the insistent call of his first congregation to have him, whom they knew and loved come back to them—in spite of failing health and long years passed; and their unflinching devotion to him testifies that his ministry was faithful and blessed to the last. "In simplicity and godly sincerity, not with fleshly wisdom but by the grace of God," he had his conversation in the world.

Letters to the Editor

In this department the Editor will at all times welcome communications expressing opinions on the various topics which are engaging the attention of the Church. But the Editor will not hold himself responsible for such opinions.

No "Letter to the Editor" will appear in our columns except over the signature of the writer.

THE HOUSE OF BISHOPS AND THE SMYTH MEMORIAL.

Mr. Editor: I read your editorial anent the reply of the House of Bishops to the request of Dr. Newman Smyth et al. Like you, I was disappointed that it was a non possumus, although I did not expect otherwise. But I cannot see after reflection that they could have done more. The question arises, Have the Bishops the power to decide such a matter without the consent of the Church? The Bishops are the ordaining officers for the Church, but they cannot act without the authority of the Church. Every candidate for orders must be passed on by the standing committees as representing the other two, orders of the Church, before a Bishop can act. The powers of the Bishops cannot be used except in accordance with the law of the Church, for their actions are representative. If the Bishops had decided to ordain chaplains from other religious bodies, would they not have been acting ultra vires?

UPTON H. GIBBS.

La Grande, Ore., May 1, 1918.

(The Editor recognized the difficulty noted by our Correspondent, and also that the House of Bishops could not promise an immediate compliance with the suggestion of the memorialists. For this reason we intimated that a special meeting of the General Convention might be advisable if necessary to show our practical sympathy with the purpose indicated by the proposal. It was the lack of any positive or sympathetic action, rather than the inability to meet a particular proposition, which seemed to us so unfortunate.)

UNITY.

Mr. Editor: Permit me to express for myself, and some other churchmen, our gratification, I may say our relief, at the reply of the House of Bishops to the Newman Smyth Memorial, in the spirit of which we, nevertheless, deeply sympathize. We all so earnestly desire Christian unity that we could but feel afraid undue haste might cause a decision less wise than this firm, but gentle, reminder from our Bishops that there is no use in claiming a degree of unity which does not really exist, and which, if forced, would simply lead to confusion and further divisions. After all, is not a real, spiritual union of all Christians better than an unnatural, enforced, organic union of churches, which, perhaps, may never be possible, or even desirable, until our Lord Himself comes to take charge of His kingdom upon earth? Spiritual union can best be attained by avoiding vain rivalries and crimonious controversies, with simple Christian courtesy. It is a great thing to agree to differ. This spiritual union is already awake in the world, notably in some Virginia parishes, where "the Kikuyu incident" (which caused such a stir in the English Church) has been the constant practice for generations. By invitation of the rector, in the words of the Communion office, at the chancel rail of our colonial churches, Christians of all denominations forget their honest differences and gladly claim to be "all one in Christ." In our country cloirs sweet voices of all denominations "sing to the Lord their psalms of thanksgiving" in perfect harmony of tone and feeling. The Society of King's Daughters, interdenominational, and even international, demands no organic church unity of its faithful workers "in His name." The Y. M. C. A. and the Y. W. C. A. work also on the same principle. It is better to agree to differ than to pretend to agree. Let us strive for spiritual unity, and, for the present, at least, be content therewith.

ON READING THE SERVICE.

Mr. Editor: I am delighted to see Mr. Taylor's letter on the above subject, for a good rendition of the Service is by no means common. May I mention one or two rather common faults. One is dropping the final consonants. This, combined with lowering the voice at the end of sentences, often makes it difficult to know just what has been said. Not using the lips, but keeping them rigid while speaking, is a bad fault and makes some people's reading rather like unspaced typewriting. Observing commas seems to be terribly hard to some. The results obtained are now and then truly wonderful, often irreverent, and by no means what is intended. "Almighty Godfather of all mercies," I have more than once heard.

Some queer results are now and then arrived at by not pausing at the end of the lesson before "Here endeth," etc.

I well remember a really fine preacher who went through the service as quickly as possible, so as to conserve all his energies for the sermon. I fear there are not a few who also consider the sermon the most important part of the day's service. Is not this often the cause of the evil that Mr. Taylor laments?

Shouting the sermon has become so common that I fear many simply consider it "powerful preaching."

Life is, it must be owned, full of disappointments; but it is so, in order that we may learn gradually that we have nothing we may safely hope for but the fulfilment of that blessed will of God which has no false hopes or disappointments. We cling to all sorts of things and they snap in our hands, in order that we may learn that God alone is firm and His commandment exceeding sure.—Rev. H. H. Jeaffreson.

The Great Commission

News Notes from the Missions House.

Never before in its long history of two hundred and seventeen years has the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel been obliged to make such an announcement as that recently issued in connection with its annual meeting on April 25th. Originally scheduled for the evening, the meeting was changed to an afternoon hour. The explanation given is:

"The reason will appeal to everyone. We discovered to our consternation that it is the night of the full moon! We are ashamed that we had not found it out sooner. Pray tell all you can reach of the change, and assure them that they can all reach home before a raid can begin."

Bishop Montgomery, who has offered his resignation as the Secretary of the Society, has asked that during 1918 the gifts from living donors may be increased to 176,000 pounds in order that he may say that during the seventeen years of his Secretaryship the gifts have been exactly doubled.

Bishop Hunting, writing to a friend, April 24th, says:

"I start on my annual auto trip to the out-of-the-way places tomorrow. So out of the way, some of them, that I have never been to them, nor have any of my Episcopal predecessors. If you never hear from me again you might send a miner to dig me out of the sand, or a diver to find me in some river I will try to cross. I will cover about 2,000 miles, and over Nevada roads, that is 'going some, believe me.'"

Bishop Brent, writing to a friend in this country, says:

"I suppose it will become public that I have been given the colossal task of organizing and administering the Chaplains' Service in the A. E. F. God knows how little I have wanted it. I had hoped and expected to get things going and then slip out. This now looks impossible. I know you will say a prayer for me occasionally."

"This furnace of destruction in which we are living burns away the flimsy things. One sees from here the strength and beauty of constructive work as never before. Missions, being supernatural and built on the secure foundations of Christ's largest principles and promises, glisten like jewels."

The Church General Hospital, Wuchang, a Red Cross Hospital: The Hankow News letter of March 4, 1918, states that Drs. Liao and Tsao, who have been sent up from Shanghai by the Red Cross, are planning to make the Church General Hospital their headquarters for the wounded as they come in from the front, and that the Wuchang government is already using it for such sick and wounded as cannot be accommodated in camp.

The Red Cross in Tokyo: We hear from Tokyo, April 23d:

"We meet twice a week at No. 1 Tsukiji, and sew, knit and roll bandages. There are other bandage clubs scattered around Tokyo. We are a regular branch of the Red Cross now. Not long ago we sent out about twenty large boxes packed with supplies of all kinds."

Church Intelligence

PASTORAL MESSAGE OF THE HOUSE OF BISHOPS

Adopted On Second Day of
Special Meeting in New York,
April 10-11, A. D. 1918.

Brethren of the Clergy and Laity:

The House of Bishops, meeting in the City of New York while the great battle which may determine the course of Christian civilization is in progress, declares the unwavering loyalty to the Church, and urges all the clergy and laity to continue to render their entire and zealous obedience to the requests of the Government.

In this war which has been forced upon us, and in which now we are contending for the defense of our liberties and faith, the support of those in authority is distinctly a religious duty. We are all called to fulfil that duty to the full extent of our power, and in so doing to manifest the highest sense of consecration, whether in the army or navy, or in some of the manifold forms of work for the support and comfort of those who are in active service.

The struggle is against the foes of righteousness and truth, of liberty and mercy, in the only way open to us, and we must neither falter nor lose patience. With high courage and faith the Church must set itself to the service of the country and of the world, bringing to the support of our cause the moral and spiritual resources of our people. The present conflict in the world makes a moral issue, and moral strength will determine it.

To our soldiers and sailors, and to all who are engaged in dangerous and difficult tasks in the nation's service, we send the assurance of our remembrance, and of our unceasing intercession for their safety in body and soul. We make an earnest plea with all our people to set their faces against those who, for gain, take advantage of the necessities of the Government and of the nation's need of food. The common good, and the support of those in authority upon whose action under God all depends, must be the great consideration with all right-minded men and women.

Wherefore, acknowledging the supreme sovereignty of Almighty God, praying that His will be done, and recognizing the moral and spiritual issues which are involved in this conflict, we bid our clergy and laity everywhere to pray without ceasing for the success of our armies and those of our Allies; and we further exhort our people to dedicate their substance and consecrate all their powers of body, mind and soul to the accomplishment of that for which they pray, to the end that liberty and a righteous and enduring peace may speedily be established throughout the world, to the glory of God, and for the wellbeing of all mankind, through Jesus Christ our Lord.

Commencement at the Virginia Theological Seminary.

Realizing the fact that there were no commencement exercises proper on account of the shadows of war hanging over the nation, to mark the close of the ninety-fourth session of the Protestant Episcopal Theological Seminary in Virginia, it is deemed important to make the announcement generally known through the columns of the Southern Churchman that the regularly established commencement exercises will take place and mark the close of the present session of 1917-1918.

The two prominent features which will be of deep interest to the alumni are, first, the centennial of the Protestant Episcopal Education Society in Virginia, and the important connection of the Seminary with the great war by the large enlistment of its alumni, including Professor Bell, and of the students in the service of their country, either as chaplains, leaders in Y. M.

C. A. work and as officers and privates in the Army of the United States.

The celebration of the centennial of the Protestant Episcopal Education Society in Virginia will take place on Thursday, June 6, Commencement Day, in connection with the alumni meeting. The principal speakers will be Bishop Winchester, of Arkansas, an honored alumnus, and Holdsworth Gordon, Esq., a vestryman of old Christ Church, Georgetown, D. C., where the Society, and, in fact, the Seminary, had their first beginning.

The after-dinner speaking at the alumni dinner will be devoted to the great war, the righteous participation of the United States therein and the patriotic part the Seminary is taking in the cause of liberty and righteousness by the devotion of its alumni and students to the vindication of its noble and eternal principles on the fields of France.

The commencement exercises will begin with the annual missionary service and sermon on Wednesday night,

June 5, at 8 o'clock in the Seminary Chapel; the alumni essay will be read by the Rev. Dr. Morris, of the Monumental Church, Richmond, Va., on Thursday, June 6, in addition to the centennial addresses of the Education Society, and the ordination service will take place in the chapel at 11 o'clock on Friday, June 7.

The commencement exercises of this year will be most interesting and inspiring, and a large attendance of alumni and friends is expected.

Institute of Applied Christianity Will Maintain "Service Houses."

Christian people of New York recognize that their city is the gate port to the war front. About one hundred sons of American families are now being brought back wounded from France each week. The number is likely to increase rapidly. All of them are brought through the port of New York. In the division of war work by New York agencies the Institute of Applied Christianity, 52 East Twenty-fifth Street, New York, is maintaining three service houses, or headquarters for the care of enlisted men and the finding of quarters for men and their parents and friends in private homes. Especially is it desired to serve parents of the country who have war needs in New York.

The Institute represents churches of all bodies, and offers its services without regard to church membership.

The Institute of Applied Christianity offers homes in Metropolitan New York to parents and friends of men in war service. It offers Marvel House homes to enlisted men themselves. Arrangements completed before you leave home, camp or cantonment. Rates to suit pocketbook limits. We are here to serve.

We offer the Institute address, 52 East Twenty-fifth Street, New York, for the receipt and handling of letters, parcels and telegrams; introductions to banks to facilitate financial matters; information about churches, ministers, hospitals and physicians in cases of illness, especially of wounded men; volunteers to do errands and perhaps save journeys to New York; all without charge in any form if for war needs. Parents are free to communicate in regard to other matters they want to know or to do.

Six New Chaplains Reach France.

Before Bishop McCormick's letter had been printed, his request for six additional voluntary chaplains to serve in France under the Red Cross had been granted. All of the ministers selected for this purpose sailed early in April and have now reached France. They are the Rev. Rogers H. Anderson and the Rev. Edmund C. Whitall, both of the Order of the Holy Cross; the Rev. Francis M. Wetherill, of Christ Church, Philadelphia; the Rev. Harley W. Smith, of St. Mark's Church, Shelby, Ohio; the Rev. R. Murray, of Pennsylvania, and the Rev. Arthur L. Washburn, rector of St. Martin's, Providence, R. I. The place of the latter will be taken for four or five months by the Rev. Marion Law, recently rector of St. Paul's, Pawtucket.

The Church Pension Fund has subscribed $1,000,000 to the Third Liberty Loan.

SOUTHERN VIRGINIA.

Rt. Rev. R. D. Tucker, D. D., Bishop.
Rt. Rev. A. C. Thomson, D. D., Suffragan.

Annual Council.

The Twenty-sixth Annual Council of the Diocese of Southern Virginia will convene in St. Paul's Church, Lynchburg, Va., on Tuesday, May 28, 1918, at 10 A. M.

The opening service of Council, beginning promptly at 10 o'clock, will be a Memorial Service for Bishop Randolph.

The clergy of the Diocese are requested to bring their vestments to take part in the service. It is hoped that both clergy and lay delegates will arrive promptly.

WILLIAM A. BROWN,
Secretary of Council.

Virginia Episcopal School.

On April 28 the Chapel of the Virginia Episcopal School, near Lynchburg, was opened with an early celebration of the Holy Communion conducted by the Rev. R. C. Jett and the Rev. Thomas K. Nelson. While attendance upon this service was voluntary, it is safe to say that every communicant in the school was a participant. At 11 o'clock Morning Prayer was conducted by the Rev. Dr. Jett and the Rev. Mr. Nelson, and the rite of confirmation was administered by Bishop B. D. Tucker to a class of eleven.

The chapel was given to the school by Mr. Chiswell D. Langhorne, of Virginia, and is an exquisite piece of architecture, admirably adapted to the needs of the school. It will seat about two hundred people. Dr. Jett, in a short address, very gracefully referred to the generous donor.

The service was perfect. The hearty responses and enthusiastic singing of the hymns put a zest into the service that is sometimes wanting when the congregation is older. Bishop Tucker's address to the confirmation class was very impressive.

Central Convocation.

The spring meeting of the Central Convocation was held in St. James' Church, Boynton, April 23-25, 1918. At the last preceding meeting of the Convocation the Dean had appointed a special committee to suggest changes in the method of conducting the meetings, to arrange a program for this meeting, and to endeavor to secure a larger attendance than has recently been in evidence. The wisdom of that action and the good work done by the committee were shown in Boynton by a notable increase in the number of clergy who were present for the whole three days and by the excellent program, which made this a meeting of unusual interest.

Each afternoon an hour and a half was devoted to the consideration of some special subject, and others than the members of the Convocation were invited to be present and to participate. This time on Tuesday afternoon was devoted to a review of recent books, especially those relating to the war and the problems and thoughts arising out of it. The leader in this conference was the Rev. J. Lewis Gibbs, of Forest Hill, who showed a remarkable familiarity with current publications and a nice power of discrimination. Others added favorable and unfavorable comment on various books. The subject for Wednesday afternoon was "The War and Missions," and the leader the Rev. G. Wallace Ribble, of Houston. He read a paper so carefully thought out, judicious and stimulating that the Convocation unanimously requested that it be published in the Diocesan Record. Bishop Thompson, the Rev. P. W. Reed and the Rev. Chiswell Dabney also took part in the discussion, dwelling especially on the possible ways of securing fit men for the ministry during the war. On Thursday Dr. Jesse M. Jones, of the V. P. I., addressed the Convocation and members of the congregation on "The Church, the Clergy and the War," dwelling especially on the opportunity of the clergy to give instruction and leadership to the people in such matters as food conservation, gardening and self-supporting farming, the Liberty Loans and War Saving Stamp sales.

Good congregations, good music and reverent and hearty participation in worship characterized the services, which were held each morning and evening. In everything there was manifest that spirit of interest and devotion which has for many years characterized St. James' Church, and which is growing and deepening under the fine spiritual ministry of the Rev. H. N. Tucker. A notable feature of the meeting was the presence of both the Bishops, Bishop Thomson being the preacher on Wednesday evening and Bishop Tucker taking an active part in the affairs of the Convocation on Thursday.

On Thursday night St. James' Church was closed and the clergy and congregation went to Christ Chapel, Kimono, where Bishop Tucker preached to a church full of people and confirmed a class presented by the Rev. Mr. Tucker.

Before adjourning Convocation adopted the following memorial to the late beloved Bishop of the Diocese:

"The members of the Central Convocation cannot adjourn this their first meeting since Bishop Randolph's death without claiming the privilege of making some expression—however inadequate—of their love and admiration for him. Some of us are men who have labored long in the Diocese under his inspiring influence; some have had the benefit of his leadership and guidance but a few years; but one and all we mourn his removal from our midst—and even while we mourn our hearts are lifted up in thankfulness to God for the wonderful grace and virtue displayed in this, His great and true servant. With extraordinary power, inspired by the Holy Ghost, he has interpreted to the people of this Diocese the revelation of God in Christ Jesus; he has kept ever before us the great truths of the Gospel; and, with a mind stored with philosophy and history and all that is best in English literature, he has never allowed any human thing to obscure from him or from those who heard him the light of the glory of God in the face of Jesus Christ. He has preached and has taught us to preach to all the varying types of men and women and to all the manifold varieties of spiritual experience in our congregations Jesus Christ and Him crucified.

"His affectionate kindness and humor have brightened every home in which he has been a guest—always welcome and honored. Our churches have been crowded when he was the preacher as at no other times. And into all our parishes, as well as into our hearts and homes, he has brought a blessing, which will live on, because it is of God.

"We thank God for his life and pray that we may have wisdom and grace to follow out his teachings. The sweet memory of his presence will cheer and hearten us in many a day of clouds and weariness. We desire to place on record this little tribute of our admiration and love for him, and our joyous faith that God has called him to a higher and more glorious service, in which he is still united with us in the communion of the saints."

In connection with this memorial the following was also adopted:

"We cannot adopt this memorial without also taking occasion to say a word to him upon whom Bishop Randolph's mantle has fallen, and whom we delight to have with us today. You, our dear Bishop, have your place of authority in the churches of the Diocese, and none the less surely your place in our hearts, where your authority is secure because it is that of love. We praise the great Head of the Church that He has sent you to be our Bishop, counselor and friend. We have faith in your devotion, zeal and wisdom, and we pledge to you anew our loyal co-operation in the work, which is for Christ and His Church."

Rt. Rev. R. A. Gibson, D. D., Bishop.
 Rt. Rev. W. C. Brown, D. D., Coadjutor.

Piedmont Convocation.

The one hundred and second semi-annual session of the Piedmont Convocation was held in Leeds Parish, Fauquier County, April 29 to May 1 inclusive. It began with a service conducted by the Dean, the Rev. Edmund L. Woodward, M. D., on Monday night in All Saints' Chapel, Markham, at which the Rev. R. A. Castleman, of Falls Church, preached from the text, "Give ye them to eat."

The Rev. C. H. Goodwin, of Leesburg, preached at the morning service on Tuesday, on "The Relation of the War to Missions," and at night the Rev. J. B. Dunn, D. D., of Lynchburg, spoke on "Christianity and Patriotism."

On Wednesday morning Bishop Brown conducted the Quiet Hour. The Holy Communion was celebrated, the Rev. K. J. Hammond preaching the Convocation sermon on "The Value of the Church in the Parish to the Churchman." One candidate was confirmed by the Bishop, and after the service a War Honor Roll was unveiled, containing nineteen names, those who have entered the service of the nation from Leeds Parish.

During the business sessions of the Convocation the Rev. W. G. Pendleton, of St. James' Church, Warrenton, was elected Dean, the Rev. E. W. Mellichampe was re-elected Treasurer, and the Rev. William C. Marshall, Secretary.

The rector, the Rev. William Meade, and the congregation of Leeds Parish are to be congratulated upon the success of this spring meeting of Convocation, both in the matter of interest and in the pleasant hospitality which has always been noted in Fauquier.

Upon the east wall of Leeds Church, where the services were held, there is a bronze tablet containing the following inscription:

James Markham Ambler,

Passed Asst. Surgeon U. S. Navy.

Died on the banks of the Lena River during the memorable retreat of the ship's company of the U. S. arctic steamer Jeanette, in the year 1881. His sense of duty was stronger than his love of life.

In memory of his noble example and heroic death, this tablet is erected by the medical officers of the United States Navy.

Meeting of the Colored Convocation.

The eighth annual meeting of the Colored Convocation of the Diocese of Virginia was held in St. Philip's Church, Richmond, Rev. R. A. Jackson, minister-in-charge, on Wednesday and Thursday, May 1 and 2.

The Convocation was opened with a celebration of the Holy Communion by Bishop Gibson, assisted by the Rev. Sandy A. Morgan, rector of John Moncure Memorial Church, Stafford County; the Convocation sermon being preached by the Rev. John H. Scott, of Miller's Tavern, Va. The Bishop made an address at the first session, followed by other addresses of welcome to the members of Convocation.

The Wednesday afternoon service was given to the Woman's Auxiliary. There were present delegates from three branches already formed, and from three other congregations in which the Auxiliary will be started at once, making, with three branches not represented, nine branches of the Auxiliary in the Colored Convocation. A Convocational organization was effected at this meeting, and Mrs. W. H. Hughes, of St. Philip's Church, was elected Convocation Secretary. Addresses were made by Miss Lucy Gibson, Diocesan Vice-President of the Woman's Auxiliary, and by Mrs. Edmund L. Woodward, of The Plains, Va., and by the Rev. G. M. Brydon, Archdeacon of the Colored Work. Pledges were made by the delegates from each chapter for the support of a bed in one of our mission hospitals in China.

At the evening service addresses were made by the Rev. C. B. Bryan, D. D., Dean of the Bishop Payne Divinity School, on "Our Educational Institution"; the Rev. Lorenzo A. King, on "The Church and Its Appeal to the Negro"; the Rev. E. E. Miller, of St. Stephen's Church, Petersburg, on "The Ever-Pressing Need of Self-Support in the Church Work Among the Negroes."

The morning service on Thursday, after the celebration of the Holy Communion by the Archdeacon, was devoted to reports from the ministers in the Colored Convocation, and formed a most inspiring part of the whole meeting.

The Thursday afternoon meeting was given to Sunday school work. Reports were made by the lay delegates from various Sunday schools throughout the Convocation, after which an address was made by the Rev. J. F. Ribble, President of the Diocesan Board of Religious Education. A Convocational Board of Religious Education was formed at this meeting, with the Rev. R. A. Jackson, of St. Philip's, Richmond, as President, and the Rev. Lorenzo A. King, of Hanover, as Treasurer, and Miss Martha Clarke, of Beazley, as Secretary. These three form the Executive Committee of the Convocational Board.

At the evening service addresses were made by the Rev. R. Cary Montague, City Missionary of Richmond, on "The Foreign Field and Our Relation Thereto," and the Rev. Sandy A. Morgan on "The Church and the Rural Community."

The Rev. Joseph F. Mitchell, of Meade Chapel, Alexandria, was elected President of the Convocation, Rev. Sandy A. Morgan Secretary, and Rev. R. A. Jackson Treasurer. The Rev. Sandy A. Morgan and the Rev. R. A. Jackson were elected clerical delegates, and Edward Ellis, Jr., of Richmond, and George E. Fortune, of Caroline County, were elected lay delegates to represent the Colored Convocation in the annual Council of the Diocese to be held in Leesburg. It was decided to hold the Convocation next spring at John Moncure Memorial Church, in Stafford County.

Opening of the John Moncure Memorial Church.

On Sunday afternoon, April 28, Bishop Brown made his first visitation to the new work among the colored people in Stafford County, on the occasion of the formal opening of the John Moncure Memorial Church. The Bishop conducted the service, in which the church was opened with a prayer of blessing, after which the sermon was preached by the Rev. G. MacLaren Brydon, Archdeacon of the Colored Work. A class of six was presented for confirmation by the rector, the Rev. Sandy A. Morgan.

The church and rectory, with eighteen acres of land surrounding it, lie on the Richmond-Washington Highway about a mile north of Acquia Church, in the center of a growing community of colored people. The property was secured and the Church built by the church people of Richmond as a memorial to the late Rev. John Moncure, D. D. The Rev. Sandy A. Morgan has been in charge of this work for the past year, and has labored most acceptably and successfully in laying the foundations of permanent work in a field in which the Church was hitherto unknown.

Campaign for Home for Homeless Boys.

A campaign was launched in Richmond this week for the raising of $25,000 for the Industrial School and Home for Homeless Boys near Covington, Va. On Sunday appeals in behalf of this worthy institution were made in the various Episcopal churches by the Rev. George Floyd Rogers, President and founder of the home, and Dr. Edward R. Rogers, General Superintendent.

Regardless of creed, nationality or place of residence, the home receives all boys, provided they have no homes or live in an environment which substantially fails to offer the comforts and moral influences of a home.

Within the last three or four months the management of the institution, owing to the lack of facilities, has been compelled to refuse the applications of fifty friendless boys who, for the most part, are in pitiful plight.

This condition has roused the friends and supporters of the institution to action, and it is expected that $25,000 of the $75,000 needed will be raised in Richmond. The State as a whole will be asked to give the remainder.

Associated with the Rev. Mr. Rogers in the campaign will be the local Advisory Committee, which consists of Colonel John W. Gordon, Judge J. Hoge Ricks, Dr. J. T. Mastin, Frederick Nolting, the Rev. Thomas Semmes, Harold Bloomberg and Selden Walke.

Money, Liberty Bonds, checks, etc., may be sent to Mr. Frederick Nolting, or any member of the Advisory Committee, which has offices at Tenth and Main Streets, Richmond.

A celebration of the thirtieth anniversary of the rectorship of Archdeacon F. W. Neve, and the inauguration by him of the Mountain Mission Work of the Diocese in the Blue Ridge, will be held on Thursday, May 23. The service, which is being arranged by the Advisory Board of the Archdeaconry of the Blue Ridge and the Vestry of St. Paul's Church, will be held at 11 o'clock in St. Paul's Church, Ivy, Va.

The Southern Churchman desires to join the multitude of friends whose congratulations will be extended to Mr. Neve at this anniversary on the remarkable work he has been permitted to perform, and to wish him many more years of usefulness in the Master's service.

Mr. William A. James, President of the Richmond Local Assembly of the Brotherhood of St. Andrew, has volunteered for the term of the war as a Brotherhood Secretary, and takes charge on May 13 of the Brotherhood work under the Y. M. C. A. at Camp Sevier, Greenville, S. C. He will thus be in training for this particular work and subject to call for overseas duty.

The Local Council of the Brotherhood are tendering Mr. James a luncheon on Friday afternoon at the Soldiers', Sailors' and Marines' Club, at which there will be several speakers, among whom are Mr. Percy J. Knapp, Secretary at Camp Lee, and Mr. W. P. Johnson, Secretary at Norfolk.

Bishop Brown visited Acquia Church, Overwharton Parish, Stafford County, on Sunday, April 28, the Rev. Joseph Baker, rector, and confirmed a class of seventeen persons.

DELAWARE.

Rt. Rev. F. J. Kinsman, D. D., Bishop.

The Rev. C. Thacher Pfeiffer, of Laurel, Delaware, has been elected rector of St. John's, Somerville, New Jersey.

The Rev. Howard G. England, of Washington, D. C., has accepted an election to the rectorship of Calvary Church, Wilmington, Delaware, and assumed charge on May 1.

Chaplain Walter Marvine, U. S. A., has been transferred from Fort Du Pont, Delaware City, Delaware, to Fortress Monroe, Virginia. For three years he has taken charge of Christ Church, Delaware City, where his services have been highly appreciated.

Consecration of St. Mark's, Little Creek: On St. Mark's Day Bishop Kinsman consecrated the new chancel of St. Mark's Church, Little Creek Hundred, of which the Rev. C. Thacher Pfeiffer is in charge. St. Mark's was built in 1857 as the last work of the Rev. Richard Fish Cadle, who was responsible for the beginning of a number of parishes in Wisconsin and for several places in Delaware. On the day on which his last illness seized him he took Bishop Lee to see the partially completed St. Mark's, which the Bishop consecrated as his memorial six months after his death, May 28, 1858. During the past year the church has been enlarged by one-third, renovated throughout, and fitted out with a spacious sanctuary. At the consecration services Bishop Kinsman was assisted by Archdeacon Thompson, who preached the sermon; the Rev. William H. Darbie, Mr. Cadle's successor in St. Luke's, Seaford, and the Rev. C. T. Pfeiffer. Memorials were dedicated to Bishop Leighton Coleman and to Mrs. Rachel Amy Ellis. During sixty years St. Mark's had fallen into a state of dilapidation; but it has now been made one of the best mission churches in South Delaware.

FLORIDA.

Rt. Rev. E. G. Weed, D. D., Bishop.

The Rev. M. E. Johnson, having served as deacon at Federal Point, Interlachen, and other points, who was ordered priest by Bishop Weed on March 21, has been placed in charge of Christ Church, Pensacola, during the absence of its rector, Archdeacon Brown, in France. He will spend much of his time looking after the soldiers and sailors that are located there. Mr. Johnson has been successful in all his pastoral and mission work; and is a favorite with all who know him.

The mission church at Mayport was destroyed by fire during the storm on the 5th of April.

The Church Hut on April 5 was dedicated by the Bishop, who presented it to Colonel F. L. Munson at Camp Joseph E. Johnston, who accepted the gift with thanks. He also took occasion to refer to the noble work done in getting this for the camp by the Rev. Webber-Thompson, the volunteer chaplain of the church. The program was concluded with singing and refreshments for the soldiers. Over a thousand soldiers were present, and the whole camp turned out to see the new building. It is regularly used for service and pleasure, and is greatly appreciated by the men.

BETHLEHEM.

Rt. Rev. Ethelbert Talbot, D. D., Bishop.

The Archdeaconry of Reading: The spring session of the Archdeaconry of Reading was held at St. Peter's Church, Hazleton, the Rev. A. E. Clattenburg, rector, on Monday and Tuesday, April 29 and 30. On Monday evening, after short addresses of greeting by the rector, the Archdeacon and the Bishop, a sermon on the subject, "Together," was preached by the Rev. C. H. Toop, rector of the Church of the Holy Apostles, Philadelphia. On Tuesday morning the Ven. H. E. A. Durell, Archdeacon of Reading, read his formal report. The Very Rev. George C. Bartlett, Dean of the Philadelphia Divinity School, delivered an address on "A Ministry for Present-Day Needs." The Rev. F. A. MacMiller, of Reading, read a paper on "The Best Preparation For a Business Man Who Desires to Enter Our Ministry." The Rev. G. H. Toop conducted the Quiet Hour at noon, discussing "The King and the Kingdom." The Rev. Stewart U. Mitman closed the morning session with a paper on "The Further Preparation of the Men of Business Training After Ordination to the Diaconate." The papers brought forth a very spirited discussion of the problems treated.

Luncheon was served by the ladies of the parish, and in the afternoon the Clergy was taken to the Hazleton Country Club in automobiles.

PITTSBURGH.

Rt. Rev. C. Whitehead, D. D., Bishop.

The semi-annual meeting of the Woman's Auxiliary took place on Thursday, May 2, at Christ Church, Pittsburgh, opening with a celebration of the Holy Communion by the Bishop of the Diocese, with the presentation of the third ingathering of the United Offering of 1919. This amounted to almost seven hundred dollars.

At the conclusion of the service Bishop Whitehead made a short address to the Auxiliary, congratulating them on their very successful work this year, making an appeal in behalf of the general Church papers for more subscribers, and a strong appeal for the One Day's Income Fund on the part of all Church people. He then introduced Dr. Mary James, of the Church General Hospital, Wuchang, China, who told at some length of the work there. The afternoon was devoted to a Conference of Diocesan and parochial Auxiliary officers.

NORTH TEXAS.

Rt. Rev. E. A. Temple, D. D., Bishop.

Ballinger: On Sunday, April 21, the Rt. Rev. E. A. Temple, D. D., visited Ballinger, Texas, and confirmed a class of four. On Monday he visited Coleman, Texas, and confirmed three, and Tuesday he confirmed two. The Rev. W. T. Allan, D. D., priest in charge of these places, reports heavy losses from removal, and from candidates going to the war. At Coleman, the loss during the last year was thirty-three per cent.

An interesting feature of these two classes was that all except one were from other religious bodies, and six were heads of families. Both of these places had but few church ministrations for fifteen years, and during that time whole families of Episcopalians lapsed to other religious bodies for lack of distinctive teaching.

This field is harder hit, both in loss of members and financially, than ever in its history by the war, the unprecedented cold winter and the drought, which is the severest in its history, and still continues.

MISSISSIPPI.

Rt. Rev. T. DuB. Bratton, D. D., Bishop.

Woman's Auxiliary.

The twenty-seventh Annual Council of the Woman's Auxiliary of the Diocese met in Christ Church, Vicksburg, April 16, 17 and 18. It was one of the best attended Councils that the Auxiliary has had for years, forty-two delegates from twenty Branches being present.

Tuesday afternoon and Wednesday morning was devoted to the business sessions with the exception of an automobile drive through the National Military Park.

Wednesday afternoon the Juniors had their "Open Meeting." The services were conducted by the rector, the Rev. Charles E. Woodson, and Bishop Bratton gave the children one of his helpful talks. All three departments of the Junior Auxiliary were represented on the program. Christ Church Sunday-school gave an instructive and attractive little mystery play, "Lady Catechism and the Child." Afterward an informal reception was tendered the delegates in the Sunday-school room.

One of the most helpful features of the Council was a Conference on "How to Create Workers Among Our Women of the Auxiliary," led by Mrs. Theodore D. Bratton. She was ably assisted by Miss Newton, Dean of All Saints College, and Mrs. Philip Gardiner, of Laurel. Another delightful feature on Thursday's program was a missionary story told by Miss Lillian Sloan, of the Natchez Juniors.

It was much regretted that ill health prevented the attendance of the Diocesan President, Mrs. J. R. Carter. Her resignation was accepted with regret, and Mrs. W. V. Frierson, of Clarksdale, was elected to fill the vacancy.

The Bishop preached and confirmed a large class the night the Council closed.

The vestry of Christ Church gave the rector, the Rev. Charles E. Woodson, a practical demonstration of their appreciation of his splendid work in the parish by increasing his salary $600 per annum.

NEW YORK.

Rt. Rev. David H. Greer, D. D., Bishop
Rt. Rev. C. S. Burch, D. D., Suffragan

Last Service Held in Old St. Bartholomew's.

On the last Sunday in April St. Bartholomew's held its last service in its old church at Madison Avenue and Forty-fourth Street. Old members filled the church and the preacher was the rector, the Rev. Leighton Parks, D. D. The edifice is to be torn down this summer. The chapel adjoining the church is to be retained for a time for the holding of services. All memorials, the great bronze Vanderbilt memorial doors, the Lathrop painting, will be removed to the church now building in Park Avenue and Fiftieth Street, and to be opened this fall. The present site is swamped by high hotels and the Grand Central Station, while the new is at the beginning of what has come of late years to be the finest residence street in Manhattan.

St. Bartholomew's started in the Bowery in 1835, and built its first church in Lafayette Street, farther south than the old Diocesan House. It went to its present site in 1878. The new church occupies the whole block front, and with St. Thomas' Church, its near neighbor, shares the honor of being the finest parish church in the world in matter of expense to build and to maintain, if not in adornments and enrichments.

Generous Bequests to Churches and Church Institutions.

Historic St. Michael's Church, the Rev. Dr. John P. Peters, rector, in what was once Bloomingdale village, on the upper West Side of Manhattan, receives by will of the late Mrs. J. E. Zimmerman a large sum of money. There is a gift outright of $50,000 and the residuary estate, which some pretend to say may amount to as much as $1,000,000. Mrs. Zimmerman belonged to the Furniss family, which gave $100,000 to build one of the chapels at the Cathedral. She was also a communicant of the parish which she now endows. She made no condition, it is said, as to the use of the money.

To the Diocesan Missionary and Church Extension Society Mrs. Zimmerman left $200,000 and sixty acres of land at Haverstraw on the Hudson, on which is located a chapel. The money is to maintain work of the chapel and Christian work in the community. To the Cathedral she gave $140,000 with the suggestion that it be used to maintain a school for girls. To the New York Nursery and Child's Hospital she gave $200,000, and $100,000 to the Sheltering Arms, a Church institution founded by St. Michael's and closely related to it. To the Church Temperance Society she gave $25,000, to the Church Mission of Help $5,000, the Church Institute for Negroes $10,000, and some $200,000 to other institutions, nearly all more or less closely identified with the Church.

Bishop Lloyd's Return Trip.

Bishop Lloyd has returned safely from his trip to Liberia. He left New York in November of last year. He sailed from England on a steamer bound for Monrovia, which was loaded with dynamite. On the way to Africa from England one of the ships in the convoy was torpedoed, but the Bishop's ship was unharmed. On the return trip there was more excitement. A local New York paper, on the day of the Bishop's arrival, reports him as saying:

"I had just finished my breakfast when all hands were ordered on deck. Every one at once knew our predicament, for we could hear a distant boom and see a splash somewhere about the vessel and often perilously near. As soon as the firing began our captain turned at right angles from his course and headed for the rocky coast of the island. We could, in a pinch, make thirteen and a half knots, whereas the submarine was not quite as speedy.

"We succeeded in reaching shallow water, where we remained close to the shore while shells burst near us. It was impossible for the submersible to come any closer, for, as the captain of the Eboe told me, she would have to be in at least sixty feet of water.

"The passengers all remained above deck with the life belts ready. The boats had been swung out and were ready for launching. For almost an hour the firing continued, but the target was never hit. I counted thirty shots, but the officers said there were thirty-five. Before departing, however, the Hun showered us with shrapnel, but no one was injured.

"More than four hours later destroyers rushed to our assistance. The officers appeared quite surprised on hearing that a U-boat was in those waters, and I was informed that it probably was one of the Germans' most modern types, about 300 feet long, carrying a six-inch gun and having a cruising range of 9,000 miles.

"Some time afterward a submersible shelled Monrovia, capital of Liberia, and there was a persistent rumor in the place that it had been captured after a fight by destroyers and sunk.

"Before beginning our return voyage the Eboe stopped at Freetown, where it was equipped with a three-inch gun, the only defensive weapon it has ever carried."

The ship was the British "Eboe," the date April 6, and the place not far out of the African port.

SOUTHERN OHIO.

Cincinnati City Mission.

The report for the year 1917 of the Rev. Charles G. Reade, Superintendent of the Cincinnati Mission, shows a year of continuous and strenuous service for all the staff of the Mission. In addition to the regular City Mission work, services have been held for the soldiers at the Speedway Camp, Sharonville, and at Fort Thomas. Deaconess Drant has enlisted the women prisoners at the War House and the women at the Home for the Friendless in knitting for the Red Cross. The Rev. Stanley Matthews Cleveland, a member of the Mission staff, is now engaged in war work under the Y. M. C. A. on the French front, and the Rev. Joseph Lyons Meade has taken his place in the work. The Rev. Gilbert A. Symons, a member of the Executive Committee, is in England working among the prisoners of war, while another member of that committee, the Rev. Dr. F. L. Flinchbaugh, has worked among the sailors in the Y. M. C. A., and did the fine piece of work in starting and building the church at Camp Sherman, Chillicothe, and in providing for the erection of the larger structure now in operation there under the care of the Rev. Thomas W. Attridge.

SOUTH DAKOTA.

Rt. Rev. H. L. Bursleson, D. D., Bishop.
Rt. Rev. W. P. Remington, D. D., Suffragan

The new church and rectory at Brookings are completed and were used for the first time on Easter Day. For a good many years the church has been keeping a minister in this town, which is the site of the South Dakota State College, with a small wooden building resembling a country schoolhouse one mile from the college building as his equipment. Naturally the church has not grown during the past twenty-five years, and its influence upon the students of the college has been pitifully small. But now a new day has begun in the work at the State College. In place of the old and unattractive church and rectory there is now a beautiful brick church and rectory nearer the college than any other church building. The church will seat comfortably about one hundred and twenty-five persons.

Beside the chancel is a small chapel which will be used for services with but a few present, such as the early morning communion services, and will thus save heating the larger building on winter days.

The finest piece of furniture in the building is the lectern, which was a gift from Dr. R. L. Slagle, president of the University of South Dakota, and was given in memory of his late wife, Anna Reimann Slagle. Dr. Slagle was for many years the president of the State College at Brookings, and his wife was a most faithful member of St. Paul's Guild.

Other gifts are the altar and riddel posts, given by Mrs. Natwick, of Sioux Falls; the dossal and riddel curtains, given by Bishop and Mrs. Remington; the candlesticks on the altar, given a few days before her death by Mrs. M. E. Wimsey, for many years a faithful attendant and supporter of the church in Brookings; the frontal and super-frontal were gifts from the architects and Mr. A. E. Hoyle. A beautiful set of altar linen was given by the Altar Guild of Trinity Church, Lenox, Massachusetts.

The rectory is built to harmonize with the church. It is a substantial house of eleven rooms, besides the basement and attic. The two buildings represent an expenditure of about $10,000, and while there will be no debt on the church there will be a mortgage on the rectory of $2,500, held by the American Church Building Fund Commission.

It is hoped to have the church consecrated on Wednesday, June 19, by Bishop Bursleson, with Dean Woodruff, of Calvary Cathedral in Sioux Falls, the preacher.

The Convocation of the Missionary District of South Dakota has been called by the Bishop to meet in Sioux Falls on June 15, 16 and 17.

Ripening Age.

The Rev. A. L. Murray.

The rector was young, joyous and popular and to a parting parishoner said, "I hope that you will like your new rector and enjoy the services."

The rector was middle-aged and fighting hard for life's realities, and to his parting parishoner said, "I hope you will do your full duty in your new parish."

The rector was old, strong and mellowed and to his parting parishoner said, "Do your full duty in your new parish and you will find your happiness for God's blessings are upon those who bless others."

Between the soul, however conscious of offense, and the Almighty Judge of us all, there is a peace offered. If one is too indifferent to ask for it, or so proud as to deny it, or so persistent as to defy it, he does not destroy it for other people, he only robs himself.

"But, how can it be peace, if I am not conscious of it?" It is more important that God should realize there is peace between Him and us than that we should. Our salvation depends upon His knowledge of peace. But our happiness depends upon our knowledge of it. There are many saved Christians who are not happy Christians, and many pardoned prodigals who still insist upon serving for wages, and some who cling even to the bondage of slaves, children in the Father's house, forgiven and welcomed, and can't believe it.—Dr. J. H. Eccleston.

Christianity and the Community

Thy Kingdom Come on Earth

In the regular gathering at "Clericus" of the rectors of our churches in a certain city on Monday morning of last week, the question was asked by one of the men present as to what the others did about their Sunday-schools in the summer time. Were they kept open or closed? And what was the result when they were kept open?

Various men answered, some telling of more or less successful efforts to continue the Sunday-school session without interruption, but most of them expressing the view that in the city it is better in the long run for the interest of both teachers and scholars to have a discontinuance during the hot weather months.

In the midst of the discussion a visitor knocked at the door, and by a curious coincidence it proved to be one who had come to this particular gathering of ministers for the express purpose of interesting them in a method of doing the very thing which was being discussed—that is, to make the churches attract and help the city children in the summer. This visitor was Dr. R. G. Boville, of New York, the director of the Daily Vacation Bible Schools Association.

What the Daily Vacation Bible Schools are and what they do is best told by quotations from a leaflet which the Association issues—and it should be remembered that the need which the schools meet is greatly accentuated in this time of war by the fact that so many fathers and older brothers are away in the army, and many children therefore will have less home influence and control than usual.

"For over two months in summer, school supervision is withdrawn from 20,000,000 children. For many of these the vacation is a happy time, but for more it is a time of demoralization and danger. Wage earners, busy all day, cannot give their children needed care. This is especially true in fifty of the largest cities in the country. Street life is apt to foster lawlessness in children. Is democracy safe if its children are neglected and their morale impaired during vacations? Church buildings accessible to these children should be equipped as daily welfare centers.

"Further, religious training is not allowed in our public schools, consequently the duty of providing for it rests on the Church. In what measure is it fulfilling this duty? Of the population between three and eighteen years of age, at least 10,000,000 are not enrolled in any Sunday-school. Is democracy safe without the Bible and the knowledge of God? The summer vacation is the greatest opportunity of the year for churches to supply this vital need in Daily Vacation Bible Schools.

"(a) To promote the social welfare of children irrespective of race or creed by giving them competent leaders and teachers, suitable and happy occupations, oversight of games, good songs—above all, to combine with this program religious training and practical Bible teaching, the supreme need of childhood. Twenty million children have a summer vacation lasting for two months or more. They welcome such leaders and such a program.

"(b) To promote the community use of church buildings in cities and rural districts for child welfare on broad, non-sectarian lines, especially when public schools are closed in summer. Hence Daily Vacation Bible Schools do not overlap the field of the National Playground Association. One hundred and seventy-eight thousand Protestant church buildings in the United States represent an investment valued at $935,000,000 exempt from taxation. To fail to use them for community welfare is a serious form of economic waste.

"(c) To employ in this field of service alert college men and women inspired with the spirit of social service and fitted to be efficient leaders of children in worship, work and play. It is an educational and economic waste to spend millions in educating young men and women, and nothing in utilizing their vacation months for social service. There are over 400,000 students in our colleges and professional schools.

"1. To take the children off the streets for six weeks in summer is worth while. Their lives are safer, their habits are better, and their parents are freer from anxiety.

"2. To keep their hands busy, to eliminate quarrels in their games, to instill patriotism, is worth while—it improves their morals.

"3. To teach as many Bible lessons in six weeks as a Sunday-school could in seven months is worth while. For many children a Daily Vacation Bible School is the only opportunity for such knowledge.

"4. To help in making good Americans is worth while. The following forty-seven nationalities and races are represented on the enrollment—Albanian, American, Armenian, Australian, Austrian, Belgian, Bohemian, Canadian, Chinese, Croatian, Cuban, Danish, Dutch, English, Finnish, French, German, Grecian, Gypsy, Hawaiian, Hungarian, Indian, Irish, Italian, Japanese, Jewish, Lithuanian, Mexican, Mormon, Negro, New Zealander, Norwegian, Polish, Porto Rican, Portuguese, Roumanian, Russian, Ruthenian, Scotch, Servian, Slovak, South American, Spanish, Swedish, Swiss, Syrian, Welsh:

"5. To continue the work during the winter months, in some special service or session, is worth while. Vacation Bible Schools usually merge in some new form of child welfare activity in churches where they are held. Continuation schools to meet after school hours are being organized.

"6. To bring students into contact with social conditions, to teach them service by serving, is worth while. It makes their religion more real and their purpose more earnest.

"7. To put a church or church society in happy relations with a foreign community, to prove that it is interested in social well-being, is worth while. It does more to win the confidence of working people than do pamphlets about social service. Vacation Bible Schools have been held in churches of the following bodies: Baptist, Presbyterian, Methodist, Congregational, Protestant Episcopal, Lutheran, Evangelical, Disciples, Reformed, German Evangelical, Christian, Reformed Presbyterian, Reformed Episcopal, Covenanters, Union Churches.

"A fully equipped school has four student teachers regularly employed and paid, one man who serves as principal and three women who have charge respectively of the music, manual and kindergarten departments. This staff is supplemented, where possible, by volunteers. The term is for six weeks, beginning on the Monday following the Fourth of July. Sessions are held daily except on Saturdays and Sundays, the forenoon being devoted to organized school work and the afternoon to supervision of outside games as follows:

"First Hour—8:30, preparation and visitation by staff. 9:15, doors open and registration.

"Second Hour—9:30, opening exercises, all present; hymn; Psalm or other portion, repeated in concert; Lord's Prayer—repeated or sung; hymn; kindergarten goes out; health and patriotic talks; thank offering for extension. 9:40, musical period; vocal and breathing exercises; singing lesson; calisthenics with music. 10:05, Bible lesson in three groups; represented by children, or taught with sand-table, or given with stereopticon, or told as story by the teacher.

"Third Hour—10:30, manual work and play in sections; hammock-making; weaving; raffia work; basketry; sewing; patriotic work—Red Cross; patriotic work—hospitals; patriotic work—homes; Bible hand work; first aid and hygiene. 11:25, closing exercises—school re-assembles; daily salute to flag. See order in manual; "America" or hymn; children's benediction; recessional march.

"Afternoon—Two Hours—2:30, open air games organized and directed; excursions; visitation of homes; student conference, Monday.

"The total cost of such a typical school, including salaries and material, should not be estimated at less than $250. If teachers volunteer service without remuneration, the cost of the school will be reduced to $75 to cover material and incidentals. It is sometimes best to inaugurate the work with only the Kindergarten Department.

"Do you wish literature or other help in a campaign to open Daily Vacation Bible Schools in your city or Superintendents to organize the work—write to Rev. Robert G. Boville, International Director, 90 Bible House, New York, who will meet your needs, or refer you to a local territorial director more accessible?"

Remember that your work comes only moment by moment, and as surely as God calls you to work, He gives the strength to do it. Each moment, as you need it, strength will come, only do not look forward an hour; circumstances may be different from what you expect. At any rate, you will be borne through each needful and right thing "on eagles' wings." Do not worry yourself with misgivings; take each thing quietly.—Priscilla Maurice.

We are to reach out in friendliness and fellowship. Life is not meant to be lonely and selfish. God setteth the solitary in families and the friendless he bids to be friendly. If we feel lonely and friendless we are to find some one else who feels the same way, and when we have found and befriended him each will be no more friendless or alone.—R. E. Speer.

Sunday After Ascension. The completion and dedication of the Temple amid both tears of sorrow and shouts of joy was followed by about sixty years of silence—so far as our records go. After this, we have the expedition of Ezra (chapters 7 ff). Then after another interval of about a decade came Nehemiah, neither a Priest nor a Prophet, but a hard-headed layman; pious, consecrated, full of courage, zeal and common sense. The sad news was brought to him at the Persian court, where he was cupbearer to the King, that his people in far-away Palestine were "in great affliction and reproach." The first lesson Sunday morning is his prayer to God that He would help those Whom He had redeemed. Once again is brought before us the great truth that Redemption is a glorious fact, but that it is not salvation. "We therefore pray Thee help Thy servants; Whom Thou hast redeemed with Thy precious blood." This is an appropriate truth anywhere between Easter and Pentecost, a connecting link between redemption and salvation; perhaps nowhere more appropriate than on this unique Sunday of the year; Christ having gone away, the Holy Spirit not having come. The use of Revelation in Eastertide has already been explained. Its exclusive use in Advent leads to fanaticism, or at least to a one-sided interpretation of our Lord's Second Advent, ignoring His teaching that the coming of the Spirit was His Advent (John 14:18 and Matt. 26:64. Rev. Ver.), which was to be continuous. The particular selection for this morning, the Marriage of the Lamb in Heaven, is an Advent, or Judgment theme; and leads on to the Son of God (verse 11 ff) at war leading the armies of the Living God. This fits the Epistle: "The end of all things is at hand; be ye therefore sober (not excited and fanatical) and watch (the signs of the times) unto prayer."

In the evening a passage from the New Testament, which treats of our Great High Priest as set on the Right hand of the Majesty on high and of the Holy Ghost and His teachings, is accompanied by the Prophet Joel's prediction of the Spirit's outpouring upon all flesh.

Of the weekday selections, special mention need be made only of those from the Old Testament for the evening: Joel on War and God as dwelling in Zion; lessons in waiting; and foreshadowings of the True Priest and True King. The morning Old Testament lessons lead chronologically to the selection, for Whitsunday, of Neh. 8: the reading and expounding of the Law of God and the inspiring message that "the joy of the Lord is your strength." The New Testament lesson admits us to the true source of joy, not law but love and union with the Divine-Human Personality of our Lord; together with the work of the Spirit as effecting that union and as testifying, along with the Church, to the Christ. In the evening, the present Prayer Book selection (for morning) on the contrast between Old and New Covenants is employed. If preferred, it might be used in the morning together with the Old Testament Alternate, the giving of the Law, interchanging with John 15. Ezekiel's River flowing in the restored land from the restored temple (which might very well be given in the morning, following the account of the completed temple) is the Old Testament evening lesson, and as alternate is given Habakkuk's wonderful joy in the God of His salvation.

Note: Samaritans, when the Jews returned from Babylon, could not agree with, or accept them, or be accepted as neighbors, with good reason on the part of the Jews. Feuds sprang up between them, and continued till our Lord's day, resulting in "no dealings." But a world-Saviour will win souls everywhere; and Samaritan believers were among the first-fruits in the fields white unto the harvest. On returning to Nazareth, Jesus preached His first Messianic sermon; presented the unwelcome truth of His world-salvation to Jewish hearers, and incurred His first rejection, and that in His home town, at the close of His first year of public Ministry. It is known as the Year of Obscurity, and Laying the Foundation.

Training.

Life itself in God's hands is always training us, but there is self-training to do. We do it by Bible study. Each of us ought to be getting daily some fresh help and strength out of the Bible. How long has it been since we read Nehemiah and saw how in that day the work of reconstruction such as our world needs today was taken up by an earnest man? How long since we have read the First Epistle of John and thought on sin and forgiveness and brotherly love? Are we learning daily more about prayer, and is God more familiar to us than He was?

Don't stand still in grace. But grow in the knowledge of our Lord.—R. E. Speer in Sunday School Times.

The cost to maintain the Sunday schools of the United States is about $30,000,000 a year, and practically all of the money is given by children. At any rate, with some help from adults who are officers and teachers, all Sunday schools are self-supporting, and draw little upon the finances of the church of which they are an important part.

Many men consent to be shut out from heaven, that they may stand in with the world.—Ex.

Family Prayer.

N. B. T.

When the sun came over the hill-top it always found us there—
Low chairs ranged in a circle, and every child in his chair;
The Bible wide on the table, and Father above it bent,
The sound of the morning's music with the sound of his reading blent.
Somehow, the Scripture verses, with the sunlight on the wall
And the stir of the day beginning, were like a bugle call;
Somehow, when skies were stormy, each strong, unflinching word—
Genesis, Psalms or Gospel—was like a shielding sword . . .
Peach blooms pink at the window or snow
upon the sill,
And wide-eyed children listening to old dear tales—until
The click of the closing covers turned us to pray, and then:
Thine is the power and glory, forever and
ever, Amen!

When dusk drew over the meadow and the garden walks were damp, Prompt with the first dim shadow we lighted the evening lamp,
Softly across the circle its yellow shine was shed—
On each small face a brightness, a halo on Mother's head.
All on our knees in the stillness, and night so sweet and deep
That the little ones drooped like flowers, folded and bowed with sleep,
While the praying voice in the quiet lifted beseeching word—
"So that living or dying we may be Thine, O Lord!"
Till sometimes—It may be, dreaming—
we fancied in the gloom
A presence paused at the doorway, an angel in the room;
An angel hearkening, holy, unto the end—
and then,
Thine is the power and glory, forever and
ever, Amen!

Now, when the morning brightens or tender twilight nears,
It finds the old chairs vacant among the dusty years,
But we who knelt beside them—far as our hearts may go
They cannot take us wholly from that we used to know:
The olden, golden pledges, the ancient words and sweet—
Still these shall follow after the farthest faring feet;
The solemn supplications, the prayers like fending wings—
Not time nor pain nor tumult shall take away these things.
Nay . . . when we fall or falter, or stumble to our goals,
Echoes from that old altar speak to our weary souls . . .
The broken circle closes . . . Ah, surely now as then,
Thine is the power and glory, forever and
ever, Amen!

Conservationisms.

One ounce of sugar less than usual a day would not be much of a sacrifice, but it would mean much of a saving.
One ounce less a day would save 1,185,- 000 tons a year, and that would keep sugar plentiful and cheap for us and our Allies. Remember, and save your ounce.

This is a short year for wheat and a good one for potatoes. A baked potato equals a slice of wheat bread as food.
Therefore, eat the baked potato and save the slice of bread.

America and her Allies must not run out of wheat, meat, or fats. If they do the war is lost. Conservation in America will save starvation in Europe.

Not diminution but substitution—that is all food conservation asks. Bran meal muffins for breakfast and corn meal bread or johnny-cake for lunch will send wheat to the men in the trenches.

Two meatless meals each day would be a good thing for many and no injury to any.

Foodless and less food are two very different things. Some of us can afford to eat less food in order that none may be foodless.

"A War Food Message for the American Home"—a pocket booklet that you ought to carry, read, mark and inwardly digest—says: "Your government does not want you to give up three square meals a day—or even one. All it asks is that you eat less of the foods that are so greatly needed by our armies, our allies' armies and the people behind them, and more of the foods that are plentiful." Anyone who grumbles at that doesn't deserve one square meal a day.

Four things we must save—sugar, meat, milk and wheat. Men cannot fight unless they are fed. Every meatless, wheatless, sugarless meal helps to win the war and save our liberties and homes.

There are two great classes of food:
1. Those that supply fuel or energy; and 2. Those that are necessary for bodily growth and repair. If the Food Conservation propaganda can lodge this idea in people's minds and along with it the knowledge of a well-balanced diet, it will have conferred a lasting benefit upon the American digestion.

Eat less cake and pie, not only to save wheat and sugar for the world's sake, but to save your own health.

Growing children need whole milk, but grown people can drink skim milk which is as rich in protein and mineral matter as whole milk.

Realize that there is a shortage in the milk supply owing to shortage and high prices of feed, leading to the killing of thousands of milk cows for meat.
For the sake of the babies and children
we must not waste a drop of milk.

A quart of milk gives as much energy as eleven ounces of sirloin steak or eight and a half eggs.

Drink skim milk, if an adult, and use it in cooking. Make cottage cheese of the soul milk. Cottage cheese is one of the best of foods.

One pound less of wheat flour a week per person in the United States would save 133,000,000 bushels of wheat for our armies and our Allies. That would go far toward filling the gap between the need and the supply.—Pacific

For the Southern Churchman.
In the Night Watch.

How many of us "mediate upon God in the night watches"? Those were beautiful words that the poet David used—about remembering God upon his bed—none the less searching and real for being poetry. The shepherd king of Israel was not the man to sing merely for the sake of music: all his songs ring true. When he cried, "I will remember Thee upon my bed," it meant that there he did actually practice the remembrance of God, whether the bed might be a royal couch or the stony floor of Adullam's cave. Over and over again he sounds that note of the night watches, until we are bound to understand that it indicates a habit of life with him, perhaps—who can tell?—the chief source of his spiritual supply.

The influence of David is far-reaching in the life of the average Christian; of all the Old Testament characters he somehow seems closest to our present-day humanity. As we read his changing history with its joys and sorrows, its sinning and repenting, its dangers and deliverances, we see a man so intensely human, so altogether like ourselves, that it is almost impossible to think of him as of a character ages old and a world away. At one angle or another his changeful, high-hearted career touches the life of each of us.
Shepherd lad, warrior, king, prophet, poet, penitent—he ran the gamut of all human experience. Bearing his boyish head for the strange anointing oil, plighting faith with his chosen friend, mourning the lost child dead through his own sin, dancing before the ark, waiting, breathless, for tidings of his rebel son—somehow he is one or the other of us, always.

It is this singular spiritual intimacy of ours with the King of Israel that makes his personal revelation of particular value. When we remember the depths to which he descended and the heights to which he attained, his waking at night to lie and think upon God becomes very significant. We understand the need that he knew, and we realize that his meditations were not in vain. It was from them that he drew grace to sorrow for his misdoing, courage to face his harassing enemies, strength to endure the bitterness of Ab-salom's rebellion, faith to see immortality for himself and his dead child, power to rise above the mental depression that so often overwhelmed him.
Surely he had a right to call his meditations sweet.

But, after all, most of us are likely to neglect the example of Israel's King.
Night is so common, its coming so regular and staid. We think of it in terms of going to bed and getting up, with the interim a blank. Or, if we ever are aware of the night watches, we spend them in fretful rehearsal of tomorrow's cares or else in restless tossing to and fro. The clock seems an intruder in the house, the darkness a pall. Some of us even make for ourselves a bogie—the fear that we shall not sleep again. Yet all the while, if we will believe David—as we must—the night is rife with beauty and with God.

Throughout the record of both the Old and the New Testaments we find heaven working wondrously in the deep hours of the night time. It was between dark and dawn that Abraham received a starry promise at the door of his tent; that Jacob beheld a ladder of climbing light; that the child Samuel heard his little name on the tongue of divinity; that St. Peter saw the doors of his prison miraculously swing wide.
Near midnight the sky over Bethlehem broke with Christmas angels; in the fourth watch of the night Jesus Christ came to His disciples, walking on the sea. For those old watchers and wonderers the night became charged with such tremendous significance that dawn was forgotten. "My soul waiteth for the Lord," cried David, exultantly, "more than they that wait for the morning!"

We may not know miracles now, perhaps, with the actual senses, but to him who listens in the night season God is sure to come. Sometimes we are made aware of His presence through the medium of common things: the soft step of rain on the roof, the stir of wind in a tree by the door, the low breathing of a child nearby, the speech of a half-awakened bird. To some He even speaks in the distant long-drawn cry of a night freight, plunging through the blind dark by the guidance of one mighty Hand.

The head of a girls' boarding school—a quiet man, but little given to exploiting his inner life—once had occasion to address his charges on the subject of the imminent presence of God in the night. The daily duty of guarding the welfare of a hundred light-hearted, thoughtless girls left him but little leisure between dawn and dark for meditation; but between dark and dawn he took his opportunity. "Sometimes in the night," he told them—and one, at least, never forgot the peace of his face as he spoke—"I wake and lie listening long to that which none of us can hear in the noisy day, the rhythmic beat of the water-ram, far down in the meadow, ceaselessly at its work of pumping water to the building here on the height. No sound in heaven or earth save, in the stillness and darkness, that voice of nature obedient to the Lord of nature. There in the deep midnight it becomes after awhile like the very heart-beats of God."

A small thing in the seeking, a great thing in the finding—this experience of the night-watches—yet as genuine now as when men found it of old. What David knew in his passionate soul centuries ago any one of us may know today. For the spirit of man and the spiritual needs of man do not change, and our God will be altogether as potent tonight as He used to be under the dark skies of Palestine. It is only a matter of opening our hearts in the night watches: the Presence is already in the room.

The Good Die Young.

"The good die young," grandmother used to say.
Her cheeks were roses, though her hair was gray.
With cheery song she early toiled and late,
Nor groaned nor grumbled nor found fault with fate.
Yet when we called her "good," with chiding tongue
She said, "Be not deceived—the good die young."

Ever the babies turned to her in glee—
Their gayest romps were held about her knee.
Her heart and theirs kept perfect time and tune—
Wintry her hair, her soul eternal June.
Yet when we sang her praises, back she flung:
"Peace, peace! You do not know—the good die young."

One morning, when the year was at the spring,
We found her ageless soul had taken wing.
A smile was on her lips—a baby's smile,
As if fourscore were but a little while.
Still to her cheeks the youth-time roses clung.
We, sobbing, smiled, "'Tis true; 'the good die young.'"

Carbon Copy.

Anne Madison.

"But, Uncle Roger," Esther argued, earnestly, "I'm not bringing any charge; I'm merely stating facts." She looked at her uncle with wide-open, frank brown eyes.

An occurrence for which, in a way, she would be held responsible, was distressing her very much. As secretary of the Girls' Club of the town it had fallen to her lot to typewrite a copy of an amateur play that the club was preparing to give for the benefit of Redfield's war relief work. It was understood that the manuscript must be guarded with care, because the younger girls and boys of Redfield were aching with candid curiosity, and one paragraph would give the whole thing away. With Esther for secretary the club felt so secure that it even told the youngsters, laughingly, that they might find out the subject of the play in any way they could devise. Yet, though Esther had been most discreet, in some inexplicable way the secret had gotten out. One dreadful morning the girls awakened to the fact that two or three of their pet phrases were common property. The ten-year-old Lawrence twins, one on either gatepost of the Lawrence yard, mischievously chanted the words of the best song, and the heroine's pet expression was in a dozen youthful mouths. Mary Howard, the author of the play, was very angry; the rest of the cast sulked. It seemed to wretched Esther that their disapproval was directed toward her more than toward the thoughtless children. That was to be expected, she thought, but for the life of her she could not understand what had happened.

"You see," she went on to explain, "I am responsible, of course. But listen, Uncle Roger. It was only what was on one page—the tenth—that the boys got wind of. Well, that page is safe among my papers in my desk. Some one told them the text, you see."

"Hm'm," commented Uncle Roger, "I don't wonder you're puzzled."

"The day I typed that particular sheet," Esther went on, "I was alone in the house, and I didn't leave the library at all except for five minutes while Phoebe was calling, when I ran upstairs for a book she wanted to borrow." She stopped, flushing.

"Just where did you leave the sheet of manuscript?" her uncle inquired, thoughtfully.

"On the table beside my typewriter," was Esther's answer. "I had just pulled it out of the machine when Phoebe came, and when I came back from upstairs there it was on my desk still."

There was a moment's silence, and then—"Positively no one but Phoebe was in the room," Esther added, and her flush grew deeper. "She—she must have stepped over and read it."

Another silence, during which Esther looked at the floor and Uncle Roger fingered his eye-glasses still more thoughtfully.

"Well?" Mr. Townsend said at last, encouragingly.

"Well," his niece echoed, slowly, "I suppose I might just as well come out with it. I can't help feeling that Phoebe is in a rather bad light. She was terribly hurt when we didn't ask her to take part in the play—we truly didn't need her, you see. She hasn't been in town long, and then we've heard from somewhere that her temper isn't very good. And there were the children, all teasing her and everybody else to know what the thing was about, and there was the sheet on the table. I didn't remember all this that little three minutes when I left the room, but . . . Uncle Roger, you understand, I know. You see the way things point, because you are a lawyer and couldn't help seeing if you tried."

"Because I am a lawyer," Uncle Roger answered, slowly, "I know that what we call circumstantial evidence is not wholly to be trusted. We must wait. But there is one thing that I want to warn you about, Esther. While you wait for more evidence, you and the others should be most careful to avoid creating even the faintest impression that you suspect Phoebe of such a thing."

"We're obliged to discuss such an important matter," Esther began, a little stiffly, but the other interrupted.

"What I said," he reminded her, "was that you should not create the impression in outside minds that you believe Phoebe to be the culprit. Remember, behind and around and underneath our actual words may lie meanings almost as distinct and just as harmful as an out and out statement."

Two days later Esther knocked at the door of her uncle's office. He was surprised at her paleness when she entered.

"I came straight to you," was her greeting, as she held a paper toward him. He took the muddy sheet and examined it gravely. When his eye fell on the figure 10 at the top he glanced quickly at Esther.

"Carbon copy," he said, and waited.

Esther's paleness had given way to a painful blush. "Yes, it is carbon copy," she acknowledged. "That day—you know, the day I told you about—I had used a sheet of carbon paper while copying the tenth page. Just force of habit, for I was making only one copy of the play. Before Phoebe came in I laid the two on the table—with the carbon copy on top, I suppose. The wind must have lifted and blown it from the window, which was close at hand. I've thought it all out; there isn't any other explanation. Tommy Lawrence says he found this sheet out beside our gate."

Her uncle was silent, and Esther hurried on without looking at him. "But the worst of it is," she continued, "everybody in town has somehow gotten the impression that Phoebe cribbed the Girls' Club play. No one has said so; the club didn't say so itself—"

She faltered, meeting her companion's eyes.

"But you let the notion 'get across,'" her uncle said, slowly. "Feelings are stronger than facts, sometimes. What are you going to do about this thing, my child?"

Esther flinched at the sternness in his tone. "All I can," she replied, soberly. "I'm persuading the girls to explain just what happened. And I—she's going to have my part in the play. I was most to blame."

Uncle Roger laid his hand on the bowed bright head. He knew well enough what that part had meant to eager Esther. "I see what you meant about impressions," the girl confessed.

Uncle Roger's voice was kind. "It's like carbon copy," he said. "You put the innocent looking sheet of carbon paper between two blank white sheets. Then, while you write, two impressions are made. The one nearest your eye is the only one that you notice or think about, but the other is almost as distinct. That's the one that blows off and does the mischief."

Esther reached for the crumpled page. "Next time I'll keep my mind on both," she promised.

The power of prayer has yet to be fully tested.

For the Young Folks

NANCY BYRD TURNER, Editor

Time and Tommy.

When dad and I went back to see
The place where he was young, like me,
I thought it was the stillest town,—
Just long streets straggling up and down,
And old gray houses in a row,
And everybody calm and slow.
But all the time a curious thing
Kept happening and happening.
As we strolled up and down the street,
Most every person that we'd meet
Would stop and tell us howdy-do,
And nearly shake dad's hand in two.
Then look at me and say, "My, my,
How times does fly!"

The men that used to play with dad Stopped talking of the fun they'd had
To touse up my hair and cry,
"But look at this! how time does fly!"
The blacksmith called it from his door,
The lame storekeeper from his store;
The jolly doctor peered at me
And said it slow as slow could be.
And all the old folks in the place,
They'd take my chin and tilt my face;
Then shake their heads and smile, and sigh
"How—time—does—fly!"

I do not understand, at all,
It seems to me their time would crawl.
And, anyway, pray what have I
To do with it if time does fly?

Teacups and Acorns.

V. S.

Lelia and Alice were playing house under the big oak. The roots of the tree formed splendid rooms for housekeeping; Lelia's apartments were on the south side and Alice's on the west.
It was dinner time under the tree, and both girls were very busy.

"My teacups have given out," Alice called, presently. "Will you lend me some until to-morrow?"

Lelia did not answer right away. She was looking over her stock—dozens of shining brown acorn teacups ranged on a root shelf. Her face wore a little frown; she did not like to lend her toys. "I don't think I can let you have any," she said, presently.

Alice's golden head appeared around the side of the tree trunk. "Please!"
she coaxed. "It's too warm to go acorn-hunting, and my leaf-dolls have invited ten other leaf-dolls to dinner."

Lelia's frown did not smooth out.
"Why don't you use buttercup cups?"
she asked.

"Because," Alice explained, "I'm going to have tea—water seasoned with rose leaves, you know—and buttercup cups won't hold anything but make-believe soup."

"Well, I can't help that," Lelia said, crossly. "You could have had just as many acorn cups as I have. Put off your dinner-party till to-morrow."

After that there was silence on the other side of the tree for some time, and fifteen minutes later, when Lelia peeped around into the other dining-room, she found that Alice had stolen away. "She's gone home, I suppose," Lelia said to herself. "I don't think Alice ought to expect me to furnish cups for her table." She hummed a little tune as she set her own rooms to rights, but every now and then she glanced through the white palings that separated her home from Alice's. Somehow, it was no fun playing alone. "If she doesn't come back to the real tea-party this afternoon, I'll know she's mad," her thoughts ran on. "O dear!"

But Alice came that afternoon, and though she looked a little sober, she was as sweet and pleasant as ever.
Before the rest of the company arrived Lelia's mother came out to tell the two girls that there were three cups too few for the number of guests. "Run down to Aunt Eleanor's and borrow some of her small ones," she suggested.

"O mother, Aunt Eleanor's are just plain white cups!" Lelia exclaimed.
"They'll look so queer beside the tinted ones." But her mother said that she feared it would have to be plain white cups anyway.

As the little girl started off unwill-ingly on her errand she passed the oak tree playhouse. The sight of Alice's little dining-room somehow made her feel ashamed. "It's my turn to need cups now," she thought, and her cheeks grew pink.

Coming back with the despised white cups she met Alice at the front gate.
Her little neighbor was carrying a small, covered basket, and her eyes were dancing. Put your hand in and feel!" she said, lifting the cover.

Lelia put in her hand. Then she drew out a lovely, little, pale pink eggshell cup.

"There are two more," Alice said,
"and saucers. Mother had bought them for my birthday. She let me choose them, so they weren't a secret.
They'll fit in beautifully for your tea-party. I thought of them right away and ran home as soon as you started for your Aunt Eleanor's."

"Why, Alice!" said Lelia. She thought of the playhouse under the oak. Then she looked at the dainty china. "How can I use your beautiful cups when—when—" She could not finish.

"When what?" asked Alice, surprised. Suddenly she saw Lelia glance toward the oak. "O that! Never mind about the acorn cups—I had forgotten."

"I do mind," Lelia said, soberly, as they moved on toward the house. "O Alice, won't you pour the chocolate at my party, instead of me?"

How Terry Used His Chances.

Terry Dempster and a good many of the other boys were on their way to school. They passed the first fruit stall at the corner. Terry said good morning to the woman who kept it.
He was glad Will Mace stopped to buy bananas, because he liked to look at her. Her eyes and her hair were so black and her cheeks so red, and she wore such big gold hoops in her ears.

She gave Will the bananas, and while he was putting them into his bookbag she held out his change. Terry took it for him. One of the pennies he shoved back across the counter.

"She was giving you a cent too much," he exclaimed to Will, as he handed him the others.

"You are good at arithmetic, sonny," said Will. "A penny isn't very much of a mistake."

"Not if you are an Italian, anyway," agreed Terry, "and aren't used to changing money in English."

A big red apple had rolled off the stall and along the street until it had turned the corner. Terry picked it up and ran back with it.

"You might have taken that with you," said Will. "Nobody would have seen."

Terry laughed. He did not seem to think that Will expected any other answer.

Two or three days later Terry was playing croquet at recess. The game was getting very exciting. Terry's ball was in a bad position.

"You can move it out from the hedge, Terry," said one of the boys who was looking on. "Wait. Let me show you."

"Not so far as that I cannot," cried
Terry. "That is very far."

"Oh, yes, you can," said the big boy, easily. "You're all right now. Go ahead."

"It's more than a mallet's length," said Terry, measuring. "I was sure it was."

He moved the ball back six inches, and tried for his wicket. He missed
it. He lost the game.

"Isn't it a pity," said the big boy,
"that you can't cheat a little at croquet just for sport?"

"I don't think it is," said Terry.
"It wouldn't be any fun if it wasn't fair."

"Don't you like to win?"
"Yes, when it's real," said Terry.

One day when school was out, Terry had got almost to the corner where the fruit-stand was. Suddenly he stopped short in dismay.

"Oh, dear! I'll have to go back!
I left my copybook. Miss Stone said I was to copy over at home the page I blotted so much."

"Tell her you forgot it," said Bobby Price.

"But only for half a block," said Terry. "That wouldn't satisfy her, I guess."

"I guess not," said Bobby. And he didn't say another word.

The weeks and the months went by until the first school term was over and the second had begun. One Saturday afternoon Mrs. Dempster came home from downtown and hunted through the house for Terry.

"What do you think Miss Stone told me?"

"What?" asked Terry, who regarded Miss Stone as the most beautiful and delightful young lady in all the town.

"She said she liked to have my boy for a pupil. She thought the other boys were learning from him to be more honorable."

"I guess Miss Stone didn't mean me," he said. "I don't see how she could have meant me, because I can't remember ever being honorable before the other boys. I haven't had any chance."—The Sunday-school Times.

A Picnic.

Frances Forbes Cox, Aged 12, Baltimore, Md.

"Oh, mother, may I have a picnic for my birthday?" asked Esther King.

"You know I will be twelve next week."
"Ask your father when he comes home to-night," her mother answered, smiling.

"All right," Esther said, smiling, too, and went out to play. She played all afternoon, and when some of her friends asked her why she seemed so happy, she told them that they would soon know.

That evening she helped her mother

by setting the table, and did many other duties in the house. At last Mr. King came home, but Esther decided to wait until supper was over before asking him about her birthday picnic. When she did ask, her father said yes, at once. She thanked him joyfully and went to bed. She got up early in order to see her different friends before school and invite them to the picnic. She asked her teacher to go with them.

Esther invited about twenty children, and early Saturday morning they set out for the picnic woods. There they played games until lunch time. They had all sorts of sandwiches, cakes and candy, and after eating what they wanted put away the rest for supper that night. When they had finished lunch they went in swimming in a small lake in the woods and had a fine time. They came out of the water early in the afternoon, dressed and went in a shady part of the wood to rest, talk and joke. When they had rested they got supper, then played some more until it was time to go. They all scrambled into a wagon full of hay, and had a jolly ride home. Each one thanked Esther for giving such a fine picnic.

Sugarplum Land.

There once was a land with gingerbread ground

And maple syrup rills,
And a lemonade river that wound and wound.

At the foot of chocolate hills,

Down to a beautiful custard sea
Before it could ever stop.

With brown sugar shore and white sugar shells,
And whipped cream foam on top.

Most of the trees were of cinnamon wood,
From tiniest twig to root,
And peppermint drops and lollipops
Were what they bore for fruit.

From the frosty well in the dingle dell,
As strange as it may seem,
Though you drew and you drew the whole day through,
You still drew pink ice-cream.

They say that the children sipped and sipped
From river and sea and rills,
Nibbled the fences down, and chipped
Chunks from the chocolate hills;

Sampled and munched, and chewed and crunched.

I cannot understand
How ever on earth they got away
From a land like Sugarplum Land!

The Lion and the Rabbit.

A certain Master Bunny had been busy finding food for himself and his little family, moving about here and there the whole of one morning. As the day wore on and the sun had risen high it became too hot to be pleasant, especially as he was not able to change his beautiful fur coat to something lighter. Just at this juncture he spied a cave which looked both cool and inviting. He made for it and was soon inside enjoying the refreshing shade.

A lion chanced to pass that way and feeling the oppressive heat too much for him, walked into the very same cave Master Bunny was in. The poor rabbit, stretched full length on the rock inside, saw him coming, and, as can be imagined, nearly died of fright. He thought to himself: "O dear! O dear! I'm done for now. I've never been boxed so tightly before. I can lose nothing, but perhaps gain something by being polite to Mr. Lion. Anyway, I'll pay my respects to him and gain a little more time to think."

Jumping up, he bounded across to where the lion had settled, and throwing himself flat on the ground in front of him, he clapped his forepaws together (the usual native way of greeting a chief) and said: "Good morning, grandfather."

The lion was evidently pleased, and responded to his salutation graciously, bowing and clapping his paws together, and at the same time saying, "Good morning, my child."

The rabbit was meanwhile thinking desperately what he could do to save his life. His usual ready resource was hard put to this time, but as quick as a thought what turned out to be a happy solution of his difficulty came to him. Running in desperate earnest to the low entrance of the cave he stood on his hind legs, and putting his front paws against the projecting rock, he called out, excitedly: "Grandfather, grandfather, the cave is tumbling down. Come quickly and help to hold it up."

The lion, with a scared look, jumped up at once and was instantly by the rabbit's side, helping him with all his might to avert such a terrible disaster.

Master Bunny, so far successful, said as soon as the lion was there: "Keep holding, grandfather. I'll run and fetch a prop. Don't leave go, mind, till I come back, or you'll be killed for certain."

"All right," said Mr. Lion, "I'll hold on until you come." The kind and thoughtful rabbit bounded away, chuckling to himself at the complete success of his clever scheme.

Poor Mr. Lion, tired and hungry, kept on for hours supporting the cave, as he imagined, wondering whether it was getting to remain where he was or risk letting go and perhaps be crushed to death.

At last, feeling that he could stand the strain no longer cramped up as he was, and having decided that the rabbit was not coming, and saying to himself, "I can meet death but once, anyhow," he let go and rushed outside, fearing the worst. To his surprise and chagrin he found on looking around that the rock overhead had been quite firm and strong all the time. The king of the forest muttered to himself: "Ah! I ought to have known that rascally rabbit better! I deserve this for my sheer stupidity."—Exchange.

"I've Thought of Somebody."

I've thought of somebody—a man. He had many brothers and an aged father, but his mother was dead. Much of his life he spent in a far country. In his youth he had a strange adventure. Those who should have treated him most lovingly were unkind to him, but he forgave them freely. We find him in curious places—once at a royal court, once in prison, and once deep below the surface of the earth. He was a good man and served God faithfully. Who was he?

Answer to last week's question: Rebecca.

A Sweet Voice.

We wonder how many of our dear young readers have sweet voices. Children that try to speak so that their voices sound sweetly and pleasantly to every one that hears them.

There are boys and girls who never try to do this, and presently their voices become harsh and loud and grate upon one's ears.

A sweet voice in the home is like a beautiful chime of bells which delight us every time they are rung, but a loud, rough, noisy voice, that snaps and snarls is like a bell that is cracked and all out of tune.

The kind of voice we use depends a good deal upon the kind of language we use. If we make harsh or angry remarks, our voices are likely to sound harshly, but if we make it a habit of saying pleasant things, then our voices are apt to become sweet and pleasant to the ear. The words of our lips depend upon the thoughts of our heart. Let us then ask Jesus to grant us sweet thoughts, then will the words of our mouths be acceptable in His sight.

The Clothespin Race.

Any number of players can join in the Clothespin Race, making it especially good for a party game.

Separate the company into two rows, with an equal number in each row. The boys and girls may be alternated, or there can be a row of boys and one of girls. As many clothespins as players should be provided, and four baskets, one at each end of the lines.

When the players are ready, one row facing the other, and far enough apart to be well beyond reach, with the pins evenly divided in the two baskets at the head of the lines, the leader on each side starts the game at the same instant by taking a clothespin and handing it quickly to the boy or girl next him. The second one passes it to the third in line, the third to the fourth, and so on, the last one dropping it in the basket at the other end. The leader, meanwhile, has been rapidly passing along the other clothespins, and they have been changed as swiftly as possible from hand to hand. As soon as the last pin is dropped into the basket, the return race is begun, and the side that succeeds in passing all the clothespins in the basket down the line and back again in the shortest time, wins the game.

Any Way You Please.

"Mamma, I wish you'd call the baby in: he's so cross we can't play!" cried Robert one day as he was playing in the yard with his sister and the baby.

"I don't think he would be cross if you were not cross to him," said mamma, coming out. "He does just as he sees you do. Just try him and see. Put your hat on one side of your head."

Robert did so, and presently the baby pushed his straw hat over on one side of his head, just as Robbie had done.

"Whistle," said mamma.

Robbie did, and the baby began to whistle, too.

"Stop mocking me!" said Robbie, giving the baby a push. Baby screamed and pushed Robbie back.

"There, you see," said his mother, "the baby does just as you do. Kiss him now, and you will see how quickly he will follow your example."

Robbie did not feel exactly like doing this, but he did, and baby hugged and kissed him back very warmly.

"Now, you see," said his mother, "you can make a cross or a good boy of your little brother, just as you choose. But you must teach him yourself."—Jewels.

The love of Jesus reproduces itself in the lives of His working and suffering children. In some shape they are ever giving themselves to God and for their fellow-men.—Liddon.

Dead Letters.

Twice a year, in Washington, they hold a curious auction. It is called the Dead Letter Sale, but in reality it is the sale of packages that have been sent to the Dead Letter Office because of deficient postage or wrong directions.

After these packages have been held for a certain length of time, in order to give senders or owners an opportunity to claim them, they are sold at public auction.

It is often a strange and pathetic collection. Most of the articles are cheap enough, although valuable things are not lacking; but who can estimate the intrinsic value of some of those lost gifts—the time, and sacrifice, and love they represent? How many disappointed hearts must have watched in vain for them? How many lives were robbed of a happiness that rightfully belonged to them, because of the sender's carelessness or ignorance?

Is there not a parable lurking somewhere about this strange auction? How many lives are there to-day that hold the possibility of gifts for other lives, yet through carelessness or ignorance or indifference are robbing both themselves and others? The woman whose love is spent upon some valuable pet when there are little children all about her starving for that love; the girl whose taste and skill are spent in a score of useless ways when they might be putting so much beauty into beauty-starved lives the men whose business ability is all spent on making money, and none of it on making men and women; the young people of quick minds and brilliant possibilities, who are unwilling to undergo the discipline necessary to develop their talents—these and scores of others every day are carelessly making "dead letters" of gifts for which eager eyes and hearts are longing.

There is no sale of these dead gifts; no one has any chance at them. They are doubly lost—lost to the one who should have used them, and to the world that needs them. What a pitiful waste of power and joy!—The Youth's Companion.

DR. WEEMS RIDOUT WINCHESTER.

Entered into life eternal from his home in Macon, Ga., April 16, 1918, DR. WEEMS RIDOUT WINCHESTER, son of Jacob and Mary Winchester, Dr. Winchester was born at Whitehall, Md., the old historic home of his mother's family, on the 27th of August, 1848.

He graduated as the honor man of his class from the University of Maryland in 1873, and immediately began the practice of medicine at Leesburg, Va., and there, on the 21st of January, 1879, married Sallie, daughter of Matthew and Harriet Harrison. Mr. Harrison was for a number of years the leader of the Loudoun County bar; and his son, Thomas W. Harrison, now represents the Seventh Virginia District in the United States Congress.

Mrs. Winchester, two sons and three daughters, survive him, also one sister, Mrs. Thompson, of Leesburg, Va., and one brother, Bishop James R. Winchester, of Arkansas, who was with him at the time of his death.

In 1883 Dr. Winchester removed to Macon, Ga., and practiced medicine there as a skillful and successful physician until 1914, when on Quinquagesima Sunday, at divine worship, he was stricken with paralysis, and was thenceforth an invalid.

These last four years he spent with members of his family in Virginia and Georgia, amid loving friends, and also in the company of his wife, whose devotion anticipated his every wish.

The mere record of facts tells nothing of the richness of Dr. Winchester's life; how he stood as a man of men, noble, pure-hearted, modest and great of soul; the stamp of the gentleman on form and feature, and kindness in look, word and deed. Most of all, beginning with boyhood days, he was ever the humble, earnest Christian. For many years a vestryman, and at the time of his illness, senior warden of Christ Church, Macon, Ga.

He found time in the absorbing of a large medical practice to worship God, and it was his fixed principle to be in God's house on God's day; and the faith that found utterance in life and worship made him brave and patient in suffering. Called in an instant from a life of healing, and made helpless where he had been wont to be a helper, he met this final test and bore his burdens with a cheerful, patient dignity which was the joy and admiration of all who loved him. He walked with God, and was upheld by the everlasting Arms.

CHARLES H. LEE.

The REV. DR. FRANK PAGE, formerly rector of St. John's Church, Brooklyn, and more recently rector of Zion Church, Fairfax, Va., entered into rest in the city of Washington in the early morning of April 15th.

Dr. Page was a son of the late Major and Mrs. John Page, of Hanover County, Va., and was a brother of Thomas Nelson Page, United States Ambassador to Italy, and Rosewell Page, second auditor of Virginia. He graduated from Washington College at Lexington, Va., when General Robert E. Lee was its president, and later entered the Theological Seminary of Virginia, from which he graduated in 1878. He began his ministry at Fairfax, and after a few years was called to the rectorship of St. Paul's, Waco, Texas, where he built up a strong parish and left hosts of friends. On becoming the rector of St. John's Church, Prospect Heights, Brooklyn, he gave himself zealously to the labor of reducing the large debt which he found upon the church, and did a signal work among the men of the parish. Each year his sterling qualities made him more influential in the Diocese. He was a close friend of the late William J. Gaynor, Mayor of New York.

Dr. Page was a man of rugged strength, of fine sincerity, of wide sympathy, and generous impulses. He was one of the ministers who always reminded you of Jesus Christ. From his father and mother he inherited a faith like the faith of a little child. He loved men as genuinely as he loved God. He always attracted men around him and held his friends with an unusually firm grip. He loved to preach and was always interesting and fresh and unconventional as a preacher, but his best sermon was ever his own sincere, consistent and godly Christian life.

Wilson: Entered into rest on Sunday, April 21, 1918, MISS SALLIE WILSON, at the home of her nephew, Joe Wilson, in Roanoke, Va.

"Blessed are the pure in heart, for they shall see God."

Washington and Lee University, where he had sat at the feet of the immortal Lee, made him a Doctor of Divinity. To his friends he remained always the same simple, loyal and lovable man. In many ways his life was an ideal life of devoted self-seeking ministry, commending ever the Master who in early manhood had said to him, "Feed my sheep, tend my lambs," and drawing men to goodness and to Christ by the compulsion of his own fine character. Surely upon such a man the light of God's face will rest eternally.

Dr. Page was twice married. His first wife was Miss Lettie Morris, of Hanover County, Va., who was the mother of his three children, Mrs. Packard Laird, Mrs. Norman J. Gaynor and Mr. John Page.

His second wife, who survives him, was Miss Willie Schouler, of Virginia.

MRS. A. A. ABBOTT.

MRS. ADA DOWNMAN BUTLER ABBOTT, wife of Archdeacon Abbott, of Cleveland, Ohio, while visiting at the home of her friend, Mrs. A. G. Torian, at Evansville, Ind., was taken suddenly ill with pneumonia on Wednesday, April 24, and died the following Monday night, April 29. Her husband was called to Evansville at once, and was with Mrs. Abbott when she passed away. After a brief service at the home of Mrs. Torian Tuesday afternoon, April 30, conducted by Archdeacon Plummer, of Southern Indiana, and the Rev. Albert Leonard Murray, rector of St. Paul's, Evansville, the body, attended by Archdeacon Abbott, was taken for interment to Shepherdstown, W. Va., and buried from Trinity Church, the rector of the parish, Rev. Josiah W. Ware, and Rev. John S. Alfriend, rector of Zion Church, Charles Town, officiating.

Mrs. Abbott, born and raised at Shepherdstown, was the eldest daughter of Vincent Moore Butler, M. D., captain in the Stonewall Brigade, and Mrs. Matilda Wickham Berry Butler. She and Archdeacon Abbott began their married life in Evansville in 1889, at the same time that the Archdeacon entered upon a six years' rectorship of Holy Innocents Memorial Church, that city. Mrs. Abbott was a member of the Daughters of the Confederacy of Shepherdstown, and affiliated with the Cleveland branch. She is survived by two sisters, Mrs. Joseph S. Bragonier, of Shepherdstown, and Mrs. George W. Moore, of Charles Town.

RESOLUTION OF THE VESTRY OF TRINITY EPISCOPAL CHURCH RELATIVE TO THE RESIGNATION OF THE REV. WALTER Q. HULLIHEN, RECTOR.

Resolved by vestry of Trinity Church: That in considering the request of our beloved rector to be relieved from duty, after forty-six years of continuous and faithful service, we perforce yield to his better judgment and grant the privilege he now seeks, in order that he may enjoy a richly deserved respite from the active duties of rector during his declining years.

The Rev. Walter Q. Hullihen was called to Trinity Church in 1872, and has served as its rector to this date. His college training at the University of Virginia, preliminary to entering the Seminary at Alexandria, was interrupted by the strenuous days of '61 to '65, when he offered his young manhood to the Southern Confederacy, and was a gallant soldier under General Stuart during the Civil War. With like courage he has proven himself a faithful "Soldier of the Cross," and throughout his useful career has served this church with marked ability and fidelity. To the members of our congregation his conduct of our beautiful services proved always an inspiration, and frequently provoked the most favorable comment from strangers. No individual could follow him through these churchly ceremonies and listen to his clear, though simple, statement of the Gospel, except with genuine pleasure and spiritual benefit. Throughout this period his constant effort has been to advance the helpful Christian spirit in our midst and maintain the dignified position our church enjoys in this community.

The intimate relationship he has borne, from birth to death, to so many of our loved ones in ministering to those in affliction in "mind, body or estate"; in christening our infants in arms and leading them on to maturer years to Christ; in performing the last sad rites and lending words of comfort in burying our dead, call for the highest esteem, respect and love for one whose life has been spent in devotion to his Master's cause.

In surrendering the charge with which he has been so prominently identified, the vestry desire to express these sentiments of affectionate regard and extend the cordial good will of the congregation with whom he has been so long and pleasantly associated.

Notice is hereby given that on April 25, 1918, being the feast of St. Mark the Evangelist, in St. Mary's Cathedral, Memphis, Tenn., in the presence of the Rev. Arthur H. Noll, LL. D., and the Rev. George L. Neide, I did pronounce and record the deposition from the ministry of this Church of Reginald Irving Raymond, Presbyterian, at his own request and for causes not affecting his moral character.

Bishop of Tennessee.

What Nuxated Iron Is Made From

Sworn Statement of Composition of Its Formula

It increases the strength and endurance of delicate, nervous, run-down folks in two weeks' time in many instances.

The Board of Directors have authorized the broadest publication of the sworn statement of the composition of Nuxated Iron, one of the most widely used tonic, strength and blood builders in the world, so that the public may examine it for themselves and judge as to its merits.

It is conservatively estimated that this remarkable formula is now being used by over 3,000,000 people annually in America alone. Among those who have used and strongly endorse it are many physicians formerly connected with well-known hospitals, former United States Senators Wm. E. Mason and Charles A. Towne, former members of Congress; distinguished U. S. Army Generals (Retired), Judge Atkinson of the United States Court of Claims at Washington and former Health Commissioner Kerr, of Chicago.

Newspapers everywhere are invited to copy this statement for the benefit of their readers. It is suggested that physicians make a record of it and keep it in their offices so that they may intelligently answer questions of patients concerning it. Everybody is advised to cut it out and keep it. A copy of the actual sworn statement will be sent to anyone who desires such. It is as follows:

Iron Peptonate (Special Specific Standard) Quantity given below.

Sodium Glycerophosphates U. S. P. (Monsanto.)

Calcium Glycerophosphates U. S. P. (Monsanto.)

P. E. Nux Vomica U. S. P.
Cascarin Bitter
Magnesium Carbonate
Po. Ginger U. S. P.
Oil Cassia Cinnamon U. S. P.
Calcium Carbonate Precip. U. S. P.

Each dose of two tablets of Nuxated Iron contains one and one-half grains of organic iron in the form of iron peptonate of a special specific standard which in our opinion possesses superior qualities to any other known form of iron. By using other makes of Iron Peptonate we could have put the same quantity of actual iron in the tablets at less than one-fourth the cost to us, and by using metallic iron we could have accomplished the same thing at less than one-twelfth the cost; but by so doing we must have most certainly impaired their therapeutic efficacy. Glycerophosphates used in Nuxated Iron is one of the most expensive tonic ingredients known. It is especially recommended to build up the nerve force and thereby increase brain power, as glycerophosphates are said to contain phosphorus in a state very similar to that in which it is found in the nerve and brain cells of man.

As will be seen from the above, two important ingredients of Nuxated Iron (Iron Peptonate and Glycerophosphates) are very expensive products as compared with most other tonics.

Under such circumstances the temptation to adulteration and substitution by unscrupulous persons, is very great and the public is hereby warned to be careful and see every bottle is plainly labeled "Nuxated Iron" by the Dae Health Laboratories, Paris, London, and Detroit, U. S. A., as this is the only genuine article. If you have taken other forms of iron without success, this does not prove Nuxated Iron will not help you. We guarantee satisfaction to every purchaser or your money will be refunded.

In regard to the value of Nuxated Iron, Dr. A. J. Newman, late Police Surgeon of the City of Chicago, and former House Surgeon Jefferson Park Hospital, Chicago, says it has proven through his own tests of it to excel any preparation he has ever used for creating red blood, building up the nerves and strengthening the muscles. Dr. J. W. Armistead, Grove Hill, Ala., graduate of the University of Alabama School of Medicine, Mobile, 1883, says: "In the cases I used Nuxated Iron I have found more beneficial results than from any preparation I have ever used in 34 years' practice." Dr. R. B. Baugh, Polkville, Miss., graduate of the Memphis Hospital College, Memphis, 1898, says: "I always prescribe Nuxated Iron where a reconstructive tonic is indicated." Nuxated Iron often increases the strength and endurance of delicate, nervous, rundown folks in two weeks' time.

Manufacturers' Note: Nuxated Iron is not a secret remedy, but one which is well known to druggists everywhere. Unlike the older inorganic iron products, it is easily assimilated, does not inure the teeth, make them black, nor upset the stomach. Nuxated Iron is not recommended for use in cases of acute illness, but only as a tonic, strength and blood builder. (In case of illness always consult your family physician and be guided by his advice.) If in doubt as to whether or not you need a tonic, ask your doctor, as we do not wish to sell you Nuxated Iron if you do not require it. If you should use it and it does not help you, notify us and we will return your money. It is sold by all druggists. Dae Health Laboratories, Detroit, Mich.

HATCHED 117 CHICKS.

John A. Clark, of Jonesboro, Ark., writes: "I hatched 117 chicks and did not lose one. Not a weak one in the flock." Mrs. J. B. Courson, Cordova, Ala., writes: "I have been using your tablets and did not lose a single chick. My neighbors want your tablets."

You will not lose a single chick either, if you will use Reefer's Ready Relief, which every poultry raiser knows saves baby chicks from dying of that dreadful white diarrhoea plague. A package of this new scientific discovery will save 500 baby chicks. Aren't 500 of your baby chicks worth $1.00? That is less than one-half cent apiece. I take all the risk and will refund every penny of your money if Reefer's Ready Relief fails to save your chicks. A million dollar bank backs up this guarantee. Send for a dollar package today, or write for my free poultry book which tells the experience of a man who has made a fortune out of poultry. E. J. Reefer, 6404 Reefer Building, Kansas City, Mo.—Adv.

His attributes; it is all of them.—Ly-

To be able to say with truth that "he went about doing good" is one of the best things that can be said about a man after his death.—Ex.

The sun can mirror his glorious face
In the dewdrop on the sod;
And the humblest human heart reflect
The light and love of God.

consideration is this: "That God has a definite life-plan for every human person, girding him, visibly or invisibly, for some exact thing, which it will be the true significance and glory of his life to have accomplished." Many persons, I am well aware, never think of any such thing. They suppose that, for most men, life is a necessarily static and common affair. What it means for them they do not know, and they scarcely conceive that it means anything.—Bushnell.

The great lack of our life is that we do not pray enough. And there is no failure so disastrous or criminal as this.
It is very difficult to account for it. If in all times of discouragement and vicissitude we could have access to one of the wisest and noblest of our fellowcreatures, or to some venerated departed saint, or to the guardian angel deputed to attend our steps, or to the archangel that presides as vicegerent over this system of worlds, how strong and brave we should become. Whatever our need, we would at once seek his august presence, and obtain his counsel and assistance. How extraordinary is our behavior, then, with respect to prayer, that we make so little of our opportunities of access into the presence of our Father, in whom wisdom, love and power blend perfectly, and who is always willing to hear us—nay, is perpetually urging us to come!
—F. B. Meyer.

God wants men to mine for His truth.
Jesus did not hide His rich teaching in parables to keep us all from finding it, but that they who would might come to appreciation through appropriation.
Such would make truth their own by digging for it. Jesus paused in the midst of His parable teaching to say,
"For he that hath to him shall be given." It was an old principle before he restated it. The man who uses his money gets more money. The athlete who goes into training increases his muscle to bulging cords. And so Jesus says that if we use what Bible truth we have we shall get more. If we do not use it, he declared, we shall lose what we have. Are you refusing to teach that Sunday school class because you think you are not well enough equipped in Bible knowledge? You can only become a Bible student by building on the truth you now have.—Sunday School Times.

A Tennessee Mother.

"As a model of patriotism to the mothers of America," this letter by Mrs. M. E. Jenkins, of Holladay, Tenn., to Major Whitman, in charge of the base hospital at Camp Upton, has been posted by order of Brigadier-General Evans, commanding, upon all bulletin boards of the camp:

"Allow me, as one who has lived until now I am an old woman, to express to you my thanks and appreciation for your many courtesies to me as mother of Sergeant-Major William B. Jenkins. I had hoped my boy would get his chance in France, but it was not to be; so I am as submissive to his death as if he had died in the trenches in Europe.

"Please accept my thanks for all your kindness and to any of his comrades that were with him in his sickness. With a sad heart I dictate these lines, but with a quickening pulse and accelerated being I look forward to the day when victory shall come to the brave boys who are giving their lives for our beloved land. I shall ever love a soldier boy. May God's blessing be on you!"

However long the war, whatever its outcome, this letter will remain a document in the American case, a proof of the American spirit. From Camp Upton's bulletins it will go for wider usefulness to the scrapbooks of mothers and sisters and sweethearts throughout the country.

The Holy Ghost, the Comforter.

What does the word "Paraclete" mean? Nearly all the ancient interpreters render it comforter or consoler. This accords with one use of it and its related words both in the Old Testament and in the New. It does not cover the whole ground, since the Holy Ghost not only comforts, but does a great deal more than that. In some cases the word is equivalent to master, teacher, interpreter. In other cases it means a pleader or advocate—one engaged to take up a cause and to carry it through. Hence the word comes to mean—one by whose grace and love the entire case and cause of men is undertaken: who will soothe, comfort, advocate, plead, teach, interpret—yea, who will stand by and render any needed aid whatever! For this reason the word "advocate" is, like the word "comforter," too restricted. We want a word of wider significance than either. The word helper is the best that we can find. 1. A helper—a large and beautiful word, which, in the fullness of its meaning as here used, naught but the experience of God's love can unfold to us. 2. A Divine Helper. And we have two Divine Helpers, both working together to make the help complete. But who are they who have causes in hand that need such help? Manifold and complex is our need. We want help in every form. As sinners, we want such help as One can give who has a right to say, "Thy sins are forgiven thee." As penitents, we want One who can grant us access to the Father. As learners, we want One who can take of the things of God and show them to us. As suppliants, we want One who can receive and answer our requests. As believers, we want One who can lead, sustain and inspire. As confessors of Christ and ambassadors for Him, we need One who can convict men of sin, and who can speed our words directly to our hearts. Strong, constant, varied help do we want. Then let us look to our two Helpers and see how they complete each other's work. 1. One Helper is in Heaven, is a link joining heaven to earth; the other Helper is on earth, as a link uniting earth to Heaven. Hence one Helper remains for us above; the other remains in us below. 2. The help of the Son is by the appointment of the Father; the help of the Spirit is through the ministration of the Son. 3. By the help of the one Helper we have a great sacrifice for sin; by the work of the other Helper men are convicted of sin. 4. The Lord Jesus Christ presents Himself to us as the object of faith; the Holy Ghost working within us, enters into the region of an inward experience, and enables us by the power of a spiritual intuition to verify what we believe. 5. In every detail of Christian truth and life these two Divine Helpers supplement and complete each other's work. Christ reveals the Father to us; the Holy Ghost creates the spirit of adoption in us, so that we cry, Abba, Father. Christ gives us, when we believe, the right of being sons of God: the Spirit bears witness with our spirit that such we are. Christ is in Himself the truth; the Holy Ghost gives us the spirit of wisdom and revelation in the knowledge of Him. Christ is the object in whom we rejoice, but the joy itself is imparted by the Holy Ghost. 6. One Helper intercedes with the Father; the other Helper intercedes in the children. In one case "We have an Advocate with the Father"; "He ever liveth to make intercession for us." In the other case, "The Spirit Himself intercedes for us with groanings, which cannot be uttered." 7. The Lord Jesus Christ is the Advocate, Pleader and Defender of our cause above; the Holy Ghost is the Advocate, Pleader and Defender of our cause below. Christ above, that sin may not bar us from the throne; the Spirit below, that the world may not put us to shame. 8. One Helper is graciously preparing a place for us; the other Helper is engaged in preparing us for the place.—C. Clemance, D. D.

Whitsun-Day

The gift of the Holy Ghost, like the Incarnation of Christ, is one of those marvelous dealings of God with man, by which He shows His loving care of those whom He has created in His own image.

By this gift we are led gradually to that truth which Christ tells us is the road to eternal life.

The Holy Ghost is a person, the third in the Blessed Trinity, who strives to lead us by gentleness and grace to the fountain of life. He is not to be confounded with God the Father, who made us and all the world; nor yet with Jesus Christ, who redeemed us and all mankind; but He is the Holy Ghost, who makes us holy and all the people of God.

The contact of the Holy Spirit with the individual soul is the closest and most intimate relation that exists between God and man, and it is through the Holy Ghost that man can become like God in goodliness.

The Nicene Creed tells us that He, the Holy Ghost, is the Lord, and also the Giver of Life; and so we speak of Pentecost as the day of which the Church was born, because God's Spirit came into that organization which Christ had founded upon the rock, and the Church became a living organization, even the Mystical body of Jesus Christ, of which we are members by the grace of the Holy Spirit.

The word "Whitsun" is an early English word, meaning "White," the day being called "White" because it was a favorite day for Holy Baptism, and at Baptism the candidates were always clad in a white garment. The notion that "Whitsun" is derived from "pfingsten," German for Pentecost, is declared by the Century Dictionary to be absurd.—Parish Leaflet.

If there be no enemy, no fight; if no fight, no victory; if no victory, no crown.—Savanarola.

PREPAREDNESS FOR THE CHURCH

Never in the history of the country has the Church's responsibility in upholding the ideals of the nation been so great. In rendering its share of the essential work, its buildings should provide for maximum efficiency in every department. Consult the leading specialists in all branches of church improvement, construction, alteration, etc.

Designs will be prepared indicating how contemplated changes, etc., can be effected. Local labor will be availed of when desired for the constructive work, the artistic and elaborate enrichment being executed under the supervision of our New York artists.

Send for photographs of church interiors showing changes and improvements that have been accomplished, with memorial gifts included as a part of the scheme.

"MY SPIRIT UPON ALL FLESH."

It is not certain that the Prophet understood the wide meaning of his own words, or that St. Peter and the other Apostles, quoting them on the Day of Pentecost, did not also in their minds limit their application to the House of Israel. But we know very well that in the largeness of God's purpose there was no such limitation. It was marvelous in the eyes of the Holy Apostles that to the Gentiles also should be granted repentance unto life and that to them should be given the same gift as unto themselves at the beginning. The Lord, however, meant just what He taught His Prophet of old time to say—"upon all flesh." "For my thoughts are not your thoughts, neither are your ways my ways, saith the Lord."

The Jewish Church was not alone in a disposition to "limit the Holy One of Israel" and to set bounds to the extent of His favor. From the very beginning it has been a habit of mind of the Christian brotherhood, as the most cursory glance at the Church's history will show. Men have almost a mania for tabulating and classifying things and reducing the operations of forces to "laws," so that they may the more readily understand them; which is an excellent thing in scientific work but does not succeed well in the spiritual sphere. Spiritual power is constantly breaking out of bounds in its manifestations. No one has yet been able to reduce the operations of the Divine Spirit to a formula nor to define the reach or methods of His mighty influences. The fact should make us the more hopeful and expectant. It should also make us very careful in our judgment of persons or movements which lie outside of our approved systems but may still bear indubitable signs of the Spirit's work. "By their fruits ye shall know them" is the one test. "We forbade him, because he followeth not with us," has been the point of cleavage for many a distressing schism.

"How little a portion do we know of Him!" We think of His work in our little lives, in our Church, and through the regular and appointed channels of His grace. Wonderful and gracious it is beyond all understanding, yet it is but a little portion. All the while He is working, by other means and through other channels which we know not, "upon all flesh." The heathen who have no knowledge of His laws are not beyond the reach of His holy influences. The godless world, careless of His admonitions, is overruled far more than we imagine by the sway of His power. In the events of history, in the achievements of science, in the advance of civilization, in the great movements of human thought whose source or impetus no man can fully trace, He is working, moving, guiding to a certain end with manifold wisdom and sublime patience.

We love to think of the quietness of His ways and the gentleness of His voice, "soft as the breath of even." We fear lest the Heavenly Dove may be silenced by the clash of arms and driven away by the tumult of embattled nations. But there is another side to His manifestations. To Joel of old His coming seemed not unassociated with great and terrible things; "wonders in the heavens and in the earth: blood and fire and pillars of smoke." May we not hope and reverently believe that as the earth has never seemed to need His strong powers more than now, so perhaps they have never been more decisively operative? It is a time that is trying men's souls, a time when multitudes of men and nations are being brought down to the valley of decision, a time of the evolution of new ideals and the cultivation of a new spirit of justice and of self-sacrifice, a time when the fundamental principles by which men shall live and die are being put to the touch and the purposes and passions by which they are governed are being stripped of camouflage and brought to view in their naked beauty or ugliness. May it not well be a time when the Holy Spirit of God is "doing wondrously" beside the rude altars of the world's sacrifice and in behalf of the souls of men?

At this season of Pentecost, so pregnant of momentous events, so insistent in its demand upon all that is truest and bravest in us and in the world, let us claim with thankful confidence the promise of the Spirit "upon all flesh." Let us believe that He is moving upon these troubled waters, is guiding mankind into higher realms of truth, into holier bonds of brotherhood, into new kingdoms of spiritual power; and that in multitudes of precious souls His gracious unction is being manifested in the conquest of self, in victory over sin and falsehood and cowardice, in a new birth into the higher manhood of the sons of God. And so with renewed earnestness let us harken to His teaching and invoke His presence and power in ourselves that in Him we may be wise and true and of good courage.

THE APPEAL TO OUR BISHOPS FOR LEADERSHIP, AND THEIR RESPONSE; A "FAILURE OF CHRISTIAN STATESMANSHIP."

It is not surprising that Dr. Newman Smyth and Professor Walker, the signers of the direct appeal to the House of Bishops of the Protestant Episcopal Church for some concrete act in the direction of Church unity, should be moved to make reply to the disappointing and coldly unsympathetic negation by the Bishops of their overture; nor yet that there should be a tone not only of regret but of resentment in their comments. For this they will hardly be blamed. To a large part of their able and most respectful paper the Bishops, in the report accepted by them, deign to make no reply at all. If lack of time for consideration during a short two-days' session was the excuse for this it made it the more unnecessary for the Committee drafting the report to go out of their way to assign the reasons they give for declining to treat with their memorialists and in doing so to read them a lecture on their assumed denominational shortcomings.

The failure of the Bishops to meet an open opportunity with a single positive or constructive word, much less a single timely action, could hardly be more plainly or temperately indicated than is done by the authors of the appeal in the opening paragraph of their reply.

In the communication accompanying the Appeal for an act of unity, which was laid before the Episcopal House of Bishops at their meeting April 10, in New York, we expressed the earnest desire that at this present crisis there might come from the Episcopate a call of Christian leadership to which other churches of every name might respond. In their reply, which has been communicated to us, we regret to find expressed only a "humble lamenting of the comparative powerlessness of the Church in this great world crisis," an exhortation to the practice of the non-controversial virtues, and to prayerful preparation and patient waiting until at some undetermined time after the war is over the proposed World Conference "may take into careful and deliberate consideration the questions concerning Faith and Order which now divide us." In this reply no policy is outlined, no suggestion is offered for immediate action to meet the crisis which the Church now faces. The reply seems to us to be the failure of Christian statesmanship. The hour of supreme duty passes—and official Christianity remains silent.

Referring to their specific proposal that a joint or supplemental ordination and authorization be given to chaplains in the army and navy, which they briefly recite, they continue:

"The reply of the Bishops rejects our proposals as a 'patched up peace,' an 'ill considered expedient, endangering and retarding the cause of Reunion, and provocative of fresh misunderstandings;' but it offers to us no other proposal. When we seek further for the reasons for the Bishops' summary rejection of our appeal, we find that they do not take up the successive considerations which we deemed might render our suggested action feasible and honorably acceptable to them as well as to ourselves; but, leaving these without notice, they turn aside and, while not mentioning the names of any communions, they offer two reflections upon non-Episcopal Churches in general as their reasons for rejecting any overtures for immediate acts of Church unity. They allege that 'the real difference between religious communions goes down, in many cases, to the recognition, or not, of a definite revelation of God's mind and will made by our Lord Jesus Christ His incarnate Son, and of His Church as the minister of His truth and grace.'"

In reply to this the memorialists refer to a statement presented by the Congregational Commission to the preparatory North American Conference for the proposed World Conference on Faith and Order, wherein the "Spiritual Basis of Fellowship" is defined as "the faith, resting on the Incarnation of the Son of God, of the whole Church as itself created by Christ and continued from age to age by His indwelling Life until He comes." This statement was adopted without dissent by the representatives of sixty different churches of the United States and Canada, including several Bishops and other clergymen of the Episcopal Church. It speaks further of "the Christian conviction of the essential and indestructible wholeness of the one Church of God throughout the world" as that to which the invitation of the World's Conference appeals. "While this confession stands," they add, "we submit that this difference which is given as a reason for continued division between us does not in fact exist, and that the allegation of it should be withdrawn." In reply to a further objection they say:

"We are obliged to notice that this objection in this reply goes still further. It is said that 'to join in the commission of a chaplain from whatever Church he may come, would be to deny that any truth, including that of the Triune Being of God, or of the Incarnation of the Eternal Son, is of real importance and necessity.' It would hardly seem necessary for us to observe that while exceptional cases might require some special consideration, that need not prevent those who are in essential agreement in faith from practicing their religion in mutual trust together."

It has been the fashion with the Catholic party in our Church, ever since they have been repudiating her Protestant character, to classify all non-Episcopal religious bodies, whether Christian or semi-pagan, as "Protestants"; the purpose being, of course, to bring that name into disrepute among us without regard to its proper and historic meaning. The authors of the reply of the House of Bishops seem to have fallen into somewhat the same vice in their interpretation of the words, "from whatever Church he may come." Obviously the petitioners meant, "from whatever Christian Church he may come"; the test being, in the mind of these Congregational brethren and as they themselves express it, "the faith, resting on the Incarnation of the Son of God." Had the Bishops generously conceded this meaning to the phrase, or supplied, if they thought necessary, the qualifying word, they would hardly have written that paragraph or met with the rebuke which it occasioned.

As regards the assertion that in the case of many of the religious communions represented by the memorialists "there is no central or authoritative body with which we (the Bishops) can treat," the authors of the Appeal refer to their personal credentials which they had submitted and to their National Council, which, they believe, "possesses such moral authority that our Episcopal brethren, if so disposed, may confidently treat with it on questions of common concern for the advancement of the Kingdom of God."

In conclusion the petitioners say, with unabated spirit:

"We are far from insisting upon any proposals we may have suggested as the only or the best possible measures in this hour of emergency. We still hold ourselves in readiness to receive from the Bishops, whether collectively or individually, any overtures for unifying action that shall express the fundamental unity of Christianity. But we cannot on our part consent to remain in what the Bishops have so truly described as a position of 'comparative powerlessness.' At this hour, when as of old all the tribes of our Israel are called to come down against the mighty, our churches cannot be content to sit like Reuben among their sheep folds listening to the pipings of their flocks. We must decline, therefore, to receive the reply of the House of Bishops as an adequate or final declaration of the mind of the Episcopal Church. Rather with increased urgency since the failure of this reply from the House of Bishops to rise to the height of the great argument of God with His Church in this hour of its supreme opportunity we would lay again our appeal before the individual Bishops and the communions in their respective Dioceses, the clergymen of every name in their pulpits, the great body of Christian laity, and the journalists who know what the people are feeling for, as they are becoming more profoundly religious in their sacrificial suffering in the war.

"Newman Smyth,
"Williston Walker."

These gentlemen are right in declining to "receive the reply of the House of Bishops as an adequate declaration of the mind of the Episcopal Church" on this great issue. It represents fairly the "mind" of a large section of this Church. Unfortunately it represents the attitude of indifference or of incurable pessimism of many others. But not all the Church is living in a forgotten past, oblivious of the demands of a new hour. The way to better things in the direction of unity and efficiency she may not plainly see, but she is faintly hearing something of "the argument of God with His church in this hour of its supreme opportunity," and will yet awake to a realization of her duty and to the splendor of her opportunity.

THEOLOGICAL COUNCIL MAKES PRELIMINARY DECISIONS.

The fifth meeting of the Council on the Education of Postulants and Candidates for the Ministry was held at the General Seminary, New York City, May 1 and 2. Twenty-six of the thirty-four members were present. Eleven seminaries, eight provinces and various interests within the Church were represented.

For over a year and in four meetings, the Council has faced the Church's demand to reconstruct the education and training of the minister that he may be better equipped to meet the needs and organization of present-day society. Dean Bartlett, Chairman of the Committee on Normal Standards, presented a report embodying the results of the Council's discussions to date. This report received final amendments and suggestions, and in the end was adopted as representing the majority opinion of the Council. This report will now go to the Council's Committee on the Formulation of a Canon. This committee will either suggest a new canon, or propose a revision of the present one. Dr. Robinson is Chairman of the Committee on Canon, and Dean Green, Dr. Addison, Dr. DeVries and Mr. George Zabriskie are members.

The report contains five principles as follows:

1. Principle of Normal Standard. There shall be a full Normal Standard, formulated by canon, mandatory in character, put to the fore as descriptive of the Church's mind, and expressed in simple and general terms intended to indicate subjects only.

The following are the subjects proposed under this principle:

For Admission to the Priesthood.

Before ordination to the priesthood, the candidate must pass examinations in the following subjects: 1. Holy Scripture: The Bible in English; the New Testament in Greek; history of the canon; introduction to the contents of the various books; biblical history; exegesis. 2. Church History: From the beginning to the present time; together with special knowledge of a chosen period. 3. Doctrine: The contents of the Christian faith, with the evidences therefor. 4. Christian Ethics: Including practical psychology and practical sociology. 5. Liturgies: The history and principles of Christian worship; the contents and use of the Book of Common Prayer. 6. Ecclesiastical Policy and Canon Law, with special knowledge of the constitution and canons of the General Convention and of the Diocese to which the candidate belongs. 7. Ministration: (a) Conduct of public worship, with the proper use of the voice therein. (b) Preaching. (c) Pastoral care. (d) Parish organization administration, including the keeping of accounts. (e) Religious education. (f) The missionary work of the Church: its claim, its extent and its methods.

Admission to the Diaconate.

Before admission to the diaconate it shall suffice if the candidate shall pass examinations in the following portions of the requirements set forth for admission to the priesthood; and, if advanced to the priesthood, he shall not be re-examined in these subjects or portions of subjects: 1. Holy Scripture: The Bible in English: Contents and interpretation of the various books; biblical history. 2. Church History: A general outline, together with the history of this American Church. 3. Doctrine: The elements of Christian doctrine. 4. Liturgies: The contents and use of the Book of Common Prayer. 5. Constitution and Canons of the General Convention and of the Diocese to which the candidate belongs. 6. Ministration: (a) Conduct of public worship, with the proper use of the voice therein. (b) Preaching. (c) Religious education.

2. Principle of Electives. The candidate must, in addition, offer at least one elective, and if dispensed from Greek, two electives. The following subjects were suggested and accepted: Old Testament in Hebrew; Advanced Exegesis of Greek New Testament; Biblical Criticism; Biblical Theology; History of Religion; Sociology; Psychology; Christian Archaeology; Christian Biography; Church Music: Its History, Theory and Practice; and as a concluding elective, "Work of a specialized and advanced character in any recognized field of study."

This provision of electives makes possible some degree of specialization in the preparation for the ministry.

3. Principle of Minimum Standard. There shall be a Minimum Standard, which shall be sufficiently low and elastic to meet all proper actual needs and conditions. This Standard shall be reached by a process of obvious subtraction and departure from the full Normal Standard, and shall be strictly limited to well-defined classes of cases. These classes are suggested as follows:

4. Principle of Special Classes. (a) Men of thirty years or over may be admitted candidates if they satisfy the Bishop and the examining chaplains that they possess good mental ability and a sufficient mastery of the usual branches of secondary learning. They may be ordained to the diaconate upon satisfactorily passing the examinations prescribed for the diaconate, provided they shall have been candidates for at least one year. They may be advanced to the priesthood without further examination, provided they shall have served two years in the diaconate with repute and success.

(b) Men of other race or speech may be admitted candidates if they satisfy the Bishop and examining chaplains that they possess good mental ability and a sufficient mastery of the usual branches of secondary learning. They may be ordained to the diaconate upon satisfactorily passing the examinations prescribed for the diaconate, provided they shall have been candidates for at least one year; and provided further, that they shall also pass a special examination in the history and government of the United States of America. They may be advanced to the priesthood without further examination, provided they shall have served two years in the diaconate with repute and success.

(c) The Bishop of any Diocese or Missionary District, subject to the usual consent and approval of the Standing Committee or Council of Advice, may, at his discretion, ordain to the diaconate any candidate who shall have satisfied the examining chaplains that he possesses sufficient knowledge of (a) the contents and interpretation of the Book of Holy Scripture; (b) the doctrines of this Church, and (c) the contents and use of the Book of Common Prayer; and he may also advance a deacon, so ordained, to the priesthood, without further examination, if the said deacon shall have served with repute and success at least two years in the diaconate: Provided only, that no deacon or priest so ordained shall be permitted to exercise his ministry outside of the Diocese or district in which he was ordained, until and unless he shall have passed in full the examinations required under the Normal Standard.

Principle of Interpretation. That the detailed recognition of the range and extent of subjects of examinations which will be necessary to make the canon workable should, as hitherto, be left to the Bishops and examining chaplains, subject to three provisions:

(a) That the office, duties, appointment and tenure of examining chaplains shall be defined and standardized by canon.

(b) That Diocese or districts composing a province may appoint representatives from Boards of Examining Chaplains to form a Provincial Board of Examining Chaplains, and that it shall be competent for such Provincial Board to prepare a syllabus indicating the range and character of the attainments required in the several subjects, and also to prepare question papers for written examinations. This syllabus and these papers may be adopted, subject to the approval of the Bishop, by Diocesan examining chaplains.

(c) That the Theological Department of the General Board of Religious Education may be authorized to advise and counsel with the Boards of Examining Chaplains and assist them in making more effective the required examinations for entrance to the ministry.

APOSTOLIC SUCCESSION.

The Rev. B. R. Phelps.

It is claimed that Episcopal Bishops are successors of the apostles in their office—that the apostles ordained Bishops who in turn ordained other Bishops, and so on, until the succession reached to the present time. But Bishop Lightfoot, late of the English Church, in an exhaustive historical and scriptural survey, has shown that this opinion is an error, and that Bishops owe their origin to elders, not to the apostles; and the Bishop is on all hands acknowledged to have been "the profoundest scholar the English Church had produced for many a day."

Under the Mosaic dispensation, as under the Christian, "the whole community was regarded as a kingdom of priests, a holy nation."

It seems like a prophecy of the Christian system that when the priestly tribe was set apart for the special service of God, they were ordained, not by Moses, the leader, not by Aaron, the high priest, but "the children of Israel were to put their hands upon the Levites." Numbers 8:10. In the Christian Church "the priestly functions of the Christian people are never regarded as transferred or even delegated to their officers. These are called stewards or messengers of God, servants or ministers of the Church, but the sacerdotal title is never once conferred upon them. The only priests mentioned in the New Testament are the saints, the members of the Christian brotherhood."

It is well known that Bishop means overseer, and it is in Scripture a title given to elders.

The baseless "opinion hazarded" by the Syrian Bishop Theodoret (423 to about 457 A. D.) that "the same officers in the church, who were first called apostles, came afterwards to be designated Bishops"—seems to have had a pernicious influence.

The only ground on which Theodoret built his theory is that Epaphroditus is mentioned as an apostle of the Philipians. "But this interpretation will not stand. The true apostle, like St. Peter or St. Paul, bears the title as the messenger of Christ Himself, while Epaphroditus is only so styled as the messenger of the Philipian brotherhood, and in the next clause the expression is explained by the statement that he carried their alms to St. Paul."

To quote Bishop Lightfoot, "The Episcopate was formed, not out of the apostolic order by localization, but out of the presbyterial by elevation."

In the mother Church at Jerusalem we find this developed form of the ministry. James, the Lord's brother, evidently held a position like that of our Bishops. We notice that he takes precedence of the Apostles Peter and John in the Council, for he "suggests its decisions and seems to have framed its decrees."

At first the apostles were superintendents in each church and had control also of the finances. A second step in the development of church government was the delegation of "some trustworthy disciple to direct the affairs of the church" in some locality where he would fix his abode. Timothy and Titus are examples. "The time during which he (Timothy) was to exercise authority as the delegate of an apostle was of uncertain duration." (E. H. R., in Smith's Dictionary of the Bible.) "St. Paul's language implies that the position they (Timothy and Titus) held was temporary. In both cases their work is drawing to a close when the apostle writes, 'The Scriptures give no intimation that either of them were to hand on to others their position as apostolic delegates.'" (Lightfoot.)

Clement of Rome (70 to 96 A. D.), gives the following as the origin of Bishops, not as appointed successors of the apostles in their office, but one of the elders was chosen to preside over the rest for the healing of dissensions and prevention of heresy. He writes, "The apostles foreseeing disputes to arise, if they should fall asleep, other approved men should succeed to their office," that is, as Lightfoot shows from the context, to the office of presbyters.

Jerome (398 A. D.) speaks in the same strain. "Before factions were introduced the churches were governed"—by successors of the apostles?—no—"by a council of elders." He continues,

"But when each man considered those he had baptized to belong to himself, it was decided that one elected from the elders should be placed over the rest, so that the care of the churches should devolve on him and schism be removed." To this was the origin of Bishops, not through succession from an apostle.

Consider this—Polycarp (108 A. D.), Bishop of Smyrna, writes to the church at Philippi, in the name of himself and the presbytery, advising concerning the very authority of presbyters and deacons, yet (not well) he never refers to their Bishop and his tone is inconsistent with the supposition that they had one. Yet fifty years before Philippi had presbyters and deacons, as Scripture shows (Phil. 1:1). Here there was a church in the second century, but it had no successor of an apostle.

Well, go to Corinth in Greece. Clement (93-101 A. D.), Bishop of Rome, writes to the church in Corinth. Yet, like Polycarp, he makes no allusion to a Bishop there, though the main subject of the letter is the ill-treatment of certain presbyters. But he upholds their authority as holding an office instituted by the apostles themselves. Here, then, is still another church, two generations after Christ, evidently without a successor of an apostle. Clearly enough there can be a church without a Bishop. We "swing around the circle" to Rome. Clement is reputed its Bishop (93-101 A. D.), but if he held that office, it is not surprising (1) that in writing he makes no distinction between himself and the rest of the church, like Polycarp, for instance (108-166 A. D.), a generation or more later; (2) it is of still more importance that speaking "of the ministry as an institution of the apostles he mentions only two orders and is silent about the episcopal office; (3) also he still uses Bishop in the old sense of presbyter; (4) still further, Ignatius, a strong champion of episcopacy, on his way to martyrdom (107 A. D.) writes to the Romans. Now, all his six other letters extant "contain injunctions of obedience to Bishops," yet in this letter is no allusion whatever to the episcopal office as being in Rome. Surely this indicates it did not exist there at this period, and here was the church in Rome in the second century ignorant of a successor to an apostle; (5) to return to Clement, a few years later he speaks of "the elders"—not Bishops—"who preside over the church."

Irenaeus has a list of successive ministers at Rome. First, Linus; second, Avencletus; third, Clement. But no more can safely be assumed of the first two than that they held some prominent position in the church; though the universal tradition of the next age makes Clement a Bishop, yet rather as chief of the presbyters than chief over presbyters.

What do we find in Alexandria in Egypt? The church there was probably founded in apostolic times, and was connected with St. Mark. Clement (193-211 A. D.), of Alexandria, sometimes speaks of two orders, presbyters and deacons; sometimes of three, Bishops, presbyters and deacons. From this we surely may gather that as late as the close of the second century in Egypt a Bishop was regarded as a presbyter, not as a successor of an apostle, though in a manner distinct from presbyters generally. See what he further says of ordination. "At Alexandria the Bishop was nominated and apparently ordained by the twelve presbyters out of their own number." Not appointed and ordained, as Timothy and Titus by an apostle.

In Alexandria the succession was not of Bishops, but of heads of the Catechetical School; and the first Bishop certainly mentioned there was so late as Origen's time (A. D. 230-254).

That the office of Bishop came from the presbytery is also shown by the fact that Irenaeus of Lyons (180 A. D.) appears ignorant of the fact that the name had passed from its original significance to denote a higher office. He "views the episcopate as a distinct office" but not "a distinct order" as the diaconate is a distinct order. By the way, the Prayer Book takes the same view, for it speaks of the "making" and "ordering" of deacons and presbyters, but the "consecration" of Bishops. Irenaeus speaks of "presbyters who are in the churches, who have the succession from the apostles." Is not this the "apostolic succession"—a succession of elders from the apostles?

We see Jerome (390 A. D.) giving the reason for episcopacy, not that it was of divine institution, but "with the ancients presbyters were the same as Bishops, but gradually all the responsibility was deferred to a single person, that the thickets of heresies might be rooted out." And notice him saying also, "Presbyters know that by" (what?) "the custom of the church they are subject to him who has been set over them. So let the Bishops be aware that they are superior to presbyters more owing to" (what?) "custom than to an actual ordinance of the Lord."

Would it not be a happy circumstance if these words were acted upon, and men (when believers in Christ should be of one mind) would not baselessly insist that a man must be ordained by a successor of an apostle, in order to be recognized as a minister of Christ? Jerome (as late as 390 A. D.) uses the name Bishop as synonymous with presbyter, saying, "What sort of person ought to be ordained presbyter or Bishop?"

On what ground does the great Augustine (so late as 398 A. D.) say, "The episcopate is greater than the presbytery"? According to divine direction? No. "According to the practice of the Church."

Hilary in Egypt (424 A. D.) says, "The presbyters seal" (i. e., ordain or consecrate) "if the Bishop be not present." And yet some in our day say, "No church without a successor of an apostle."

Eutychius (933-940), patriarch, says, "The Evangelist Mark appointed with the Patriarch Hanaanias twelve presbyters, who when the patriarchate should become vacant might choose one of the twelve, on whose head the remainder laying their hands should create him patriarch." This custom did not cease until about 325 A. D. Where was a Bishop ordained by a successor of an apostle here?

Does not the foregoing investigation prove incorrect such assertions as Bingham's, for example, in his Antiquities: "1. That the ancient writers of the Church always speak of these (three) as distinct orders. 2. That they derive the original of Bishops from the Divine authority."

We have indeed an example in apostolic times of our Bishop in St. James at Jerusalem, and this may be counted as a Divine sanction. Episcopacy was established in many places in the second century, and from these and other facts adduced it may be the best form of church government.

One of our not High Church Bishops argued that necessary unity and superintendence under one headship are necessary.

Yet he is constrained to add, "The divineness of an institution depends" (not upon tactful succession of chief ministers but) "upon the divineness of its adherents and the divineness of the principles it embodies." He justly claims that "efficiency is the test of value." And who can claim there is not efficiency in non-episcopal organizations. So that this Bishop claims "the ministries of the Protestant bodies are as much of Divine origin as those of ancient churches."

The "judicious" Hooker comes, in his eight books on Ecclesiastical Polity, as a further witness to the claim that a church may exist without a Bishop tracing ordination to an apostle, for while he "looked upon the government of Bishops as primitive and the arrangement excellent, he did not hold this form of church polity necessary." (Anglican and Puritan, Art. Hooker.)

"Where but three are, and they of the laity also, yet there is a church." (Tertullian Exhor. ad Cestit, C. T.)

Since then the ordination of the Levites by the laying on of the hands of the Israelites is a sanction for a similar ordination in the church, where all the members are priests; since Timothy's and Titus' position was but temporary; since Clement, of Rome, testifies the origin of Bishops was that one of the elders was chosen to preside over the rest for healing of dissensions, and prevention of heresy; since Jerome tells us the churches were governed at first by a council of elders; since it is evident there was no Bishop at the close of the first century in Philippi (108 A. D.), Corinth (about 100 A. D.), nor Rome; nor in Alexandria and Lyons about a century later; since we hear of a succession of elders, not apostles, from the apostles; since Jerome and Augustine testify the superiority of Bishops was by custom, not Divine appointment; since in the fifth century, Bishops still addressed presbyters as "fellow presbyters"; since hopes and councils until the Reformation regarded the superiority of Bishops as resulting from custom, not Divine authority; since in Egypt in the fifth century the presbyters ordained or consecrated in the absence of the Bishop; since one of our Bishops and the "judicious" Hooker regarded episcopacy as non-essential; since, where three lay members are, there the Church is, must we not conclude that, though episcopacy may have the Divine sanction and be the best form, a church may exist without it.

And let us acknowledge with our learned Lightfoot that "as a general rule the highest acts of congregational worship should be performed through the principal officers of the congregation. But an emergency may arise" (may we not instance the unworthiness of the minister) "when the spirit and not the letter must decide." "The higher ordination of the universal priesthood will overrule all limitations. The layman will assume functions which are otherwise restricted to the ordained minister."

The Great Commission

Send Magazines to the Soldiers Through the Church Periodical Club.

The following quotations are from mail received at the office of the Church Periodical Club during the past week:

"I hope that you will be able to render me much-needed aid in the way of reading matter. The men, especially those in hospital, are starved for magazines."

"There is so much to be done and very little to do with here that at times one becomes discouraged."

"The soldiers in the hospitals are almost entirely without reading matter, and will be exceedingly grateful for any magazines of interest to them."

"The magazines are appreciated and enjoyed, they have done full service in the wards. The eternal cry is, 'Have you any magazines?'"

"We always need and appreciate any literature we can get. That is one thing which we have not very much of."

"A spare copy of Judge or Life would pave the way for a little comedy on these rainy days and would surely be acceptable."

"Any good literature that you may send us will be eagerly sought for by the fellows."

These words are a definite challenge to every man and woman in the Church and there is exactly one way in which they can meet it, the way of personal service. Do not give your magazines to any general agency. Do not send them unaddressed with a one cent stamp. These methods may serve for those who have no other, but they are not good enough for you, who have an organization that can put you in direct touch with the definite needs of your fellow Churchmen, who are serving their country. Do not hoard your magazines until they are a year, or even three months old. Transportation is slow, and they will be none too fresh, at best, when they reach their destination. Ask your C. P. C. officer, or failing her, the Church Periodical Club, 2 West Forty-second Street, New York City, for an address, telling what periodicals you will forward, and remember that our men in camp and at the front have as wide a range of intellectual interests as those at home. They will care for any magazine that you care for.

Forward magazines as soon as read, warped, addressed and with full postage, the same at the front as in this country, four ounces for a cent. Write a friendly note to the one to whom you are sending. You may receive an acknowledgment and you may not. This is unimportant compared with the fact that as the mails come in the man to whom you are sending has tangible proof that the Church at home is taking thought for him and backing his work.

If your magazines are already going to relatives or friends, or if they are pledged to the regular C. P. C. recipients—and we do not want those given up—try to afford one more subscription. We cannot all enlist for direct service, but everyone of us can send a magazine.

The rector of St. Andrew's Church, South Orange, reports that the Sunday-school Easter offering of $202.20 is $70 larger than that of last year, and $50 larger than that of any previous year.

"We have found," he says, "that giving to the Church is the best education for giving to the country. Every one of our scholars is the owner of one or more thrift stamps."

Part of the St. Andrew's offering is designated for the purpose of gasoline for the mission launch, "Pelican" in Alaska, and part for the support of St. James Hospital in Anking, China.

The reason some people do not believe in Foreign Missions, is that they are heathen themselves; they worship other gods.—E. J. Brown.

PRESIDENT PROCLAIMS THURSDAY, MAY 30TH,

A DAY OF PUBLIC PRAYER AND FASTING

Proclamation.

"Whereas, the Congress of the United States, on the second day of April last, passed the following resolution:

"Resolved, by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That, it being a duty, peculiarly incumbent in a time of war, humbly and devoutly to acknowledge our dependence on Almighty God and to implore His aid and protection, the President of the United States be, and is hereby, respectfully requested to recommend a day of public humiliation, prayer and fasting, to be observed by the people of the United States with religious solemnity and the offering of fervent supplications to Almighty God for the safety and welfare of our cause, His blessing on our arms and a speedy restoration of an honorable and lasting peace to the nations of the earth."

"And whereas, it has always been the reverent habit of the people of the United States to turn in humble appeal to Almighty God for His guidance in the affairs of their common life;

"Now, therefore, I, Woodrow Wilson, President of the United States of America, do hereby proclaim Thursday, the thirtieth day of May, a day already freighted with sacred and stimulating memories, a day of public humiliation, prayer and fasting, and do exhort my fellow-citizens of all faiths and creeds to assemble on that day in their several places and worship there, as well as in their homes, to pray Almighty God that He may forgive our sins and shortcomings as a people and purify our hearts to see and love the truth, to accept and defend all things that are just and right and to purpose only those righteous acts and judgments which are in conformity with His will, beseeching Him that He will give victory to our armies as they fight for freedom, wisdom to those who take counsel on our behalf in these days of dark struggle and perplexity and steadfastness to our people to make sacrifice to the utmost in support of what is just and true, bringing us at last the peace in which men's hearts can be at rest because it is founded upon mercy, justice and good will.

"In witness whereof, I have hereunto set my hand and caused the seal of the United States to be affixed.

"Done in the District of Columbia, this eleventh day of May, in the year of our Lord nineteen hundred and eighteen, and of the independence of the United States the one hundred and forty-second.

"WOODROW WILSON."

PRESIDENT WILSON, IN PROCLAMATION,

DESIGNATES MAY 20-28 AS "RED CROSS WEEK."

Proclamation.

"Inasmuch as the War Fund of 1917, so generously contributed by the American people to the American Red Cross for the administration of relief at home and abroad, has been practically exhausted by appropriations for the welfare of the men in our military and naval forces, and for those dependent upon them, and for the yet more urgent necessities of our Allies, military and civilian, who have long borne the brunt of war:

"And, inasmuch as the year of our own participation in the war has brought unprecedented demands upon the patriotism and liberality of our people, and made evident the necessity of concentrating the work of relief in one main organization which can respond effectively and universally to the needs of humanity under stress of war;

"And, inasmuch as the duration of the war and the closer and closer co-operation of the American Red Cross with our own army and navy, with the governments of our Allies, and with foreign relief organizations, have resulted in the discovery of rare opportunities of helpfulness under conditions which translate opportunity into duty;

"And, inasmuch as the American Red Cross War Council and its Commissioners in Europe have faithfully and economically administered the people's trust;

"Now, therefore, by virtue of my authority as President of the United States and President of the American Red Cross, I, Woodrow Wilson, do hereby proclaim the week beginning May 20, 1918, as 'Red Cross Week,' during which the people of the United States will be called upon to give generously to the continuation of the important work of relieving distress, restoring the waste of war and assisting in maintaining the morale of our own troops and the troops and peoples of our Allies by this manifestation of effort and sacrifice on the part of those, who, though not privileged to bear arms, are of one spirit, purpose, and determination with our warriors.

"In witness whereof, I have hereunto set my hand and caused the seal of the United States to be affixed.

"Done in the District of Columbia, this 7th day of May, in the year of our Lord, one thousand nine hundred and eighteen, and of the independence of the United States of America, the one hundred and forty-second.

"By the President:

"Robert Lansing, Secretary of State."

"WOODROW WILSON."

Meeting of the Board of Missions.

The meeting of the Board of Missions on May 8, 1918, was attended by the consideration of many exceedingly important matters. All were highly gratified to welcome Bishop Lloyd on his return from his trip to Liberia. His report was given most careful consideration. The Bishop of New York presented a resolution, which was carried unanimously, expressing the hope that the President would present the call and claim of the Church in Liberia to the Church at large with a view of securing action with reference to the needs as soon as possible.

To the great surprise of all the members of the Board Mr. E. Walter Roberts, who for forty-two years has been a most valuable member of the official staff, offered his resignation. A special committee, of which the Bishop of New York was Chairman, was appointed to draw up a suitable expression of appreciation and regret on the part of the Board. In view of Mr. Roberts' long service and with the many valuable contributions he has made to the missionary work of the Church it seems fitting that this resolution of appreciation should be known to all:

"In accepting the resignation of Mr. E. Walter Roberts as Assistant Treasurer of the Domestic and Foreign Missionary Society, the Board of Missions desires to express and place on record its grateful appreciation of the long-continued, faithful and intelligent service which he has rendered during the forty-two years of his official connection with the missionary work of the Church. Mr. Roberts came into the service of the Society in December, 1876, as cashier of the Foreign Committee and Assistant to the Treasurer, and was shortly thereafter elected Assistant Treasurer of the Foreign Committee. When the Domestic and Foreign Committees were merged in 1885, Mr. Roberts was elected Assistant Treasurer of the Society, which position he has since held covering a period of thirty-three years. During this time Mr. Roberts has been associated with six Treasurers. In addition to the fidelity and efficiency with which he has discharged his official duties, he has contributed in many ways to the inauguration of improved methods, in furtherance of the missionary work. The suggestion of an apportionment plan was advocated by him many years before it was adopted by the General Convention in 1901. It was he who devised the popular pyramid and keystone Lenten offering boxes and also introduced the present Letter of Credit System of the Society, instead of Bankers' Letters of Credit, by which 'Dollar Exchange' was first established wherever we have mission work, and the credit of the Society thus proved to be good on both sides of the globe. In thus expressing its keen appreciation of the services of Mr. Roberts, the Board indulges the earnest hope that God will spare him many years in which he may still render useful service in the work of the Church, in the extension of the Master's Kingdom."

The Board appointed Mr. Charles A. Thompson as Assistant to the Treasurer in place of Mr. Roberts.

Suitable memorials were adopted in connection with the death of Mr. Henry Lewis Morris, Mr. William R. Stirling and Mr. Charles G. Saunders, who had served for many years as most valuable members on the Board.

The resignation of Bishop G. Mott Williams as a representative from the Fifth Province was read, and accepted with great regret.

Mr. Robert S. Brewster, of New York, was elected to the lay membership on the Board in place of Mr. Saunders.

The President asked for the appointment of the Rev. F. S. White, D. D., as Domestic Secretary, which appointment was made unanimously.

Among the important matters recommended by the Executive Committee to the Board was the distribution of the Undesignated Legacy Fund accumulated during the year 1916-17. This fund amounted to over $268,000, $100,000 of which was set aside as a permanent fund, from the principal of which loans may be made to the various mission fields. Fifty thousand dollars was held for the present to be added to the undesignated legacies received during the present fiscal year for disbursement in whole or in part in January, 1919. The balance was distributed in various sums, both to the foreign and domestic field—about $65,000 in the domestic field and about $40,000 in the foreign. The appropriations for the fiscal year beginning January 1, 1919, were made at this meeting, amounting in all to $1,873,673; a decrease of about $6,000 over the present appropriation. Owing to the larger number of students in St. Augustine's School, Raleigh, N. C., and the greatly increased cost of running the school, an appropriation of $5,000 was added to that already made towards its running expenses. An important proposition from the Bishop in charge of Haiti to extend our work there and to secure additional property was presented and cordially approved.

The salaries of missionary Bishops have remained stationary for a long time. This matter was taken into consideration at the last General Convention, and has been the subject of considerable thought by the Board. A resolution was adopted making an increase of $600 per annum in the salary of each of the Continental Domestic Missionary Bishops beginning July 1, 1918. The question of making an increase in the salaries of those in Latin America, the Philippines, Honolulu and Alaska was taken under consideration.

A very important communication from the Woman's Auxiliary concerning their plan for war work was considered and accepted with the following resolution:

"Resolved, That the Board of Missions has heard with profound gratitude the plan of the Woman's Auxiliary for war work. It feels that such an effort is of vital importance at this time. It respectfully urges the Bishops and Clergy to co-operate in every way in their power to make it effective in their respective Dioceses and parishes."

Meeting of the Executive Committee.
At the Executive Committee meeting, May 7, the following were appointed to missionary work:

Mrs. Edward H. Rafter to St. Luke's Hospital, Ponce, P. R.; the Rev. L. W. Heaton to the Diocese of West Texas; Miss Nina Ledbetter as a teacher in St. Andrew's Priory, District of Honolulu. In the District of Alaska Mr. Richard C. Jenkins was employed at Ketchikan and as a physician in St. Luke's Hospital, Tokyo, Dr. Peer M. Lund.

An appropriation was made for the training in the New York Training School for Deaconesses for Miss Pauline A. Flint.

A Message to the President and to the Congress of the United States of America.

Our nation has, we profoundly believe, with clean hands and pure heart engaged in conflict for lofty and unselfish ends.

The attainment of those ends demands all the moral powers of our people, the conservation of our economic resources, and the highest efficiency in service.

These powers are impaired, this efficiency is greatly decreased, and our national vitality diminished by the liquor traffic and all its attendant evils, resulting in the waste of food, the waste of labor, and the waste of life itself.

Having duly recognized this in our army and navy by having taken measures to prevent the use of liquor by our troops, we believe that those who remain and serve at home should willingly apply to themselves the same principles which they apply to our soldiers and sailors and should submit to the same limitations for the welfare of the nation.

Therefore, in the interest of those who defend our nation, for the saving of our own supplies of food, for the highest efficiency of the industries which provide our means of warfare, and for the strengthening of the moral health of the people, we earnestly urge the President and the Congress of the United States to take steps to prevent, during the entire period of the war, by whatever means are feasible, the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquor of all kinds for use as a beverage, including the importation of all liquor.

Signed by the National Service and War-Time Commissions of Twenty-Seven American Churches and Other Religious Organizations.

Clergymen's Retiring Fund Society.

The semi-annual meeting of the Clergymen's Retiring Fund Society was held May 10 in the Church Missions House. The Treasurer's report showed receipts amounting to $29,897.29 for the last six months and a balance on hand of $13,899.43. Annuities paid last November amounted to $24,262.40. Measures were taken looking toward establishing as the uniform rate of percentage for annuity, on whatever amount each annuitant has contributed to the treasury, the 25 per cent, not less than which has been regularly paid during the last fourteen years. It was also determined to amend the fundamental laws by striking out the provisions for antedating and taking multiples of one's original payment. The continuous usefulness of the Society will be chiefly to those of the Clergy who are over sixty-eight years of age and already on the annuitant list, and to those who recognize the value of a life annuity at sixty, notwithstanding that in addition a pension may be waiting them at sixty-eight.

Resolution Adopted by the Church Periodical Club in Regard to the Zone System Applied to Periodicals.

Whereas, during the past thirty years the Church Periodical Club has been instrumental in placing large quantities of periodical literature of all kinds in remote and isolated communities in every part of this country; and

Whereas, there is documentary proof that their effort has been beneficial in raising the moral tone and the standards of living in these communities as well as in encouraging self-improvement on the part of individuals; and

Whereas, the application of the zone system to periodicals, by increasing the price and by lessening the number published, will seriously limit the philanthropic and educational work of the Church Periodical Club; and

Whereas, it is at this time a patriotic duty to give every aid in moulding the thought of all communities along the lines of intelligent loyalty, therefore

Be it resolved, That the Church Periodical Club protests most earnestly against the application of the zone system to periodicals and urges its members to ask the aid of their senators and representatives in repealing the present law.

Dr. Gresham Declines. Bishop Graves in Charge of the Philippians.

The Rev. Dr. Gresham declines his election to the Philippians, therefore the Presiding Bishop has appointed the Rt. Rev. Dr. Graves, Missionary Bishop of Shanghai, to the charge of the missionary district of the Philippians.

St. Louis, Mo., May 7, 1918.

Clergymen and the Y. M. C. A. in France.

Of the five clergymen of the Episcopal Church who were asked by the Overseas Headquarters of the Y. M. C. A. to give their services to our soldiers on the Western Front, three have made their decision. One of these, the Rev. Dr. Ernest M. Stires, D. D., rector of St. Thomas Church, New York, has decided to go, and expects to leave some time in June. The vestry of St. Thomas Church will relieve the Y. M. C. A. of all expenses in connection with Dr. Stires' trip and while "over there."

Bishop Gailor, of Tennessee, and the Rev. Dr. Charles L. Slattery, rector of Grace Church, New York, after prayer and thought, have decided that their best services to humanity during the war can be rendered in this country.

The leaders and speakers of special interest to Church people are: Dr. W. C. Sturgis, the Rev. Dr. R. W. Patton, Miss Bertha Richards and others. Dr. Sturgis will lead the intercessions daily, and Dr. Patton expects to be present most of the time.

Other leaders of wide reputation are: Dr. H. H. Horne, professor of the History of Education of New York University; Dr. W. H. Weatherford and Mrs. E. C. Cronk, an expert in the missionary education of children.

The registration fee to provide for program expenses, payable at the time of application, is $5.00. Board and lodging at the Blue Ridge Association varies from $12.50 to $20.00, depending upon whether or not one or more persons are in a room, and also upon the location of the room. Every bed is a single bed. The rooms are adjacent to convenient bath-rooms.

A small allowance should be made for extras.

Blue Ridge (Black Mountain is the railroad station, Blue Ridge being three miles away), to return not over seventeen days thereafter. Consult your ticket agent.

Accommodations will be reserved approximately in the order of application. Fees will be returned to any who apply after accommodations are all taken or who, ten days previous to the opening of the conference, send notice of inability to attend. Deaf Mute Work.

During March and April the Rev. H. C. Merrill, missionary to the deaf in the Dioceses of Washington, Virginia, Southern Virginia and West Virginia, visited nearly all of the mission stations in his field.

On April 5, in the Church of the Good Shepherd, Washington, he presented four candidates for confirmation to Bishop Harding. One of these candidates is at present a student at Gallaudet College, a member of the senior class, who will probably become a candidate for Holy Orders, and enter one of the theological seminaries as soon as the necessary arrangements can be made. On April 7, in St. John's Church, Charleston, W. Va., the missionary presented two candidates for confirmation to Bishop Gravatt, one of them having been baptized by him a short time previously, and on April 14, in St. Andrew's Church, Richmond, one deaf candidate was presented to Bishop Gibson.

In St. Luke's Church, Norfolk, on April 14, the missionary baptized the little daughter of a deaf mute couple, and in Wheeling, W. Va., on April 18, with the Rev. R. E. L. Strider, rector of St. Matthew's Church, he officiated at the funeral of Mr. H. T. Huggins, a deaf man who had long been a devout communicant of the church.

At its presentation day exercises on May 1, Gallaudet College, Washington, D. C., conferred the degree of Master of Arts on the Rev. John Keiser, curate of St. Ann's Church for the Deaf, New York City, a well-merited honor. The Rev. Mr. Keiser was present at the exercises and pronounced the benediction at their conclusion.

Arrangements are being perfected for a memorial service to the late Rev. Austin Ward Mann, one of the pioneer deaf mute clergymen in Detroit, Mich., on May 26.

Rt. Rev. W. C. Brown, D. D., Coadjutor.

The Winners of the Wallace Prizes: The Wallace prize contest in public extemporaneous speaking, open to the senior class of the Theological Seminary in Virginia, was held on Friday evening, May 3. The subject of the contest was "How Best to Win Men to Christianity," and the members of the class entering the contest were Messrs. George Robinson Hiatt, Robert W. Lewis, Alexander Miller, Gordon M. Reese, Sanford Lewis Rotter, Armand F. H. Serent and Clarence E. Wolfe.

The successful contestants were Mr. Gordon M. Reese, of Lancaster, Pa., who received the first prize, and Mr. A. F. Henry Serent, of New York City, the second.

Death of Two Prominent Members of the Church: Seldom has a community been called upon to suffer such a heavy loss as befell St. Martin's Parish, Hanover County, when on April 30 Lieutenant and Mrs. Nathaniel Burrell Cooke died of pneumonia within two hours. Of their abundance they gave with both hands to the poor and needy—none ever came to them in vain. As senior warden of the vestry and President of the Guild, their places can never be filled, and Old Fork Church has lost its "pillars."

St. Philip's Church, Richmond, has taken on new life, the congregation is well organized into Guilds, etc., and is working harmoniously, realizing more the idea of self-help. The rector has organized a mission in Sydney, and since December 16, 1917, has an enrollment of forty-eight scholars, in regular attendance, with classes in sewing, chair caning and physical culture. Mrs. R. A. Jackson teaches the class in sewing, and the girls are taught to make plain clothes. The sewing class is very much in need of a sewing machine. These classes are held on Thursday evenings. All persons having old chairs that need recaning, kindly notify the rector, the Rev. R. A. Jackson, 506 St. James Street, as they will serve as technical work for the scholars to learn by doing. The mission is a memorial to the late Rev. Churchill Gibson, of Petersburg, Va., father of our present Bishop.

LEXINGTON.

Rt. Rev. L. W. Burton, D. D., Bishop.

At the Cathedral: Arrangements have been made whereby Dr. Richard Wilkinson, rector of the Good Shepherd, Lexington, during the absence of the Dean of Christ Church Cathedral, will have charge of the Cathedral services as well as those at the Good Shepherd. The Good Shepherd will have an early celebration of the Holy Communion, and the Sunday night service, while the Cathedral will have the eleven o'clock service in the morning. Dr. Wilkinson will visit the Sunday-schools at both places each Sunday, and perform all pastoral duties and offices at the Cathedral, for which opportunity and occasion may offer, as well as at the Good Shepherd, his own congregation.

Aids Liberty Loan Campaign: Dr. Richard Wilkinson, rector of the Good Shepherd, Lexington, has recently returned from a visit to Ohio, where he delivered a series of addresses in the interest of the Third Liberty Loan Campaign, under the direction of the Speaker's Bureau of that district. In a letter received from Mr. John S. Pratt, Director, Speaker's Bureau, Liberty Loan Committee, Mr. Pratt states that Dr. Wilkinson was of "valuable assistance in making the Liberty Loan the success it was in this area."

Intercession for Allied Cause: At the Cathedral, on the afternoon of April 18, a service of intercession for the cause of the Allies was held, for which Bishop Burton set forth a special form of service. This service was a call to all the people of Lexington at the time when, during the April offensive the Allies, in spite of heavy resistance, were being driven back, to assemble in the Cathedral, that like Moses, Aaron and Hur, during the battle of Rephidim, they might assist the Allies by their prayer. Though this call was made but the evening preceding the service, the Cathedral was well filled. The Cathedral choir rendered efficient aid. Dr. McVey, President of the University of Kentucky, made an address admirably appropriate. The concluding prayer was offered by Dr. Muller, of the First Presbyterian Church, followed by the singing of the Star Spangled Banner and the Bishop's benediction.

Rev. Charles Pardee to Be at Council: The Rev. Charles L. Pardee, D. D., Corresponding Secretary of the American Church Building Fund Commission, will address the coming Diocesan Council, which meets May 28, at Ashland.

W. A. Meeting Postponed: The annual meeting of the Diocesan Branch of the Woman's Auxiliary of the Board of Missions, usually held in conjunction with the meeting of the Diocesan Council, has been postponed, "for weighty reasons and after due consultation," to a date in the fall to be announced later.

Banner Sunday-school: The Sunday-school of Christ Church Cathedral, under the able and laborious superintendency of Mr. Marston, now claims to be the banner Sunday-school in this Diocese. The school has three adult Bible classes. One women's class, and two men's, one of these for university students.

BETHLEHEM.

Rt. Rev. Ethelbert Talbot, D. D., Bishop.

The Schuylkill County Clericus met at Calvary rectory, Tamaqua, on Monday, May 6. All the Clergy of the Church in Schuylkill County were present, together with the Rev. Warren Randolph Yeakel, of Mount Carmel, and the Rev. James B. May, of Lansford. The Rev. Guy H. Madara, of Saint Clair, formerly a missionary in Alaska, gave a detailed description of the work among the Alaskan Indians. The Clergy were the guests of the Rev. Wallace Martin at dinner after the meeting.

Both parishes in the See City of Bethlehem will soon be filled, if the Rev. J. Arthur Glasier, rector of Trinity Church, West Pittston, accepts the call just extended to him by Trinity Church, Bethlehem. As noted recently, the Pro-Cathedral has called the Rev. J. I. B. Larned, of Kingston, N. Y.

The spring meeting of the Archdeaconry of Scranton was held at St. Peter's Church, Tunkhannock, the Rev. William L. Witmer, rector, on May 6 and 7. At the opening service on Monday evening there were addresses by the Ven. D. Webster Cox, Archdeacon of Scranton; the Rev. Amos Goddard, of Nanchang, China, and the Rev. Frank W. Sterrett, of Wilkes-Barre, the last named speaking on "The War and Christian Unity." At the business session, the Rev. S. Ezra Neikirk, of Pittston, presented an exegesis, the Rev. W. B. Beach, of Scranton, reviewed the book, "A French Soldier to His Mother," and the Rev. E. G. N. Holmes, of Montrose, discussed "The Problem of the Rural Church." Luncheon was served at the rectory.

The annual reunion of the Alumni of the General Theological Seminary in the Diocese of Bethlehem will be held on Monday, May 27, at Pottsville, when the Clergy will be the guests of the Rev. Howard W. Diller.

NEW YORK.

Rt. Rev. David H. Greer, D. D., Bishop
Rt. Rev. C. S. Burch, D. D., Suffragan

Memorial Service at Trinity Church. At a memorial service on Tuesday afternoon, May 7, in Trinity Church, the third anniversary of the sinking of the Lusitania was observed.

The Rev. Dr. William T. Manning, rector of the church, preached a stirring sermon. Other Clergy in attendance were the Rev. Dr. Howard Duffield, the Rev. Dr. Charles R. Canedy, acting chaplain of the Daughters of the Revolution; Bishop Frederick Courtney, chaplain of St. George's Society; C. C. Goodell, of the Empire State Society, Sons of the American Revolution, and the Rev. Dr. George F. Douglas, chaplain of the Loyal Legion.

The American and British colors in procession were accompanied by American soldiers and sailors and British soldiers.

Dr. Manning said in part:
"Strike for God and right with our whole strength until the Prussian monster shall be laid low—helpless forever—and peace and freedom shall be won for all men."

Urging America to exert its utmost, the preacher said:

"God can work miracles when He wishes to work them, but God is not likely to work miracles to save us from the consequences of our failure and inefficiency. The nation that falls short in feeding and equipping its armies will not be saved by prayer."

Of the men of Ireland who are refusing to add their strength to England's battle line, Dr. Manning said:

"The man who is not the enemy of the kaiser is the enemy of freedom. We call now upon the men of Ireland, without exception to join with their own heroic countrymen who have fought so magnificently in this war. We hope that their brethren in this country will send them a message that will open their eyes to their duty."

Anniversary Observed.

The twenty-fifth anniversary of the coming of Dr. Percy S. Grant to the rectorship of the Church of the Ascension was observed on the eve of Ascension Day this year. Addresses were made by Clergy and laymen, and the record of progress made during the two and a half decades were recited. It happened soon after Dr. Grant came to the rectorship that on the same evening Ascension vestry and a Presbyterian Church session met to consider their respective church affairs. One was near neighbor to the other. Both faced the same conditions. The Ascension voted to stay, the Presbyterian to go. One thought it could raise an endowment fund of $250,000 and command many volunteer workers, the other thought it could do neither. There are more people in the district to-day than then.

The Ascension's faith was warranted. Under Dr. Grant's leadership holding a strategic location, and growing in it, have been the record. The figures are not material. Ascension Church is there, larger than ever, and going to stay there. A part of its work which has attracted wide publicity is its Forum, where in particular labor and social matters are discussed.

MISSOURI.

Rt. Rev. D. S. Tuttle, D. D., Bishop.
Rt. Rev. F. F. Johnson, D. D., Coadjutor.

Death of Prominent St. Louis Churchman.

The Church in the Diocese of Missouri has suffered a great loss by reason of the recent sudden death of Dr. Henry N. Chapman, of St. Louis, due to heart disease. Dr. Chapman had been for some years a valued member of the vestry of the Church of St. Philip the Apostle and a much loved teacher of a Bible class for men. For a number of years Dr. Chapman was a member of the Board of Health of the city. A brother, the Rev. Frederick N. Chapman, had been on the Clergy list of the Diocese of Missouri for over a dozen years, though of late incapacitated for duty. He died a few months ago. A sister of Dr. Chapman is the wife of the Rev. C. F. Blaisdell, of Helena, Ark., formerly rector of St. Philip the Apostle.

The Northern Convocation recently had a successful session as the guests of the Macon parish. The Rev. George E. Wharton, of Mexico, was nominated to the Bishop for appointment as Dean.

The Southern Convocation met May 1, 2 and 3, as the guests of Trinity Church, De Soto. There was an unusually enthusiastic gathering of the Clergy, and more than the usual number of the laity were in attendance at the conferences and evening services. One session was given over to religious education under the leadership of the Rev. B. T. Kemerer, of St. Louis. One session was presided over by Mrs. Thomas Q. Dix, who spoke in the interests of the Junior Auxiliaries. It was voted to hold the next Convocation as guests of St. Stephen's, Ferguson.

The Rev. Samuel M. Dorrance has recently accepted appointment to minister in connection with the recruiting station at Jefferson Barracks during the term of the war. Mr. Dorrance came to this work the first of the year, and has served with marked efficiency and great acceptance.

At Grace Church, Crystal City, the largest confirmation class in recent years, was lately presented by the Rev. H. N. Tragitt, Jr. Mr. Tragitt ministers here, where is one of the biggest plate glass factories in the country, and also at Herculaneum, six miles distant, where is one of the largest lead smelters in the world. A Ford car, toward which the Junior Auxiliary gave $200, carries Mr. Tragitt about on his pastoral duties.

Work is going forward rapidly on the Bishop Tuttle Commemorative Parish House under the leadership of the Rev. L. H. White, minister of St. Mary's, St. Louis.

NEW MEXICO.

Rt. Rev. F. B. Howden, D. D., Bishop.

Annual Convocation.

The twenty-fourth Annual Convocation of the Missionary District of New Mexico (including Texas, west of the Pecos River) was held in Albuquerque, New Mexico, on April 30, and May 1 and 2. Nearly all the active Clergy were in attendance, with a good number of lay delegates. The Woman's Auxiliary held their annual meeting at the same time, with a large attendance.

The sermon, which will be published in pamphlet form, was by the Rev. W. S. Trowbridge, of Santa Fe.

Bishop Howden, in his address, spoke of three persons who, in the past year, had been called to the Church Expectant, the Rev. F. W. Carroll, of Silver City; Judge William H. Newcomb, of Silver City, and Mrs. Anna May Simpson, of Farmington.

Two church buildings had been freed from debt, and were recently consecrated at La Union and Mesilla Park. The confirmations, from January 1, 1917, to January 1, 1918, were one hundred and sixty-nine. For the Convocation year they were a little more.

There have been some changes in Clergy in the southern portion of the district, notably the addition of several Clergy, serving as voluntary chaplains among soldiers.

There are large sections that have been terribly neglected in the past. On the whole, however, distinct progress has been made in the past year.

The Bishop's home, purchased some four years ago, at a cost of about $10,000, has now been freed from debt. There is needed now a small endowment for its upkeep.

The hospital for Indian work near Farmington is now doing good work. Miss Peters, the missionary in charge of the hospital, was present, and made an address on the Indian work. An address on work among foreign people was made by the Rev. D. A. Sanford, of Gallup, who works among foreigners at the coal mines.

A committee was appointed to investigate concerning possibilities of work among foreigners, and report to the next Convention.

The Convocation closed with a patriotic service, with addresses by army chaplains.

The next Convocation will be held in El Paso, Texas, in May, 1919.

Our praise of Christ is but the expression of our recognition of Him for what He is, and our delight in love towards Him. Such love and praise, which is but love speaking, is all which He asks. Love can only be paid by love. Any other recompense offered to it is coinage of another currency, that is not current in its Kingdom. The only recompense that satisfies love is its own image reflected in another heart. That is what Jesus Christ wants of you.—A Maclaren.

Deaths.

The Rev. Charles Melvin Pullen, a retired priest of the Diocese of Colorado, died on April 19, at his home in Denver, aged seventy-five years. The body was taken to Evansville, Wisconsin, for burial.

The Gospel, once wrote Bishop McIlvain, eighty years ago, "is looking to Christ directly, freely, anywhere, whenever and wherever we feel our need of him, at sacraments or away from them, by the aid, indeed, of the minister's teaching and exhorting; by the like aid of the Bible strengthening our faith with its precious promises, and by the similar aid of sacraments and other ordinances setting before us the heart of God, but still looking unto Jesus as directly as the children of Israel looked unto the brazen serpent."

The finest heroism is that of ordinary life. Steadfastness in hard times is a far nobler manifestation of moral strength than the most dashing valor which souls display under the joyous impulse of great success.—C. E. St. John.

Tablet of Ten Commandments Presented to Courthouse.

On Monday, April 8, a bronze tablet of the commandments, 50x40 inches, which had been attached on previous Saturday to the Alleghany County Courthouse, Pittsburgh, was formally presented with appropriate addresses. It is the gift of Pittsburgh members of the International Reform Bureau and other citizens, Hebrew, Roman Catholic and Protestant.

Dr. Wilbur F. Crafts, Superintendent of the Reform Bureau, in a brief address as presiding officer, said:

"This is the first instance, so far as we know, that a courthouse has displayed its real cornerstone, laid by Moses twenty-five hundred years ago, and again laid twelve hundred years ago when Justinian began the first code of modern civilization with the ten commandments and other related passages from Exodus.

"Never so much as in this war, in which one side has torn laws in pieces as 'scraps of paper,' do we need to keep law as the alternate of war before our people. Napoleon said in substance, 'Morale is three times as important as munitions in war.' And what is 'morale'? As the name implies it is an outgrowth of 'The Moral Law,' as the Decalogue is called. It is the faith and hope and courage of an army and a people that believe this world is not flying unguided in space, but is God's world, controlled by a wise and loving providence, who overrules the plots of bad men for the good of the race. Like Moses, we 'endure as seeing the invisible.'"

Mr. A. Leo Weil, a much respected Hebrew attorney and civic leader, in making the speech of presentation in behalf of the donors, said, in part:

"These commandments, engraved upon enduring bronze, upon the entrance to this Hall of Justice, that they proclaim the basic principles upon which all law is founded, and by which all law should be interpreted and enforced. If the feet of Justice were always firmly planted on these commandments, then would her figure rise majestic, until her head reached far above the clouds, into the heavenly heights, and the scales and the sword would drop from her hands, and the bandage from her eyes, for she would have need of none of these. What more fitting place for these commandments, except upon the heart, than the entrance to this hall, where the people will come to transact their community business, and to lay before the judges their demands for justice and for the enforcement of their rights. These commandments cover the inherent rights of man—personal, property and social. All other rights are corollary. They also cover duty to God. They epitomize religious, social and civil obligations. They are all-sufficient, as a rule of action for man, as law has been defined. Shall a man keep the commandments and a nation defy them? Shall each, alone, be bound, but all together be free to violate, to refuse to observe? Hundreds of thousands—millions soon—will have given their best-beloved, and be willing to give themselves if need be, to safeguard these ten commandments, to continue them as a rule of conduct for men."

Presiding Judge John D. Shafer, in receiving the tablet, said, in part:

"I deem myself authorized to accept this tablet not only for the officers of the county, but for all its inhabitants of every race, kindred and tongue. Placed on this Temple of Justice it is a word in season, because it is germane to the purpose of this house and is of universal application. When the words of the commandments half-forgotten, or unknown, are read by the passer-by engraved in brass on the walls of the chief building of the county, they come to him from a worthy source, in dignified surroundings. While thousands will without doubt pass by and give no heed, yet there will be some whose attention will be arrested and whose minds will be called back to the lessons of early youth, some on whom an unconscious impression will be made which they will carry away without knowing it and which may affect their later actions. In addition to this, and I believe more than this, it is right that the community should emphasize at this time its belief in the eternal principles of truth and justice which are so trampled on in this world at this hour. It is right that we should publicly proclaim that the ancient principles of law and right which have been so long acknowledged among men are still in force, that we stand upon these ancient ways, that we have not arrived at that degree of 'Kultur' that we have learned to despise all the rules of right and justice as being outworn and useless in a new scientific age, as the rulers of our enemies in this war appear to do. We are engaged in a war for the maintenance of those ancient principles. It is right that we should proclaim them in their ancient form, that we should set them up publicly, written in letters of brass."

Mr. H. D. W. English read letters of endorsement from Bishop Cortlandt Whitehead and Bishop Franklin Hamilton, Methodist, and the meeting closed with repetition of the universal prayer, "Our Father, who art in heaven," customarily used when people of many faiths meet together.

The State Board of Health of Virginia has issued this very striking bulletin:

Homicides, Suicides—Alcoholism Reduced.

"Advocates of the liquor traffic will find small comfort in the official figures compiled by the Bureau of Vital Statistics of the State Department of Health of Virginia showing the number of suicides, homicides and deaths from alcoholism in the last two wet and the first dry years in Virginia.

"The figures indicate that the aggregate number of deaths from these three causes in 1915 was 554; in 1916, in which there were two dry months, 462, and in 1917, the first complete dry year, 354, showing a conservation of human life of two hundred persons. Valuing a human life at the small sum of $2,500, it would seem that in the first full calendar year under prohibition, Virginia saved the lives of a half million dollars' worth of its citizens.

"Detailed figures hold out some facts of considerable interest. Homicides in 1915 were 278 in number; in 1916, 260, and in 1917, 186. Suicides were 171 each in the years 1915 and 1916, while in 1917 they had been reduced to 124. Alcoholism was charged with 105 deaths in 1915; 91 in 1916, while in 1917 it was held accountable for but 44 deaths.

"Advocates of prohibition see in these figures fulfillment of their anticipations and prophecies."

Training.

The call for service has come. We have heard it and gladly have answered, "Here I am!" Yet in our eagerness to do all we can in the service of our King, our country, our fellow-men, we are like children, full of self-reliance. "Ready!" we cry, but—are we ready? Are our soldiers ready just because they have answered the call, no matter how willingly, how eagerly? Ask the officers in the training camps, ask the soldiers themselves after three or six months or more of training; yes—ask the men back from the trenches, and see their smile of compassion for the raw recruit; hear the story of the hard daily drills which were needed to make them ready to meet a cruel foe and his fiendish inventions.

And shall we, then, soldiers of Christ, escape the drill, the hard lessons of God's own training camp for us; our daily life, in whatever surroundings it has pleased Him to set us? Surely, we shall not, nor do we wish to, for, if we have learned anything, we know that our great Captain is All-Wise, and that, in His wisdom and love, He will give us the very training each of us needs, hard though it may be.

Let our prayer then be: Here I am, teach me to do Thy will, that I may serve and please Thee, for Thou art my God. And to those who give themselves unreservedly, unconditionally, to His service, seeking not theirs, but His own glory, wonderful opportunities will be granted. But first—and, oh! the wonder of it!—the strength and the grace to learn, to do, to bear, will be given to them. His precious Body and Blood will strengthen and inspire them, they will know the truth of His warning: "Without me ye can do nothing." Yet, they will answer, "I can do all things through Christ Who strengtheneth me." —Zoar.

Message of the War.

"What is being taught by the war? The crisis has revealed many faults in our character of which we were partly aware: our lack of preparation for an emergency, our amateurishness in dealing with great problems, our unwillingness to think things out; the culpable lightness with which we have taken our imperial responsibilities, our engrossment with material interests, our selfishness as classes and individuals, our extravagance and love of luxury and excessive indulgence in amusements; our inadequate support of Foreign Missions, the vagueness of our religion, and our dislike of spiritual effort."—A Message for the Supreme Moment, Bishop of London.

"Jesus knew man and men," asserted the Rev. A. L. Murray, rector of St. Paul's Church, Evansville, Ind., in a recent sermon. "His compassion was the result of His vision. He saw man and knew him, and knowing him was moved to action on behalf of men. The man who does not see deeply into life is not much moved by the little he sees in his fellows and is a slacker both in religion and in all humanitarian work."

Whitsunday: The Jews present one of the few instances in history of a whole people who deliberately undertook to understand their past experiences and to profit by them. They determined that they would not, if they could possibly avoid it, again fall into captivity for failing to observe the laws of their God. Hence, after the completion of the Temple and of the wall around the city, the leaders gave themselves most sedulously to the re-establishment of the law. "And all the people gathered themselves together as one man * * * and they spake unto Ezra to bring the book of the law of Moses, which Jehovah had commanded to Israel. * * * So they read in the book in the law of God distinctly and gave the sense and caused the people to understand." The effect was at once to change an occasion of great joy into one of mourning and weeping. They were one and all convicted of sin by God's Spirit working in their hearts through the written Word, the sword of the Spirit. But the leaders at once exhorted the people, "Mourn not nor weep; this day is holy unto the Lord. * * * The joy of the Lord is your strength." There are two reasons why this selection is appropriate to Whitsunday: one, because its message of Joy arising from true penitence and conviction of sin is the joy of the Spirit (Cf. John 16:8, 22); the other, because the law is the background of the New Covenant in the Spirit; as is brought out in the present Prayer Book lessons for Whitsunday (A. M.). For a corresponding New Testament lesson we have selected that chapter from St. John in which is given the complete union of the disciple with the Lord through the Holy Spirit and the Word of truth (John 15:7). For Old Testament Alternate is given the story of the first giving of the law in Exodus, which, better than the Duet, selection (of present Prayer Book) brings out, in connection with Hebrews 12, the contrast between law and Gospel, the Old Covenant and the New. The Old Testament evening lesson, from Ezekiel's vision of the restored temple, describes under figure of a river the work of the Holy Spirit in the Church, while the Alternate, from Habakkuk, points us to the true source of joy, despite all material failure and loss.

The morning week-day Old Testament lessons for this and several succeeding weeks call for a word of explanation. They undertake to give the Mosaic law as recorded in Exodus and Leviticus. For Lectionary purposes it is not necessary to take sides on the question whether the so-called "Mosaic" law was all given and in its completed form by Moses, or whether it was a development from Mosaic germs and completed by Ezra and others after the return from Exile. The fact in either case is, the law was not taken seriously until after the Return; and since we are giving the re-establishment of the Law in the Old Testament Historical-topical course, the New Lectionary gives also the laws which then began to be enforced. Topically, also, this is appropriate since it furnishes the proper Old Testament background of the Dispensation of the Spirit and also leads up to the Coming of the Christ in the Advent season as "the law which was a school master."

The lessons for next (Trinity) Sunday are, morning (1) Historical review, exhibiting the Triune God in action, leading up to the Covenant (suing Trinity as Octave of Pentecost); (2) Trinity in action. Evening (1) Trinity in Creation, (2) Trinity in the new Creation.

10. What was the general result of the Teaching of the Second Year of Ministry?

Note: Here we begin the fifth Lesson in the Teacher-Training Course. Christ's second Year of public Ministry was a Period of Organization; and His Ministry reached the height of its popularity. As this increased, the hatred of the Authorities grew. The great Lesson He taught was the spiritual nature of His Kingdom, which caused His rejection by the Jewish people, large numbers expressing their disappointment after their inability to make Him King. John 6:15.

The Greatest Gift: Man must go to God to get a right idea of life. He cannot get it from his own reason nor from the world's philosophy. Life is infinitely more than existence; it is existence with a moral quality. "In the Bible," says Dr. Griffith Thomas, "life always means union." Physical life is union of soul and body. Spiritual life is union of soul and God. And eternal life is union of soul and body with God forever. The great painter, George Frederick Watts, who was a Christian, had a true conception of life as expressed in his motto, "The utmost for the highest." Paul put it in this way: "For me to live is Christ." Life is, "the greatest thing in the world," the utmost that man can have; and Christ is "the highest." A life lived in this ideal begins in faith and is continued in faithfulness. This "utmost" of ours is committed to us moment by moment. We may well conceive of it as does a veteran Christian who recently wrote to a friend, "I live only one day at a time, and ask God to live it in me."—S. S. Times.

Two things this old world needs—tenderness and cheer. All about us are hearts hungry for sympathy, for kindness. Then everywhere are weary and discouraged ones, needing the uplift of hope to make them brave and strong enough to go forward to meet the future. We could do nothing better with our life than to consecrate it to a ministry of tenderness and encouragement. This is one of heaven's paths to happiness, for the merciful shall obtain mercy.—Rev. J. R. Miller, D. D.

The winds of earth blow far and free;
They gather up the silver showers;
To barren shore and dusty street
They bear the breath of fragrant flowers.

They sweep the shadows from the sun,
And send the happy sails to sea.
In all the spaces of the world
The winds of earth blow wondrously.

O Holy Spirit, wind of God,
So moving mid the souls of men,
Freshen and bless our weary lives
With showers of His grace again.

Stir mightily among thine own,
Blow down the sad world, free and wide,
And lift our hearts as flowers lift,
O holy wind of Whitsuntide!

For the Southern Churchman.
In the Prophet's Chamber.

When kind-hearted Robert Stone for the third time noticed the horseback rider pass his home, bearing steadily, if a little wearily, up the steep mountain trail, he called his wife's attention to it. Mrs. Stone only glanced out indifferently. A passer-by was indeed a rarity in Ranger's Gap, but so far none had roused her interest. People meant but little now to Emily Stone. With the death of her six-year-old son, a few months ago, she had withdrawn into a kind of emotionless despair; old interests touched her only remotely. When the family doctor decided that Mr. Stone's health needed a more bracing climate she welcomed, in a way, the chance to leave her former environment—the kindly sympathy of neighbors, the voices of children playing in the street. Here on this solitary hillside she could at least brood in peace over her sorrow. For her husband's sake she forced herself to a certain measure of cheerfulness, but further than that her effort would not go. Bearing her burden in hopeless apathy, she watched with unseeing eyes the winter mountains put on spring with unparalleled beauty of color and shade. Whatever she had known in former days of spiritual response to the comfort of religion and the beauty of nature she had laid away apparently without regret.

As summer went by Robert Stone continued to take note of the passing stranger. As regularly as the first Saturday of a month came around the young horseback rider came with it. He always turned his head as he passed the gate; once, seeing a face at the window, he smiled and bared his head. But he never rode to the door.

"Must be an itinerant preacher," Mr. Stone observed. He always watched the retreating figure a little wistfully.

It was a heavy August storm that at length brought about a nearer acquaintance. The horseman climbed the rise just as a sinister cloud rolled over the west mountain, muttering and threatening. "This will be an all-night storm," Mr. Stone said, weather-wise and grave. "We ought to ask the man in to shelter, Emily."

His wife's reluctance showed in her face, but she agreed at once. "There'll be nowhere for him to sleep except on the living-room lounge," she said. "But, of course, we must take him in."

Five minutes later, as the tempest broke in its fury, Paul Almy bent his tall head in the cottage door and made himself known to his hostess. From the first she liked the young fellow. He was grave in spite of his youth, yet boyish, too, for all his earnestness. Shrinking a little from the conversation, she found herself irresistibly drawn into it, after awhile. "He does not intrude," she thought. "He has no curiosity and no officiousness. I do not mind him as I thought I should."

He told them his own brief history in a few words. For the present chapter, it seemed, he lived in the Piedmont village ten miles below and journeyed once a month to the small church on Tower Top Mountain that marked the outermost fringe of his wide itinerary. "It takes bone and muscle," he acknowledged, when they counted up the sum total of his long routes. "But it's a great life," he amended, laughing.

Before the next fortnight had passed Emily Stone flung open the windows of a little unused room that had been built against the remainder of the house apparently as an after thought. "He might be driven in again," she said to herself, "and this room is merely gathering dust." All day she worked at her task, absorbed. The setting sun flooded through a crystal-clear window framed in crisp curtains and lay goldenly across the cool matting which covered a neatly scrubbed floor. A bowl of summer flowers made a splash of color on the mantel; the table by the white bed bore books and a candle. When Mr. Stone looked in, astonished, his wife turned a flushed face to meet him. "It's not a company room," she explained, hesitating in her reticence. "But if the young minister needs to come in again he can sleep here."

Two weeks later, when another storm drove him in for shelter, Paul Almy, directed to the little side room, stopped short on the shallow threshold with a quick word of pleasure. "For me whenever I come!" he echoed. His dark eyes took in all the pleasant details eagerly, then he turned to Mrs. Stone with an illuminating smile. "I may say reverently," he told her, "that I feel like the Prophet Elisha of old!"

Thereafter it went without saying that twice a month the journeying preacher should turn in at the white gate in Ranger's Gap and spend the night in the prophet's chamber, as they came to call it. More and more the lonely pair learned to watch for his visits. Emily Stone did not come very far out of her shell of reserve, but to some small degree her coldness warmed. They never named their trouble to the minister, not even remotely, but Paul Almy, by the sympathetic intuition that was his peculiar gift, was made aware of a throbbing scar somewhere. He bided his time. "Perhaps some day I shall be able to help," he promised himself.

One August evening he imparted a big piece of news as they sat on the porch in the cool mountain twilight.

"What do you think?" he said, "I am an adopted father!"

There was a small waif, it seemed, in Bellville, motherless since infancy, and abandoned lately by a ne'er-do-well father. The county authorities had placed the child with a family already plentifully supplied with children—the only household that would consent to take him. It was that or the poor farm.

"They mean well," Paul Almy finished with a sigh, "but old man Gregg drinks at times; and the older Gregg boys bully the little fellow." He did not notice the silence of his companions. "I've taken him under my inefficient wing," he added, laughing. "He seems like mine already—a fair-haired chap, aged six. They call him Robbie."

Again he missed the chill silence that received his talk. The subject was near to his heart, and he went on joyously recounting the sayings of small Robbie. It was not long before Mrs. Stone rose abruptly and went into the house.

On the next "first Sunday" the roane horse carried two passengers. The cottage was empty for the moment, but the minister tumbled his charge joyfully into the middle of the white bed in his own room. "Your little bones must be sore," he said. "Stay there till I put up my horse."

A short while afterwards Mrs. Stone, coming suddenly to the door of the small chamber drew back with a quick breath. The child's smiling look of welcome from eyes as blue as corn-flowers made her turn blindly. When she met the minister she tried hard to hide her pain. Yes, he was a dear child, she agreed; and surely room could be found for him—there was a little cot somewhere. But before the evening was over, before the boy's happy chatter had quieted in sleep, it became too evident to Mr. Almy that something was wrong. He guessed, at length, what it must be, and he inwardly upbraided himself for having brought heartache upon his good friends.

The next morning Emily Stone turned from the window where she had been watching a small form darting from flower to flower. "I cannot endure it," she said to her husband. "You must tell him. As a clergyman he will understand. Oh, Robert, I do not want to be selfish—but they are so alike. The same eyes, the same name! Ask him not to bring the child again."

Even in his pain Robert Stone marked with gladness the note of reluctance in her cry. It made his task easier when he went out to the troubled young preacher. "She seems unable to overcome the feeling," he said, sorrowfully. "People take these things differently, I suppose. For my own part—"

He did not go on, and Paul Almy gave his hand a warm clasp. "I understand altogether," he said. "Tell her so. And remember, it will not always be like this."

Emily Stone watched the two as they rode away, the tall, straight form and the little clinging one. "There were one or two toys here," she found herself saying, dry-eyed. "He never saw a toy, I suppose, and I might have brought myself to do that much." She realized with a pang of apprehension that already the little boy had made a strong appeal to her heart.

Thereafter it was tacitly understood that on occasions when Mr. Almy found it best to bring the child up the mountain with him, the pair should press on to the Tower Top neighborhood. When the minister was alone he always turned in at the Stone place. They did not speak of Robbie, though Emily Stone found herself, sometimes, choking back an eager inquiry. Mr. Almy knew now, from broken talks with the father, of the other Robbie, and his heart bled for the dumb, unhappy mother, shielding her grief behind a wall of cold reserve; but he did not try in any way to break down her barriers. Young as he seemed, he was no stranger to sorrow. He knew the many winding ways of pain, and bided his time.

After a tranquil autumn, winter set in early with sharp cold and northerly storms. On the first Saturday in December a bitter morning clouded blackly at noon, and by three o'clock swift, fine snow set in, driven before the wind. Mr. Stone had been called away to the city, not to return until later in the day. In the shelter of the cozy cottage Mrs. Stone busied herself with preparations for an early supper. "He will be chilled through," she said to herself. "And the minister will be even hungrier than usual when he gets here."

Engrossed with her work, she neglected to watch the trail; when she did turn to the window the violence of the storm startled her. Gray curtains of snow were sweeping down from the mountain and up from the valley—the wind seemed setting from everywhere at once. She glanced at the clock. Not time for her husband yet, but the minister should have come an hour ago. When a mountain team came toiling up the slope she wrapped herself in a heavy shawl and intercepted it at the gate. "Have you seen Mr. Almy?" she asked, her voice high-pitched against the wind.

The driver cupped one red ear with a mittened hand. "Preacher Almy?" he shouted back. "Passed me a mile below; must be well on to Tower Top by this."

Mrs. Stone turned away with a pang of disappointment. Somehow she had particularly counted today on the young minister's coming. The return of winter, the nearing of the precious Christmas season, had brought back more vividly than ever the sense of her little son. She started back to the cottage in a kind of bitter dismay.

The teamster was shouting again. "Had the kid with him, too," he called. "Bad weather for such a baby to be out in, I say, but then I reckon old man Gregg was the worse off for his week's salary. Mr. Almy, he don't take no chances." His message trailed off with the wind.

Emily Stone stumbled back to the house with a storm raging within her breast as well as without. That frail, thin little child out in this tempest! "Why should he do such a thing?" she demanded aloud, indignantly. But even as she spoke she knew why; the driver's words came back to her. No, Mr. Almy wouldn't take any chances. Neither would he break faith, if he could help himself, by bringing Robbie again to her home. She bowed her head, but not for the smiting wind.

A few moments later she was struggling up the mountain trail by a short cut. It might be possible, she calculated, to reach a certain bend in the road before the riders made it. But the way was very difficult; over and over again she almost gave out. Her feet were numb, her strength nearly exhausted. At last, stopping to peer about her, she gave a cry of despair. In some way she had wandered down and back into the main road again.

A figure loomed up beside her in the dimness. "Mrs. Stone!" said the minister's voice. He dismounted quickly and made her take his place. "There," he said, encouragingly. "Sit tight, and hold the boy close—he's pretty stiff with the cold."

Little was said as they moved down the return trail. Once Mr. Almy reached up and felt Robbie's hands. "I never dreamed of such a storm when I started," he confessed. "We were coming back to you, Mrs. Stone. We thought of the prophet's chamber and it seemed almost like heaven." He laughed happily in the gloom. Not without serious misgiving had he turned back, but the sight of the buffeted figure in the road, the knowledge of what brought her there, had set heart to singing. He whistled an old tranquil hymn as he plunged through the piling drifts.

Mrs. Stone sat silent with her arms about the boy. She could feel the meagre little body warming in her embrace, the small heart beating under her hand. Once she leaned down. "All right, Robbie?" she asked. Where was the old pang? It seemed only natural and sweet to be holding a child again, to be solicitous for his little welfare.

"All right," the small voice croaked, satisfied.

But it was not all right; the thin frame had been too thoroughly chilled. When Mr. Stone, meeting them anxiously at the gate, lifted him down, he was shaking with a chill. That night he was full of fever; all the next day he grew worse. The doctor who struggled through the drifts to see him looked grave. The child must have been far from well for some time before, his verdict ran; exposure had precipitated the trouble.

Near midnight of the second night, when Mr. Stone had fallen asleep, wearied, in his own room, the other two kept watch by the bed in the little chamber. The child's breathing was hard to hear.

"If he dies," Emily Stone said, flinching, "it will be more than I can bear." Then she put out a deprecating hand. "You are going to say something about prayer," she whispered. "Don't say it. Did I not pray for my own child? Ah, how I prayed!"

The minister did not speak. In the dim light his young face was intent.

"Yet I knew all the time that my prayers would not avail," she said. "Why should I pray now?"

Paul Almy's eyes met her own steadily. "You should not," he said, quietly. "Not in that way, surely." His look traveled to the white bed. "Not in that way for this little boy," he said.

Suddenly the long withheld tears came for Emily Stone. After awhile—"I have lived longer than you," she cried, brokenly. "But you are a man of God. Say what you have to say to me."

Patiently, and with a silent call for guidance, the young minister set himself to his task. While he talked on the clock ticked through the solemn latter-night hours and a long wind murmured over behind the mountains. Slowly, yet very clearly, as the hours went by, Emily Stone came to see herself and her fault—grew to understand wherein she had made an utter failure of her grief.

"For," said the minister, gently, "there is a strange dignity in being called upon to bear a sorrow like yours. God must have seen in you wonderful possibilities to have elected you to such affliction. This thing is a mystery, but it is true."

The boy's fever broke with the breaking of day. Paul Almy, feeling the damp drops on the little drawn forehead, turned swiftly to his companion. The crystal light of a winter dawn filled the prophet's chamber. "The child has been given back to us," he said.

Emily Stone lifted a new look toward the brightening mountains. "Two have been given back to me," she said.

In the Twilight.

To H. S. G.

A. B. J.

As you sit alone in the twilight,
With tears of regret in your eyes,
And think of the days departed,
And your mother in Paradise;
Your heart is filled with longing
To hear her play once more
The dear old tunes she used to love
In the happy days of yore.

You think of the pain you gave her,
Not liking the song of her choice,
And your heart is well-nigh breaking
For the sound of that mother's voice.
But, dear one, alone in the twilight,
Your mother's not far away;
She knows the thoughts you are thinking,
Your longing to hear her play.

Now you may not behold her,
Though her spirit be hovering near,
But some day all will be different—
Your vision will be more clear.
Yes, this is only the twilight,
Then comes a glorious day.
When again on a harp of heaven—
You will hear your mother play.

Don't Can the Can.

Economy seems to have become the slogan of the American people, and with our many "less" days and other Hooveristic plans regarding food and fuel we have already accomplished great things. But if we would be consistent in our economy program, then "Can the waste" should be supplemented by this corollary, "Why waste the can?"

For reasons associated with the great war, tin and glass products have advanced in price in proportion with all other things. Yet the back yards and garbage cans of all America are filled with bottles, glasses, jars and tin cans that are as good as the day they were made and could be used as containers for the various products a hundred times as well as once.

There are thousands of products put up in tin and glass in such a way that the contents can be removed without damaging the receptacle at all.

The writer finds an obstacle in his economy brain path every time he looks into his garbage barrel, which gets from five to fifteen of these undamaged containers every week. Breakfast food cans, syrup pails, chipped-beef glasses, olive bottles, lard pails, coffee cans and a thousand others must be consigned to the rubbish dumps because America has not learned to save.

It seems that all this unnecessary waste could be avoided by a very simple arrangement. Dealers in potatoes, stock feed and other coarse products give a rebate of five cents on every undamaged bag returned to them. Why isn't it possible for our manufacturers to have their pails, cans, bottles and glasses returned through their retailer by a rebate or premium system? A great many concerns give premiums for coupons; surely it would be greater economy to give premium for cans, and incidentally the American back yard would be a better-looking place.—The Outlook.

The Story of the Corn.

N. B. T.

First, a lot of yellow grain
Falling in the furrows,
Covered deep, warm and safe,
Snuggling in its burrows;

Later, little shoots of green
Pushing through the brown,
Raindrops spraying on their heads,
Sunshine scattering down;

Then a slender band and slim,
Straight stalks gently growing;
Here an ear and there an ear,
Tall and tasseled showing;

Turning slow from green to gold;
Then, some frosty morn,
Busy as a bee I work,
Counting out the corn!

A Silent Witness.

"Mother, why are you hanging a looking glass there?" asked James, looking at it curiously. "Such a pretty one, too," he continued. "It seems to me I should want it where it would be seen oftener."

"I want it right here in the dining-room, where it can see," answered his mother laughingly. "I am putting it here for a witness."

"A witness!" scoffed James. "It can't tell anything."

"We shall see. It will tell your faults to you as well as to others."

"I'd like to know how."

At supper James found that he and his brother Ned were to sit side by side, facing the glass.

"What's that for?" demanded both at once.

"Your father and I think best to have it so," explained their mother.

The boys sat down with scowls on their faces and an air of great injury. Ned happened to raise his eyes, when the ludicrousness of those frowning reflections struck him so forcibly that it provoked a shout of laughter.

"What is the matter with you?" growled James, looking up to make an ugly face, when his attention also was arrested by the truthful mirror. His startled stare added so much to Ned's glee that he began to thrust out his tongue at James. The silent reminder brought him to a sudden stop.

"I see you are caught also," remarked his father quietly.

The boys were silent. The day following their experiences were repeated with such good results that their mother was beginning to congratulate herself on the success of her plan. In her absence from home for several weeks, while attending her mother in a serious illness, the boys had acquired the habit of bickering at the table, greatly to the humiliation of their parents.

Their silent witness had been with them two days when their cousin, a bright, manly little fellow, came to visit them.

At dinner Mrs. Lane said, "William, you may sit between James and Ned, where you can all enjoy yourselves."

But, oh, how two boys reddened as the mirror showed them how beautifully William's hair was combed and how their own tousled locks looked in comparison! Their mother had remained discreetly silent and allowed them to see for themselves.

Ned spoke first. "Mother, will you excuse me a minute?"

"Certainly," agreed his mother.

"And me, too?" questioned James.

They returned with shining faces and well-brushed hair, and smiled at each other over the changed reflection. If William noticed, he was too much of a gentleman to say anything; but three pairs of eyes returned often to the pleasing picture.

"It is nice, isn't it?" said Mr. Lane.

"What?" asked the three at once.

"Three good-looking boys in a row."

"Oh," answered William, "I believe auntie had a reason for putting the glass there."

After William's visit was over and he had returned home, James came to his mother. "Mother," he said, "your witness is all right. I couldn't understand before; but I do now, and I vote that we keep it there."

"Vote carried by a big majority," shouted Ned.

"Very well," promised mother; "it shall stay with you as long as you want it—a silent witness, but a good friend."—Baptist Boys and Girls.

A House On Legs.

Traveling menageries sometimes have trouble in stabling their animals, particularly elephants and camels. One manager tells of his troubles with an elephant of unusual size. He says:

"We looked all around for a place in which to put Jinny, and finally squeezed her into a small corrugated iron shed that had a door in the middle and a window at each end. We drove an iron rod into the ground and staked her down."

"In the night, however, Jinny became restless, pulled the stake out of the ground as if it had been a pin, and raised herself to her full height. The shed was so small and narrow that when she rose she filled the entire structure and lifted it some inches off the ground. Her next proceeding was to put her trunk through the front window and by some accident her tail got out of the other. Then Jinny, incased in an iron shed, with her feet, trunk and tail protruding, started rambling around the farm premises."

"At last she came to a shed where the milk was stored. Bursting it open, she rolled a can of milk out into the yard and, taking off the top, helped herself. The farmer, awakened by the disturbance, put his head out of the window to see what the trouble was. Seeing Jinny filling herself at his expense, he remonstrated; but Jinny's only answer was to raise her trunk and deluge him. Making for the gate, she wrenched it from its hinges and staggered down the road toward the town."

"A policeman, on seeing what he took to be a house moving along the road, turned on his heel and bolted to the police barracks. 'Sir,' he exclaimed excitedly to his chief, 'I'm just after seeing a real, live, walkin' house comin' down the road.'"

"Meanwhile, Jinny, still incased in the shed, made her way straight to the show and soon disturbed her master by battering on the door of the caravan. The next day the shed had to be cut off her back by a blacksmith, and there was a heavy bill for damages."—Herald and Presbyterian.

"I've Thought of Somebody."

I've thought of two persons—a little girl and a little boy. We are not told the girl's name, but we know that she was brought as a slave from her home country, to live in the house of a great warrior and wait on his wife. By her kindness of heart, her faith and her good memory she was able to be of great use to her master when he was in terrible trouble. A prophet and a river are connected with the story.

The little boy, whom the Scriptures afterward show us as a man, also lived far away from home, but his lot was better than that of the girl, for his home was with a kindly old man, and his mother came sometimes to see him. One night, when everybody was asleep, the little lad had a wonderful experience. He heard a mysterious voice calling his name, and after he had answered three times the voice gave him an important message to deliver.

Who was the little girl's master, and what did she do for him? Who was the boy?

Answer to last week's question: Joseph.

The Still Small Voice.

Anne Madison.

"What does it mean by the 'still, small voice,' Aunt Ellen?" Linda asked. "That's the first question I have for you. Once or twice already in this story I've come across the words, 'a still, small voice.'"

Linda was having her weekly treat, a Saturday afternoon talk with her favorite aunt, who came home at the end of each week to stay until Monday. The little girl always saved up questions for Aunt Ellen.

"Why, don't you know?" her aunt replied.

"I know it means conscience," Linda said. "But I'm not very sure that it's as plain to me as it ought to be. Tell me in one of your little parables, Aunt Ellen. They always explain so well."

At this moment there was the sound of scuffling steps on the porch; then the door knob rattled impatiently. "Linda, Linda!" called a voice, "Open door!"

Linda gave a little groan. "That's Margie," she said. "She never fails to tag after me, wherever I go. O, Aunt Ellen, must I let her in?"

Miss Gray hesitated. She knew that little Margie bothered her sister a good deal, and she knew also that Linda was usually kind. "Do as you wish, dear," she said.

Linda looked undecided; then she opened her book again. The rattling continued. "Oh, well," she said. "I'll let her in. Maybe for once she'll keep quiet."

But it seemed that Margie had other plans. When her sister turned the knob the door pushed slowly open to admit a yellow head and a pink face. "I only want," said a sweet voice, coaxingly. "I only want your littlest doll to play with. Your littlest doll."

Linda turned to her aunt in despair. "Now, just listen to that," she exclaimed. "Did you ever see such a child? With all her toys she can't be happy unless she has mine."

Margie's lip trembled slightly. "Mine

"don't shut their eyes," she murmured. Linda did not relent. "O, Auntie," she said. "Neither does my 'littlest doll,' as she calls it. Margie just wants whatever she hasn't got, that's all. It's not much of a doll—she couldn't hurt it. But if I once begin— No, Margie," she ended, decidedly. "Go and play with your own things. You mustn't be always asking for other people's, you know."

She sat down again and found her place, trying not to notice the sound of loud sobs on the porch. "What were we talking about?" she asked. "O, the 'still, small voice.' Elijah heard it, 'way back in Bible times, Aunt Ellen, but these days—"

"These days we hear it, too," her aunt said, gently. "You have heard it twice since we came into the room, Linda, dear."

The little girl glanced up in surprise. "I?" she said, uncertainly.

"What made you decide to let Margie in a little while ago? You didn't want her to come, you know."

Linda pondered. "Oh," she said, "I remember, now. I thought about how little she was, Aunt Ellen, and how hard it is for her to understand that she mustn't tag after me."

Aunt Ellen smiled. "And you gave a loving answer to the still, small voice that time," she said.

"What was the other time?" Ellen wanted to know. Then she flushed suddenly. "About the doll? But I—I didn't let her have it, you know."

"Was the voice altogether silent, though?" her aunt asked. "Think, dearie."

Linda raised her truthful eyes. "No, I remember, now. I didn't hear anything with my real ears, you know—maybe it was too still and too small—but I had to swallow something back before I said 'No' straight out like that."

She was thoughtful for a long time, her eyes fixed soberly on the open book. "Things are easier to understand when they happen to you, aren't they?" she said at last. "I'm going now for the 'littlest doll.'"

"I'll be right here when you come back," Aunt Ellen promised.

The Other Side of Supper.

"I feel so new!" sighed Betty Bigelow, as she looked over the cozily furnished cottage where the Bigelows had lately come to live. "Moving is a pleasant novelty," she added, "but after everything is done and the china cupboard has been arranged a dozen times and the sofa pillows have been punched into their coziest shapes, why, there comes a time that's empty and new. I suppose it's the space that was filled by old friends and neighbors. We don't know a soul in Upton," she added drearily.

"Now don't put on your thinking cap," laughed Betty's sister Anne. "I tossed mine into a corner hours ago, for it began to come over me, too, the newness."

"I'm not really complaining," Betty explained. "Of course, in the bottom of my heart I'm delighted that Daddy got a good position here, and as he has only you and me to look after him I'm glad we can be together. That's the way I feel in the bottom of my heart; but it's the top of my heart that's lonely and wants friends and occupation."

Anne did not answer at once; instead she parted the dainty curtains and looked out of the window, then she turned a smiling face toward Betty.

"Neighbors to right of us, neighbors to left of us," she said gaily. "I'm sure we're going to like them."

"That isn't the point," Betty answered, "the point is, will they like us and how soon?"

"Well," said Anne, "since custom forbids our taking the first steps toward friendliness, let us take steps toward something else; supper, for instance."

"What's the use getting more than a bite? Daddy is going to eat downtown because he can't get home until late."

"All the same," Anne said firmly. "I'm going to get a company supper and make the tastiest things I know, and you are going to make some of your delicious scones."

"Why should we have a company supper when there isn't going to be any company?" asked Betty.

"Use your imagination," Anne said briskly. "If you don't I shall think it got lost in the moving."

Arrayed in crisp gingham pinafores the girls worked briskly for an hour. A smile lifted the corners of Betty's mouth. She talked and laughed and sang. None knew better than wise little Anne that Betty was a born cook and that steaming kettles and bright spoons and beaters cheered her.

At last the dainty meal was prepared; but the supper hour had not quite arrived.

"I'll lay the table," said Anne, "while you put the food in the warming oven to wait until we are quite ready." And then instead of laying two places mischievous Anne laid four. "I can make mock conversation with imaginary people," she thought, "and keep Betty from thinking."

When the last fork and spoon were laid in place Anne was startled by a strange sound that broke the stillness of the late afternoon. "The fire bell!" Anne gasped.

Betty came hurrying from the kitchen. "Let's go," she cried.

Already people were hurrying past the house.

"It must be down the street," said Anne as she banged the front door. "If we hurry we may be in time to see a little smoke."

But they were not. The alarm proved to be a false one and the hurrying crowds trooped merrily home to supper. Betty and Anne had not far to go. They hurried up the walk and Betty put her hand on the door knob. It turned, but the door refused to open.

"Perhaps it's stuck; let me try," Anne offered. She threw her whole weight against the door, but it would not yield.

"Oh!" Betty said at last, "I remember now, it's one of those doors that won't open from the outside after it shuts. It's self-locking, I mean."

Anne faced about. "If you are sure this door is locked, I'm quite sure every other door in the house is, and all the windows are screened hard and fast."

"There's the chimney," giggled Betty. "I want my supper," she added, sobering.

"Don't speak of supper," said Anne.

The girls were both ravenously hungry by this time, and the thought of the tempting supper just out of reach was aggravating.

"I'm going to try all the windows. Perhaps there's a loose screen," said Betty.

All round the house they pushed and thumped hopefully, but nothing yielded.

"I'm afraid we'll have to sit on the porch and wait for Daddy," Anne said at last. He has a key. I almost wish I'd been educated as a burglar and a house-breaker," she added.

"Perhaps I can help."

It was a new voice and both girls turned quickly. They saw two girls standing arm in arm.

"I am Janet Moore," said the one who had spoken, "and this is my friend, Nan Decker. I am your right hand neighbor and Nan is your left. We're both nineteen years old and we play and work together all the time and—"

"There, Janet," said Nan, "it's my turn now. Your information is perfectly true, but it isn't quite what we came to say. We noticed, we couldn't help noticing, you know, that you're having a bad time getting into your house."

"I'm Betty Bigelow," said Betty, "and this is my sister Anne. We're awfully glad you came, we've been so lonely."

"We'd have come sooner," said Janet, "but we were not sure you were settled. However, when we saw you were locked out we didn't stand on ceremony."

"A neighbor in need is a neighbor indeed," Anne began. Then she laughed. "Perhaps you know more about house-breaking than we do," she said. "Now confess."

"Well," said Janet, "perhaps I do know more about this particular house than you do, for you see I have lived next to it all my life. The cellar door, used to have a broken catch," she explained. "I know because I had a friend who lived here and once she was locked out."

"We never thought of the cellar door," said Anne, and off she darted. "You're right," she cried. In another moment she called, "Welcome to our portals," as she swung the door open.

They all trooped in and up the dusky cellar stairs. The cellar steps led into the kitchen. Betty opened the door. Odors blended and delicious were in the air.

Janet sniffed, "I forgot about it's being supper time," she said.

"Do stay!" cried Anne. "We can't let you go when we've just come to know you."

Nan demurred. "But you're hungry," she said.

"And we hope you are," said Betty, "for you must stay and share our supper." Then very gaily she told the story of the company feast.

"Of course we'll stay," laughed Janet, "if you want us so much. To be honest, Nan and I have longed for more championship this year, and it's so pleasant to know new people, especially when one gets acquainted in an unusual way. I like your idea of getting supper for imaginary guests. I like people who make pleasant plans and carry them out even when they may seem to be just nonsense."

It took only a moment to place the dainty supper on the table. In a moment more the girls were seated; Betty poured the chocolate while Anne passed the scones.

"It seems just like home, now that we have company," Betty said happily.

Nan and Janet smiled. "I hope it's going to seem like home always," Nan said. "I'm sure it ought to when you and Anne are such good home-makers."

"It's really all Anne," Betty said truthfully. "I'm apt to get blue and discouraged and not see the worth whiteness of things. If it hadn't been for Anne you would have told us about the cellar door, of course, and helped us to get into the house, but there wouldn't have been any supper to ask you to, and we shouldn't have been really acquainted. After eating supper together, of course, we have to be friends. The very next time I am blue I am going to try Anne's way and do something cheerful even if I don't feel one bit like it."

"I'm sure you'll not be the only one to try Anne's way," Nan said impulsively. "Janet and I have been lonely and I'm afraid it was because we lacked

MRS. GEORGE A. BARKSDALE.

On Easter Eve Mrs. George A. Barksdale entered into rest. She was the daughter of the late Rev. Pike Powers, beloved rector of St. Andrew's Church, Richmond, Va., for so many years. Mrs. Barksdale was a faithful and zealous worker in the Church she loved so well, a woman of rare intellectual attainments and executive ability. She founded the Summer Rest, a vacation home for self-supporting women. Three years ago she transferred this valuable property to the Episcopal Church. This work will stand as a memorial to her and her husband, George A. Barksdale, for all time, both of whom sacrificed time and labor to make it what it is. She has gone over into the land where there is no work and will receive the reward she merited so well. "Well done, good and faithful servant."

The Summer Rest will be kept open to give the tired worker its golden opportunity of rest, as in former years. Remember it with your loyal support.

RESOLUTIONS OF THE WOMAN'S AUXILIARY OF THE LEE MEMORIAL CHURCH ON THE DEATH OF MISS MARY NELSON PENDLETON.

On the nineteenth of March, 1918, our beloved President, Miss Mary Nelson Pendleton, was called to her heavenly rest. Her life of over three-score years and ten was one of great mental activity, and during her long residence in Lexington she had been identified more prominently with all that tended to the improvement of the community both from a moral and civic standpoint.

As President of the Woman's Auxiliary, her energy and sound judgment could at all times be relied on, and shall mourn her loss and cherish her memory. Deeply imbued with religious conviction, her faith shone steadfast to the last, and those who loved her can feel that this transition means only happiness for her—and that her greeting on the other side has been, "Well done, thou good and faithful servant; enter thou into the joy of thy Lord."

Mountain School Farm: "Wentworth" School Farm, Corbin, Ky., still needs $5,000 to secure full possession of the 311-acre farm. Eight thousand dollars has already been contributed. Will you help us? Address Bishop L. W. Burton, Lexington, Ky., or Archdeacon Wentworth, Winchester, Ky.

Cowardice we call the most contemptible of vices. It is the one whose imputation we most indignantly resent. To be called a coward would make the blood boil in the veins of any of us. But the vice is wonderfully common. Nay, we often find ourselves wondering whether it is not universal, whether we are not all cowards somewhere in our nature. Physical cowardice all of us do not have. Indeed, physical cowardice is rarer than we think. . . . But moral courage is another thing. To dare to do just what we know we ought to do, without being in the least hindered or distorted by the presence of men who we know will either hate or despise or ridicule us for what we are doing, that is rare indeed. Men think they have it till their test comes. Why, there is in this community to-day an amount of right conviction which, if it were set free into right action by complete release from moral cowardice, would be felt through the land.—Phillips Brooks.

Whitsunday.

It is not exaggeration to say that the teaching of Whitsunday is the teaching least understood by the average Churchman—that the article "I believe in the Holy Ghost" is the article least intelligently confessed by the majority of the congregation.

Of God as the Source and Creator of the universe, "God the Father Almighty, Maker of Heaven and Earth," we have, if not a picture, at least a scientific deduction. We cannot imagine a face or form, but we are sure of a Personality, of a Power who thinks and plans and executes, of an intelligent Cause for all creation.

Of God, as revealed in Jesus Christ, we have, or can have, large and clear vision. God incarnate comes into our world of sense, and our senses lay hold upon Him.

But of God as Holy Ghost, our perception is very blurred and hesitating. Why is this?

Well, it is because we expect or ask for such a knowledge of the Holy Ghost as is impossible to our faculties. We ask for sight of the Invisible, for intellectual comprehension of what can be only spiritually discerned.

Our painters and sculptors can present to us pictures and statues of the Son of God, because in their minds and ours there is a definite imagining of Him—imperfect, doubtless, not adequate to His glory, but yet something we can recognize. But the Holy Ghost can be represented only by symbols; there can be no portrait drawn of a spirit.

What do we mean by a spirit? Mr.

TRANSPARENT OVEN DISHES

Masterman's answer is about as satisfactory a one as can be given—"Spirit may be defined as the permanent reality behind phenomena that manifests itself in the world as thought and will—design and control." Thus, in the phenomenon of a human body, visible and audible and tangible, walking about and handling other matter and producing new results, we understand that we are beholding the manifestation of human spirit. And we learn somewhat about the character of that spirit from the appearance and performance of that body.

So, in the phenomena of all the universe that comes within our ken, we may understand the presence of the Divine Spirit working out divine purposes.

Thus in the Nicene Creed we say of the Holy Ghost that He is "the Lord and Giver of life." That is, in all the life around us, vegetable, animal, intellectual, spiritual, we infer the operation of a purposeful God.

In verity, all the beauty of the flowers and birds and beasts, and all the goodness of men and women, all the symmetry of nature and all the glory of art, and all the virtue of humanity, are revelations of the Holy Ghost.

But, it will be said, what about ugliness and decay, serpents and poisonous plants, human vices and cruelties?

Is the Lord of life shown in them? Certainly not. We have to allow that in the present stage of the universe death and dissolution are working, as well as birth and life; ignorance and sin are working, as well as knowledge and goodness.

As to the seeming monstrosities and foulnesses of vegetable or animal existence, we need not be disturbed. We may find in them what can be styled the grotesques and gargoyles of nature's cathedral, having a fitness for their place, as certain discords have in music.

Human sin is quite another thing. Of that we must say that it is not from nor by the Holy Ghost; that it is often rebellion against His purpose; that it is death attacking life. We may speculate, with more or less success, as to why this should be permitted. But the facts are not destroyed or changed by our speculations. Right is right, and good is good, and beauty is beauty, and love is love—and we all know it. And right and good and beauty and love all testify to the presence of the Holy Ghost.

So, as the beginning of our meditation on Whitsunday, we should make our own those noble words of Masterman's, "I believe in the Holy Spirit. I believe that will and intelligence and love are the supreme realities; that force and matter, if indeed they have any existence apart from spirit, are instruments by means of which spirit expresses itself. They are the letters in which the Spirit writes his messages for spirits to read; they are the organ pipe through which the Spirit breathes making music for spirits to hear."—The Palm Branch.

So long as sin is regarded from a merely social point of view, the Cross of Christ must appear to be an exaggeration. Why do with blood a work which could be done as well with water? Why sacrifice a man when the blood of a bullock would answer every purpose? But the moment that sin is seen under the illumination of infinite holiness, the Cross of Christ alone is equal to the tragic awe and appalling horror of the situation. The first clear view which any man gets of the sinfulness of sin, marks the crisis of his life. From that time he elects his destiny.—T. Parker.

Armenian Courage: An American missionary in Persia has been deeply impressed by the courage and recuperative power of the Armenian people. He says:

"No massacre or human cruelty has been able to crush the spirit of many who have suffered so terribly. They are wonderfully brave and patient in their sufferings. I have heard many say: 'Never mind what has gone, what we have suffered, if only such things are made impossible for our children in the future.'

"I was riding by a ruined Armenian village one day when my Turkish guard stopped and began to curse. 'Look at that,' he said. 'Three years ago we completely destroyed that village and thought we had exterminated its inhabitants. Here they are back again, rebuilding their homes, plowing their fields and gradually accumulating cattle and flocks. They can't be destroyed.' I told him the reason was that they were God's people."—Men and Missions.

It is true that many find "sermons in stones," but they don't want stones in sermons.—Ex.

YOU CAN TELL THE PEOPLE WHO HAVE IRON IN THEIR BLOOD STRONG, HEALTHY, VIGOROUS FOLKS

City Physician Says Ordinary Nuxated Iron Will Increase the Strength of Nervous, Run-down People in Two Weeks' Time in Many Cases.

ONE glance is enough to tell which people have iron in their blood. They are the ones that do and dare. The others are in the weakling class. Sleepless nights spent worrying over supposed ailments, constant dosing with habit-forming drugs and narcotics and useless attempts to brace up with strong coffee or other stimulants are what keep them suffering and vainly longing to be strong. Their real trouble is lack of iron in the blood. Without iron the blood has no power to change food into living tissue and therefore, nothing you eat does you good; you don't get the strength out of it. When iron is supplied it enriches the impoverished blood and gives the body greater resistance to ward off disease. Numbers of nervous, run-down people who were alling all the while, have most astonishingly increased their strength and endurance simply by taking iron in the proper form.

And this, after they had in some cases been going on for months without getting benefit from anything.

If you are not strong or well you owe it to yourself to make the following test: See how long you can work or how far you can walk without becoming tired. Next take two five-grain tablets of Nuxated Iron three times per day after meals for two weeks. Then test your strength again and see for yourself how much you have gained. There is nothing like good old iron to help put color in your cheeks and sound, healthy flesh on your bones. But you must take iron in a form that can be easily absorbed and assimilated like Nuxated Iron if you want it to do you any good, otherwise it may prove worse than useless.

Manufacturer's Note: Nuxated Iron recommended above is one of the newer organic iron compounds. Unlike the older inorganic products, it is easily assimilated, does not injure the teeth, make them black, nor upset the stomach. The manufacturers guarantee successful and entirely satisfactory results to every purchaser or they will refund your money. It is dispensed by all good druggists.

YOU WILL WRITE A LETTER LIKE THIS

I wish that I knew which one of the thousands of letters I receive would have the most weight with you, my friend. I can't quote all of them here, but I am going to ask you to read these carefully and then give me a chance to renew your health and make you write me one very much like them:

701 Barnard Street,

Savannah, Ga., Dec. 28, 1910.

Mr. N. F. Shivar, Shelton, S. C. Dear Sir: As you are aware, in 1909 I was suffering with indigestion, stomach and liver disorders and all its train of horriying phenomena for several months. I had lived on milk, soft eggs, shredded wheat, a very insufficient diet for an active working man, and, of course, from disease and starvation was in a very low state of nervous vitality and general debility. I ordered ten gallons of your Mineral Water, which I used continuously, reordering when necessary, and in four months gained twenty-nine pounds, was strong and perfectly well and have worked practically every day since. It acts as a general renovator of the system. I prescribe it in my practice, and it has in every instance had the desired effects. It is essential to use this water in as large quantities as possible, for its properties are so happily blended and in such proportion that they will not disturb the most delicate system. It is purely Nature's remedy.

A. L. R. AVANT, M. D.

Leeds, S. C., March 2, 1911.

I have tested your Spring Water in several cases of rheumatism, chronic indigestion, kidney and bladder troubles, and in nervous and sick headaches, and find that it has acted nicely in each case, and I believe that if used continuously for a reasonable time will produce a permanent cure. It will purify the blood, relieve debility, stimulate the action of the liver, kidneys and bladder, aiding them in throwing off all poisonous matter.

C. A. CROSBY, M. D.

These are not selected cases nor are the results unusual. I receive thousands like them from physicians ministers lawyers, merchants, farmers, manufacturers and every conceivable profession. I want the satisfaction of receiving such a letter from you. No matter what your complaint may be. dyspepsia, indigestion, nervous headache, rheumatism, gall stones, kidney or liver disease, or any chronic ailment that has not responded to drugs. I invite you to match your faith in the Spring against my pocket-book. If the water fails to benefit you simply say so, return the empty demijohns and I will promptly and willing refund your money—every cent. Sign below:

Shivar Spring,
Box 64 B, Shelton, S. C.
Gentlemen:

I accept your guarantee offer and enclose herewith two dollars for ten gallons of Shivar Mineral Water. I agree to give it a fair trial, in accordance with instructions contained in booklet you will send, and if it fails to benefit my case you agree to refund the price in full upon receipt of the two empty demijohns, which I agree to return promptly.

Betty laughed. "Anne never likes to be praised," she said, "but we'll not forget what a frank one she is."

"Any prompting one has toward cheerfulness is usually safe to follow," said Anne smiling, "even if it is only a harmless prank. It usually brings new situations and this time it has brought something better." She paused; then added shyly: "This time I think it has brought friends."—Frances Kirkland in The Young Churchman.

A Hint to Teachers.

I wish, when summer's drawing near about the end of May, With bees and birds and other things, that teacher'd teach this way:

"Bound Pine Wood north and south and east, and all the way around; Tell where the sassafras bushes grow, and where wild flags are found:

"How far from Huckleberry Hill to Sandy-Bottom Creek?

How many cherries at a time can a boy hold in his cheek?

"Suppose three fish were in a pond, three fishers close at hand, Each fisher with a hook and line—how many would they land?

"What is the shortest cut to where the buttercups are yellow?

How many fortnights does it take to turn May apples mellow?

"Two pickers in a berry patch—when they had picked all day,

How many quarts, inside and out, would those two bear away?

"If twenty boys turned loose and ran from here in front of school, How many seconds would they take to reach the swimming pool?"

And then I wish the teacher'd say, "Well, if you can't remember, Go find the answers, right away, and tell me in September!"

Thoughts For the Thoughtful

The nearer we get to the Father's hand the less the rod hurts.

A poor man's all weighs as much with God as a rich man's millions.

Only in a world where there is suffering could God prove that He is love.—Ex.

A good place in which to exercise patience is in bearing the shortcomings of others.—Ex.

There is sometimes as much venom in the point of a pen as there is in the bite of a dog.

Those who make the Bible a lamp to their feet, will never have to spend much time in the dark.

It is all right for the dead to look dead, but those who profess to be alive in Christ ought to show it in their looks.

Every kindness done to others in our daily walk, every attempt to make others happy, every prejudice overcome, is a step nearer to the life of Christ.—A. P. Stanley.

Without God human life is a bitter irony, and the cry of humanity for help is answered by an echo that only mocks the aching heart. Christianity alone furnishes the ideal manhood.—A. D. Little.

The old man finds a meaning in Christ the young man never discerned. Age is greater than youth. The glory of youth is the promise that is in it; the glory of age is the performance it represents.—A. M. Fairbairn.

To-day I will not worry; I will not be afraid; I will not give way to anger; I will not yield to envy, jealousy, or hatred; I will be kind to every man, woman or child with whom I come in contact; I will be cheerful and helpful; I will trust in God and bravely face the future.

We do not die by chance or hazard; the time and circumstances of our death are appointed by Christ our Saviour; everything connected with our departure from this world is under His control. Those doors will not be unlocked until you are ready to pass through them. At the right moment He will turn the key of death, and you will have gone through the most terrible crisis of your history as an immortal being.—T. J. Choate.

"I turned an ancient poet's book,
And found upon the page:
'Stone walls do not a prison make,
Nor iron bars a cage.'

Yes, that is true and something more;
You'll find, where'er you roam,
That marble floors and gilded walls
Can never make a home.

But every house where Love abides
And Friendship is a guest,
Is surely home, and home, sweet home;
For there the heart can rest."

gard to his mother, expressible or inexpressible—not nearly as many as he will have later on. The faculties whose business it is to manufacture ideas are not yet fairly at work in him. But he knows his mother a great deal better than any psychological expert from the university knows her or can know her unless he gets into some other relation toward her than that of an expert. Thinking goes round and round and never gets there; love makes a cross cut and arrives.—C. H. Parkhurst.

Of all the golden gifts that there may be,

I would be bold, my Lord, to ask for this,

Be it in all my glory and my bliss,
To make my little world think well of Thee.

Be this the aim of every work and word;

The source and limit of my liberty:
Life's blessedness and best prosperity;
To make the world think well of Thee,
my Lord.

I cannot pay Thee for Thy love to me;
But since I am so greatly in Thy debt
I fain would give Thee all that I can get;

And live to make the world think well of Thee.

—M. G. Pears.

Victory's Humiliation: We say that it is humiliating to be defeated. And it is. It is humiliating to be reminded how weak, how helpless, we really are. But a Christian man who was praying with some friends the other day for victory in his own life received a surprise when one of them voiced this prayer, "O Lord, may every victory press us lower down at the foot of the cross." Not every defeat, but every victory! And that was a God-given prayer. For who wins our victories? Certainly not we. Man can no more win a victory over his sinful nature than he can win his way into heaven. He can, of course, by sheer will-power, prevent his sinful nature from expressing itself in this or that way; but that is not victory. That is only repression. Victory is having the power of his sinful nature "destroyed," or "done away," so that he is "free from the law of sin." And only Christ can do that for him. Every such victory, wholly supernatural and miraculous, should remind him with humiliation of his own utter impotence to accomplish it, and of the marvelous and superabounding love and grace of his Lord who has accomplished it. It is a humiliating thing to live the Victorious Life. May we live continually in this humiliation.—S. S. Times.

The Ministry of the Holy Spirit.

Positive and uncompromising will be the Ministry of the Holy Spirit to the world. Unavoidable and unmistakable will be the challenge of the Spirit. Not soft wooings nor sweet counsels of perfection will be its basis, but the hard and indisputable facts of Sin, Righteousness and Judgment. The Physician of Souls must make a diagnosis that will shock the patient into the desire for health. In some cases the surgeon's knife must come before the healing medicines. The health, not the feelings of the patient, must be the Physician's concern.

Today, more than ever, the world needs this ministry of the Spirit. The sense of Sin is well-nigh lost, the ideal of Righteousness is diluted, and the Judgment is vague. The causes for this are so plain that he who runs may read. Entire absorption in the routine of life, its necessities and pleasures, is the common one. The subtle influence of our thought-world, in which the sharpness of God's certainties has been lost in the haziness of our peradventures, is another cause. We forget that our raw attempts to relate and assimilate all that Science has taught us about God's world and work are after all only raw attempts. Our very life, indeed, demands that we make them. But we should beware lest in our hastiness we predicate finality of our explanations. Then there are causes operating in the moral world. Some men there are who have an interest in explaining the conscience as merely the developed social sense, the idea of God as only an evolution from man's sense of insufficiency, and judgment as the bogey of an immature mind that is caught in the meshes of its own personal conception of God.

Clear cut across this indefiniteness comes the declaration of the Gospel. Christ is the revelation and the utterance of the Eternal in Time. Things disclose their true values in relation to Him. Sin ultimately is opposition to Him. Righteousness finds its true exponent in Him. All that is unworthy meets its judgment in Him. Too much have these things been covered up in the preaching of today. They ought to stand out in bold relief. Not the religion of humanity, not the religion of erudition, but the religion of Christ is the basis of the Spirit's ministry. Christianity is Christ. Nothing else is adequate for the result Christianity demands. An absolute change of control, a complete shifting of the centre of gravitation in each life is the inner meaning of Christianity. God, and not self, it must be, and God is Love. Not for a peradventure will men reverse the motive of selfishness, which has been beating on the puses of humanity through the ages, but only at the challenge of God's certainties, God's eternals. Confronted by that challenge, the heart acknowledges Sin, Righteousness and Judgment.—Rev. W. T. Hallam in Canadian Churchman.

The one sure remedy for intemperance is personal total abstinence. Temperance would be a remedy for intemperance if it could be relied upon. But it cannot. All the intemperance there is begins as temperance. If no one used liquor temperately no one would use it intemperately. It is temperance which provides all the intemperance. But that abstinence produces no intemperance. It never can do so without wholly abandoning itself and becoming something diametrically opposite. Temperance, on the other hand, may glide imperceptibly into intemperance. It usually does so imperceptibly when it does so at all. No temperate drinker does set out to be a drunkard. He becomes so unintentionally. Let us make it plain: not every temperate drinker ends as a drunkard, but every drunkard begins as a temperate drinker. If one will totally abstain he will miss whatever trifling pleasure the temperate drinker enjoys, and he will miss the deadly peril to which the temperate drinker is exposed.—R. E. Speer.

Church Year Sermons for Children

By PHILLIPS E. OSGOOD

Contains fifty-six live talks on topics suited to the Church Year, as well as for special occasions. Arranged as sermons with texts, which can also be used as talks to children. The book is not only for the clergy, but is just as suitable to read to the children at home. Illustrations from sketches by the author.

"No better book of sermons to children has ever come to the notice of the present reviewer than this. In its imaginative understanding of the child's instinctive interests, in the remarkable skill with which its subjects are arranged to follow the beautiful lessons of the Church Year, and in the convenience of its typographical arrangement, the book is equally admirable. The illustrations, sketched by Mr. Osgood himself, are quite as fascinating as the text."—From a review in the Southern Churchman, written by W. Russell Bowie, D. D., author of THE CHILDREN'S YEAR.

Dear Lord and Father of Mankind,
Forgive our feverish ways!
Reclothe us in our rightful mind;
In purer lives Thy service find,
In deeper reverence praise.

In simple trust like theirs who heard
Beside the Syrian sea,
The gracious calling of the Lord,
Let us, like them, without a word
Rise up and follow Thee.

O Sabbath rest by Galilee!
O calm of hills above,
Where Jesus knelt to share with thee
The silence of eternity,
Interpreted by love!

Drop Thy still dews of quietness,
Till all our strivings cease;
Take from our souls the strain and stress;
And let our ordered lives confess
The beauty of Thy peace.

Speak through the earthquake, wind and fire.

Trinity Sunday.

At first sight it is a strange combination of messages which comes to us in the Collect, Epistle and Gospel for this day, "the day of the Doctrine of God," which we call Trinity Sunday.

It is "the glory of the Eternal Trinity" which is set before us as we pray the words of the Collect. "The Power of the Divine Majesty," "the Unity"—these are the great expressions put upon our lips in this prayer. We bow before the mystery of the name of God, which is, as it has been revealed to us, a Threefold Name. It is before God upon His Throne that we bend and say with the worshippers of Heaven, "Holy, Holy, Holy, Lord God Almighty, which was, and is, and is to come." This is a day when we especially contemplate the mystery of that Ineffable Name, when we worship Him Who is so far above us that we can only dimly comprehend the wonder and the glory of His Power and Holiness.

The Epistle also is full of these thoughts, so characteristic of Trinity Sunday. In it we have St. John's vision of the Uplifted Throne of God, for we are shown Heaven itself and catch glimpses of the worship of Heaven. But there is another message in the Epistle full of blessing. It is the message of "the open door." "And after this I looked, and behold, a door was opened in Heaven." God is high, sitting upon His Throne, far removed from sin, unto Whom no sin-stained one may approach, for from His Throne proceed "lightnings and thunderings, and voices." God is Holy and awful and strong—all this the Epistle sets before us by a variety of very glowing images. But there is a door opened in Heaven. There is a way of approach for sin stained man! Yes; even on Trinity Sunday this thought is prominent in the Church's message.

And when we come to the Gospel we hear our Lord's own message about the way of approach for sinful man to the Uplifted God, and something about "the open door." It is a glad message at any time, but it has especially joyful sound when, as on this day, we realize the Glory Majesty and Holiness of God afresh. Well might we say with Isaiah, "Woe is me, for I am undone." How can I approach this Holy God, Who is unveiled for me in Collect and Epistle in Divine Majesty? Then it is we hear in the Gospel the true answer. It is because of the New Creation in Christ that we may draw near to God. "Verily, verily, I say unto thee, except a man be born again, he cannot see the Kingdom of God." We have another name given to the open door—it is the Cross of Christ. "And as Moses lifted up the serpent in the wilderness, even so must the Son of man be lifted up: that whosoever believeth in Him should not perish, but have eternal life."

And so it would seem that the combination of messages for this day is not really so very strange. Our religion is one which gives to God the highest place. He is awful and glorious in His Holiness and Power. He cannot tolerate sin. Sin in our religion is the supreme horror—separating and death-dealing. But our religion is the religion of "the open door," of the way back to God made clear by God Himself through His Crucified, Risen and Ascended Son.—Canadian Churchman.

You believe God; that is good. You believe the Gospel; that is good, too. Believe all that; but that is not the point. It is not believing the Bible, it is not even believing God, it is not believing the Gospel that gives the Everlasting Life. It is the definite act of self-committal to Jesus Christ as the Way, the Truth and the Life, as the manifestation of the saving power and love of God to you. It is that definite committal of yourself—an act of the soul—a going out, a reaching forth, a casting of yourself on Him. It is that act of faith, that believing in Him, that gives the fellowship with God which is eternal life.—R. H. Horton.

PREPAREDNESS FOR THE CHURCH

Never in the history of the country has the Church's responsibility in upholding the ideals of the nation been so great. In rendering its share of the essential work, its buildings should provide for maximum efficiency in every department.

Consult the leading specialists in all branches of church improvement, construction, alteration, etc.

Designs will be prepared indicating how contemplated changes, etc., can be effected. Local labor will be availed of when desired for the constructive work, the artistic and elaborate enrichment being executed under the supervision of our New York artists.

Send for photographs of church interiors showing changes and improvements that have been accomplished, with memorial gifts included as a part of the scheme.

CHRISTIAN UNITY; THE SENTIMENT OF THIS CHURCH.

We have ventured to express the opinion that the Committee Report on the Newman Smyth memorial, as we may call it for the sake of brevity, adopted by the House of Bishops near the close of a short and busy session when greatly pressed for time, did not adequately reflect the mind of a majority of the Bishops, as we were sure it did not represent the sentiment of the Church at large. Opportunity was lacking for a strong feeling of sympathy with the spirit and ultimate purpose of that memorial to formulate itself and find expression, a fact which many of the Bishops realize with candid regret. We trust we may be pardoned for quoting a few sentences from a private letter from a very influential member of the House, the Bishop of a large eastern diocese:

"Let me express my hearty approval of what you have said concerning the action of the House of Bishops on the memorial of Dr. Newman Smyth and others.

"I cannot understand how we made such an ungracious reply. I voted against it myself because I did not like its tone; but it slipped through without much consideration. Truth was our attention was concentrated that day on another case. I feel sorry for the way the matter was left. If we cannot do better than that we ought to stop talking about Christian Unity. I do not believe it really expressed the feeling of the House of Bishops."

Even so it may serve a good purpose in leading the Church to make up its mind deliberately on this subject as a matter for present and practical consideration. Possibly it may be found that our Lord wants us to do something, and that His Spirit has been preparing the way. Possibly we may find ourselves more nearly of one mind than we suppose; that has occurred before in this Church when unity of action rather than agreement in opinion was demanded. Theoretical difficulties often disappear before practical effort. Let the Church express her conviction first of all on the imperative need that confronts us of healing, so far as may be now, the breaches that divide and weaken the hosts of God and then seek by any and all means the doing of it.

In this connection we would call attention to the recent action of the Council of the Diocese of South Carolina, which will be found in our news columns; and also present in this place the report of a committee of the Council of the Diocese of Virginia which was unanimously and heartily adopted by the Council.

Your committee to which was referred the resolution asking for an expression of opinion on the vital question of Christian Unity, and for some suggestions as to how best to foster and bring about that godly union and concord for which we pray, begs leave to report that the Protestant Episcopal Church in the Diocese of Virginia, in annual Council assembled, regards with deep sympathy and hopefulness, and with gratitude to Almighty God, the tokens of a growing discontent with the unhappy divisions among Christ's faithful people, and the sincere and increasing expressions of a desire for the unity of His Church. It is our conviction that this subject—always of paramount importance—is especially vital and pressing at this crisis in the history of the world. The loss of power and of effective witness due to our innumerable divisions, and oftentimes to our selfishness and petty partisanship, has now been made more apparent, and the consequences of such loss are now more disastrous than ever before.

As helpful in bringing about that unity for which we pray and which is so vital now, your committee would suggest:

1. That we carefully refrain from stating the claims of our own Church in terms which of necessity impugn the validity of the Sacraments administered by those who, though not Episcopally ordained, yet hold fast to every article of the Christian Faith as contained in the Apostles' and Nicene Creeds.

2. That we should seek and encourage in all possible ways co-operation with all those who love our Lord Jesus Christ in sincerity and truth—not only as expedient and necessary as a war measure, but also as a matter of principle and of loyalty to our Common Lord. We believe that such co-operation would vastly increase the power of the Christian Church and make more effective our witness at the present time, that it would help to remove misunderstandings and prejudices, and that it would deepen our knowledge of, and sympathy for, Christians of every name.

3. That we should understand, and try to get others to understand, that such co-operation—important as it is—is not an end in itself but that it may, in answer to our prayers and to our obedience, and under the guidance of the Holy Spirit, be the means of leading Christian people towards that goal which our Lord Himself has set as the object for which we must labor and strive and pray.

4. That we call upon all our people to keep this great subject of Christian Unity in their minds and hearts, and, above all, to make it an object of earnest and continued intercession, believing that as Christians draw nearer to their Lord they will also draw nearer to each other.

5. That your committee does not feel that an adequate presentation of this great subject can be made in the limited time at its disposal, and therefore asks that the committee be continued and be given authority, by and with the consent of the Bishops of the Diocese, to issue a letter, if this should be deemed advisable, expressing more fully the principles and spirit of these resolutions.

TOWARDS CHURCH UNITY.

In the Church of England the Archbishops of Canterbury and York appointed a Committee to meet and confer with Commissions from the English Free Churches in preparation for the proposed World Conference on Faith and Order. This Joint Conference some time since issued its First Interim Report as prepared by a joint sub-committee. This sub-committee, reappointed and enlarged, has lately set forth an additional report which we give below. Its publication in this country is most timely now when the mind of our American Church is especially directed to the same subject. It more than suggests that the difficulties which stand in the way of organic unity are not insuperable when met in a broad and candid spirit. It will be noted that the demand that "the Episcopate should re-assume a constitutional form" as a condition to its general acceptance, applies only to the Church of England where Bishops are appointees of the Crown. In our own Church the "primitive ideal and practice of Episcopacy" is more nearly realized. The report follows:

In issuing our Second Interim Report we desire to prevent possible misconceptions regarding our intentions. We are engaged, not in formulating any basis of reunion for Christendom, but in preparing for the consideration of such a basis at the projected Conference on Faith and Order. We are exploring the ground in order to discover the ways of approach to the questions to be considered that seem most promising and hopeful. In our first report we were not attempting to draw up a creed for subscription, but desired to affirm our agreement upon certain foundation truths as the basis of a spiritual and rational creed and life for all mankind in Christ Jesus the Lord. It was a matter of profound gratitude to God that we found ourselves so far in agreement. No less grateful were we that even as regards matters relating to Order we were able to hold certain common convictions, though in regard to these we were forced to recognize differences of interpretation. We felt deeply, however, that we could not let the matter rest there; but that we must in conference seek to understand one another better, in order to discover if even on the questions on which we seemed to differ most we might not come nearer to one another.

1. In all our discussions we were guided by two convictions from which we could not escape, and would not, even if we could.

It is the purpose of our Lord that believers in Him should be one visible society, and this unity is essential to the purpose of Christ for His Church and for its effective witness and work in the world. The conflict among Christian nations has brought home to us with a greater poignancy the disastrous results of the divisions which prevail among Christians, inasmuch as they have hindered that growth of mutual understanding which it should be the function of the Church to foster, and because a Church which is itself divided cannot speak effectively to a divided world.

The visible unity of believers which answers to our Lord's purpose must have its source and sanction, not in any human arrangements, but in the will of the One Father, manifested in the Son, and effected through the operation of the Spirit; and it must express and maintain the fellowship of His people with one another in Him. Thus the visible unity of the Body of Christ is not adequately expressed in the cooperation of the Christian churches for moral influence and social service, though such cooperation might with great advantage be carried much further than it is at present; it could only be fully realized through community of worship, faith, and order, including common participation in the Lord's Supper. This would be quite compatible with a rich diversity in life and worship.

2. In suggesting the conditions under which this visible unity might be realized we desire to set aside for the present the abstract discussion of the origin of the Episcopate historically, or its authority doctrinally; and to secure for that discussion when it comes, as it must come, at the Conference, an atmosphere congenial not to controversy, but to agreement. This can be done only by facing the actual situation in order to discover if any practical proposals could be made that would bring the Episcopal and Non-Episcopal Communions nearer to one another.

Further, the proposals are offered not as a basis for immediate action, but for the sympathetic and generous consideration of all churches.

The first fact which we agree to acknowledge is that the position of Episcopacy in the greater part of Christendom, as the recognized organ of the unity and continuity of the Church, is such that the members of the Episcopal churches ought not to be expected to abandon it in assenting to any basis of reunion.

The second fact which we agree to acknowledge is that there are a number of Christian churches not accepting the Episcopal order which have been used by the Holy Spirit in His work of enlightening the world, converting sinners, and perfecting saints. They came into being through reaction from grave abuses in the Church at the time of their origin, and were led in response to fresh apprehensions of divine truth to give expression to certain types of Christian experience, aspiration and fellowship, and to secure rights of the Christian people which had been neglected or denied.

In view of these facts, if the visible unity so much desired within the Church, and so necessary for the testimony and influence of the Church in the world, is ever to be realized, it is imperative that the Episcopal and Non-Episcopal Communions shall approach one another, not by the method of human compromise, but in correspondence with God's own way of reconciling differences in Christ Jesus. What we desire to see is not grudging concession, but a willing acceptance for the common enrichment of the united Church of the wealth distinctive of each.

Looking as frankly and as widely as possible at the whole situation, we desire, with a due sense of responsibility, to submit for the serious consideration of all the parts of a divided Christendom what seem to us the necessary conditions of any possibility of reunion:

1. That continuity with the historic Episcopate should be effectively preserved.

2. That in order that the rights and responsibilities of the whole Christian community in the government of the Church may be adequately recognized, the Episcopate should re-assume a constitutional form, both as regards the method of the election of the Bishop, as by Clergy and people, and the method of government after election. It is perhaps necessary that we should call to mind that such was the primitive ideal and practice of Episcopacy and it so remains in many Episcopal Communions to-day.

3. That acceptance of the fact of Episcopacy, and not any theory as to its character, should be all that is asked for. We think that this may be the more easily taken for granted as the acceptance of any such theory is not now required of ministers of the Church of England. It would no doubt be necessary before any arrangement for corporate reunion could be made to discuss the exact functions which it may be agreed to recognize as belonging to the Episcopate, but we think this can be left to the future.

The acceptance of Episcopacy on these terms should not involve any Christian community in the necessity of disowning its past, but should enable all to maintain the continuity of their witness and influence as heirs and trustees of types of Christian thought, life, and order, not only of value to themselves but of value to the Church as a whole. Accordingly we hope and desire that each of these Communions would bring its own distinctive contribution, not only to the common life of the Church, but also to its methods of organization, and that all that is true in the experience and testimony of the uniting Communions would be conserved to the Church. Within such a recovered unity we should agree in claiming that the legitimate freedom of prophetic ministry should be carefully preserved; and in anticipating that many customs and institutions which have been developed in separate communities may be preserved within the larger unity of which they have come to form a part.

We have carefully avoided any discussion of the merits of any polity, or any advocacy of one form in preference to another. All we have attempted is to show how reunion might be brought about, the conditions of the existing churches, and the convictions held regarding these questions by their members, being what they are. As we are persuaded that it is on these lines and these alone that the subject can be approached with any prospect of any measure of agreement, we do earnestly ask the members of the churches to which we belong to examine carefully our conclusions and the facts on which they are based, and to give them all the weight that they deserve.

In putting forward these proposals we do so because it must be felt by all good-hearted Christians as an intolerable burden to find themselves permanently separated in respect of religious worship and communion from those in whose characters and lives they recognize the surest evidences of the indwelling Spirit; and because, as becomes increasingly evident, it is only as a body, praying, taking counsel, and acting together, that the Church can hope to appeal to men as the Body of Christ, that is, Christ's visible organ and instrument in the world, in which the Spirit of brotherhood and of love as wide as humanity finds effective expression.

More of Heaven Here.

Heaven is not far away, but we must bring it near to men. To men and women in town and city we must bring the sturdy type of religion which is not afraid to fight and suffer for the right; which holds wealth lightly and prizes it only as it may help to produce a better world; which fears no authority, national, ecclesiastical, financial or social, but defies all alike if they are found to be on the side of injustice. It is the business of such religion to bring Heaven nearer to men, and its chief glory lies in the accomplishment of its aim. To lighten men's burdens, to bring some ease into lives that have not known it before, to make flowers bloom and birds sing and joy blossom for the poor—this is the work of God's children to-day. We believe in the heaven beyond, we preach the rest of the other life; but we believe also in Heaven and rest and joy for all earth's toilers here and now.—Christian Guardian.

Letters to the Editor

In this department the Editor will at all times welcome communications expressing opinions on the various topics which are engaging the attention of the Church. But the Editor will not hold himself responsible for such opinions.

No "Letter to the Editor" will appear in our columns except over the signature of the writer.

OPEN THE SEMINARIES TO THE CLERGY.

Mr. Editor: I see that in all probability, we shall have only about sixty-five students in all our theological seminaries next session, because of the depletion of the number by the requirements of the war.

Would it not be possible for our seminaries to take advantage of this condition of affairs and make arrangements for the parochial Clergy to be taken by them, say after Christmas or some time most convenient to the section in which they reside, and given a course of six weeks' or two months' instruction? It seems to me that this might be arranged for at not large expense to the Clergy, and would certainly be an immense gain as well as rest for them. This would be particularly the case among the country clergy and those in the remote fields of the Church's work.

If you think well of this plan, would you mind bringing it to the attention of the Church through your columns?

ARCHBISHOP OF CANTERBURY CABLES OF A NEW PATRIARCH FOR THE SYRIAN CHURCH.

On May 17, I had the honor and great satisfaction in receiving the following cable (the words in brackets and punctuation marks are added by myself for the sake of clearness):

"Have received the following telegram from Urmi: 'Paul Brother (of) Mar Shimun consecrated patriarch (at) Urumia April 27. (The) patriarch, (the) Metropolitan, (and the) Bishops request your (referring to the Archbishop's) influence for preservation (of the) nation. Relatives (of) Mar Shimun safe at present.'

"Archbishop of Canterbury."

It has been a very great relief to us all in this country, and especially to the relief workers to learn from this cable that the conditions must have become somewhat normal to allow such proceedings as the consecration of a patriarch at Urumia, and we are very happy that one of the brothers of Mar Shimun, the late patriarch has been appointed to take his place, and that Surma and David, the sister and brother of Mar Shimun, are safe, of whom we had great anxiety.

The new patriarch, Paul (Paulus), is one of the three remaining brothers, and has had a very liberal education under the Archbishop's Mission. He was not a patriarch designate, but due to the fact that the patriarch designate, the son of David, is a mere boy, Paul has been chosen by the Church and the nation to succeed to the patriarchate. He is about twenty-five years old, and this family has had a remarkable record among our people, both as to their personal worth and their official and Church capacity.

Foul Play On the Life of the Late Patriarch.

Previous to the above telegram, Mr. Langdon, the Secretary of our Committee, and myself had also the following communication from the Archbishop's Secretary:

"The following letter has been received by the Archbishop of Canterbury from Mr. Secretary Balfour, Minister of Foreign Affairs:

"Foreign Office,

"Whitehall, S. W., March 26, 1918.

"Sir,—I am directed by Mr. Secretary Balfour to state for the information of the Archbishop of Canterbury that a telegram has been received from His Majesty's consul at Tabriz stating that a report has been received to the effect that Mar Shimun, the Syriac patriarch from Turkey, was proceeding a short time back with a battalion of Syrian troops and two guns from Urumia to Salmas when he was met by Simku, who invited him to his house and there shot him dead. Persian horsemen are said to have been sent from Khoi and Marand to attack the Syrians.

"I am, sir,

"Your most obedient, humble servant,

"(Signed) Maurice de Bunsen.

"The Chaplain to the Archbishop of Canterbury."

The ordinary observer cannot realize the great position of danger into which Mar Shimun's people have been left by the withdrawal of Russians. When the latter withdrew they left two guns and some ammunition for the Assyrians to defend themselves. We have also known that the Assyrians were not allowed to go to the Caucasus.

Simku is a notorious Kurdish chief. He was under the employ of the Russians, who tried their best to win him to their side, and he seemed to behave well for a time. When the Russians retreated he played the game of siding now with the Turks, now with the Russians. In this case he seemed to have protested friendship for the Christians while at heart he was still a wolf (and the word Kurd means wolf in their own language).

Warning.

Some one, evidently a foreigner, giving the name of Rev. Simon Daniel, is going around in Virginia, Maryland, etc., bearing letters of recommendation from some Oriental Bishops. Also he has shown around to the Clergy a letter on the letter heads of the Assyrian (and possibly) Armenian Relief Committee. The Bishop of New York being Honorary Chairman, and the Rev. Ernest M. Stires, D. D., Chairman with my name also on the letter-head, and the letter purports to be signed by me, allowing him evidently to solicit funds.

I have given no such letter to any one. My signature is forged. The person or persons having such letter should be turned over to the police and the Immigration Bureau should be informed of the whereabouts of the man. Please also communicate with me and oblige.

Paul Shimmon.

Faith in Christ is an act rather of the spiritual nature than of the intellect, and as the result of sympathy with the truth than of critical examination of the evidence.—Marcus Dods.

The Great Commission

One Day's Income Plan.

The One Day's Income Plan is maintaining its advance over last year's record and totaled over $38,000 the middle of May.

An increasing number of parishes are taking thank offerings on this plan on Whitsunday and Trinity Sunday. In some instances this is being done on a Diocesan-wide scale—among them, Albany, Bethlehem, Colorado, Georgia, Iowa, Kentucky, North Carolina and New Mexico.

Members of the American and Japanese staffs of the District of Kyoto have sent in the largest offering that district has ever made to the plan. In the same week gifts came from an Armenian, and from many of the South Dakota Indians. The army and navy are also represented in the list of the plan's friends.

Bishop Howden, of New Mexico, has sent a cheering message to the Board of Missions about the apportionment: "It may serve perhaps as a stimulus for our larger and stronger neighbors to let you know that our Convocation last week passed the following resolution with enthusiastic unanimity:

"That in recognition of the call for special missionary effort, which the present world crisis brings to the Church, this Convocation determines that the District of New Mexico shall exceed its apportionment for General Missions this current year by at least three hundred dollars."

This resolution was, I think, the most popular of the entire three days' session. This means that New Mexico will increase its offerings about twenty-three per cent above the minimum asked of it. Eastern Oklahoma, as already reported in these columns, took a similar action a few months ago.

"Give the coupons of Liberty Bonds to the missionary work of the Church," is the slogan of one patriotic rector. Needless to say, the Board of Missions can put them to excellent use.

The War Plan of the Woman's Auxiliary.

From the Secretary.

The Woman's Auxiliary to the Board of Missions has undertaken what we believe may be a very large contribution to the life of the Church and through the Church to the nation. We are to make an "Advent Call" by means of a "Campaign," but different in many ways from those with which we are so familiar. Those campaigns have asked for things, this is to ask for spiritual power, to ask, in St. Paul's expression, for "not yours, but you."

Christians believe that spiritual power is the greatest force in the world. They follow a Master who said of His miracles, "Greater things than these shall ye do." The time has come when this power must be used to help win the war, and to prepare for and largely create the new era which must come when the war is over. Therefore, the Church which has appointed its War Commission, and whose members are doing so much in many ways for the war, must find and release (more fully than has been done) the spiritual power latent in her members. But beyond her own borders she can and should lead in developing the spiritual resources of America. Much has been said about the awakening of the conscience of the American people, much about the morale of the nation, much about generosity for the world's appalling sufferings, and the women of America have taken a full share in all this. No one doubts that they have also exerted much spiritual power, their prayers, their courage, their services are proof of that, but the time has come when there should be a way of gaining and using the united spiritual power of the country's womanhood.

It is the effort to awaken and use this tremendous power that the Woman's Auxiliary to the Board of Missions has decided upon as its war work. If the Auxiliary can get the women throughout our nation to put the power of prayer behind the struggle on the battlefield, and to prepare for the new time, making themselves more fit to share in the creation of that new world, they can render no greater service to the nation and to the Kingdom of God.

During the first week of Advent (December 1-8, 1918) women will go from house to house to the women of the Church, reminding them of this greatest gift, spiritual power, and asking them to pledge themselves to do one or more of the following things:

First, daily prayer: For to-day—For victory, for our men, for our allies, for our enemies, for the women at home. Prayers in preparation—For righteous peace, for just and true democracy at home, for Christian inter-nationalism, for Church unity, that the will of God may be done in all the world.

Second, prayer for these same objects at the Holy Communion on certain days.

Third, to make every effort to become more familiar with the Bible message by means of systematic reading and Bible study when this is possible.

Fourth, preparation to take part in an effort to reach the women of America.

At the end of the visits (unless it seems unwise) the messengers will suggest praying for these objects.

Each Diocese has been asked to appoint a leader for this work and to see that this leader goes to one of the summer conferences for training. In the fall she will undertake the messengers in her Diocese. It will also be wise if she has a committee to help her in all this work. Every parish will be asked to furnish its quota of messengers. After their training they should be commissioned at a celebration of the Holy Communion, for we are desirous of making these visits not as individuals but as representatives of the Church. During the week whenever possible we hope for daily celebrations and an open church, where all day long at least one woman shall be praying for the messengers. Between now and Advent leaflets and suggestions will be sent from the Church Missions House.

Both because the undertaking is so large and because we covet the joy of working with others, it is earnestly hoped that it will not be done by the Auxiliary alone but by Churchwomen, whether they belong to the Woman's Auxiliary or not. If we may have that co-operation and the leadership of the Clergy and the willingness of the Auxiliary to do a hard thing we may carry out in a very beautiful and liberal way St. Paul's thought, and be among those who are truly "rejoicing in hope, patient in tribulation, continuing in state in prayer."

"The strength of modern missions," it has been well said, "is their democracy." This finds striking illustration in the present situation in China. The first President of the republic and the author of the constitution under which it is now working was educated in a Presbyterian Mission. One of the most influential leaders in developing the present educational system is an active Christian, and the text books used in the schools are largely the work of Christian men. The great printing establishment at Shanghai, employing over fifteen hundred persons, is owned by Christian men. The mission movement in China is illustrating on every hand the spirit of Christian unity and co-operation. The Arlington Fund of two million dollars left in trust for mission work and the Rockefeller Foundation supporting a whole system of medical schools and hospitals are notable contributions in the great work that is advancing the cause of democracy and Christianity in China.—Selected.

In summing up the figures of the last Lenten offering, Diocese by Diocese, according to the per capita gift, e. c., it is interesting to note that the eight which were in the lead last year are in their same relative positions this year, North Dakota standing first, as she has for years, and Honolulu coming next. Last year we reported six Dioceses with a per capita gift of more than sixty cents. This year we report seven, Bethlehem having moved up. Of these seven only one reports a smaller offering than last year. North Dakota has jumped from $1.12 to $1.50 per child; Honolulu from eighty-seven cents to $1.04, thus making two Dioceses (or rather two missionary districts) which are now making an average offering of more than $1.00 per child. Of the other five all have increased with the exception of Montana, which has gone back about a cent and a half per child, but it still maintains its fourth place.—Pacific Christian Monthly.

The "God Like That."

Heathenism provides only a god of fear. Occasionally some soul catches a hazy idea of the God of love. Dr. Mabie tells of one such. In India he was speaking of the God who "so loved the world that He gave His Son." A native Indian woman was listening with breathless attention, and turning suddenly to the woman next to her she said: "Did I not tell you there ought to be a God like that?" Nature is able to give such seekers after truth a knowledge of "the eternal power and Deity" of God, but it requires the revelation of God in His word to reveal Him in His beauty as the God of love. Therefore, we are debtors "both to the Greeks, and to the Barbarians." Are we paying that debt? If not do we really know "a God like that" ourselves?—S. S. Times.

Faith in God.

"Have faith in God" (Mark 11:22). What do they think God is who speaks of the "good old times" or long for past hours when they better knew and enjoyed the blessing and fellowship of Christ? What kind of a God do they think we have? Does He not always keep the best things for the last? Is His love stronger than His strength, that we had the best things yesterday and the day before and are not having yet better things to-day nor to have better things to-morrow? A true theology insists that this month is the best month of our lives. Every day is the best day, and the next day will be better.—Robert E. Speer.

Church Intelligence

Death of Mrs. F. L. H. Pott in Shanghai.

A cable received at the Church Missions House on May 16 announces the death in Shanghai on Saturday, May 11, of Mrs. F. L. Hawks Pott, wife of the President of St. John's University, Shanghai.

Mrs. Pott was the daughter of the first clergyman of the American Church Mission in China. For many years she has been a leader in the Church's work on behalf of the women of her native land. On her occasional visits to this country, Mrs. Pott was always a welcome guest at meetings of the Woman's Auxiliary and similar gatherings. Her fine enthusiasm and her abundant hope for the Chinese people have inspired thousands of women in this country to earnest service for the women of the Orient.

Miss Olive Pott is with her father in Shanghai. Three sons are at present in the military service of the United States. William Sumner Pott is a lieutenant of infantry. James H. Pott is in the aviation corps, and Walter Pott is in the medical reserve.

NORTH CAROLINA.

Rev. Jos. B. Cheshire, D. D., Bishop.

Annual Convention—Election of Colored Suffragan, the Rev.

H. B. Delany.

The one hundred and second Annual Convention of the Diocese was held in beautiful St. Luke's Church, Salisbury, May 15-16, inclusive. The Woman's Auxiliary, according to the order adopted at the last session, did not meet with the Convention this year, but its report showing gain and extension was read, and the work of the women heartily endorsed. The attendance upon the Convention, considering the many activities of the day, was good. Colonel Charles E. Johnson, for thirty-four years the Treasurer of the Diocese, insisted upon resigning that office, and Mr. Graham H. Andrews, of Raleigh, was elected his successor. Fitting notice was taken of the long and useful service of Colonel Johnson.

Perhaps the most important feature was the election of a Suffragan-Bishop for the colored work of the Diocese. The Rev. Dr. Henry Beard Delany, of Raleigh, at present Archdeacon of colored work, was the unanimous choice for this important office. The colored men were asked to express their preference, and were unanimous in their designation of Dr. Delany as their choice. One delegate in seconding the nomination of Dr. Delany, thanked this Church for the wisdom and zeal with which it had held to high ideals for the colored people, saying, "This Church has Christianized, nurtured and educated us until now we have men like Dr. Delany, of whom we are justly proud." The salary of the Suffragan-Bishop was fixed at $2,000 and expenses, the resolution providing that upon request of the Bishop of another Diocese and with the consent of the Bishop of this Diocese, the Suffragan might serve other Dioceses. A wire was read from the Convention of South Carolina, saying that it would co-operate with us in the matter of the Suffragan. The reports from Chapel Hill, the Thompson Orphanage, St. Mary's School, St. Augustine's School and St. Agnes' Hospital for colored people were most encouraging. The report of Colonel Boyden on the orphanage showed that the interested work of certain laymen of the Diocese had entirely changed conditions there, and that everything was in splendid condition. The undertaking merits the enthusiastic endorsement and support of the Church people. Colonel Boyden asked that aid be extended the orphanage, and many responses, ranging from $50 to $1,000, were made.

The Archdeacons gave encouraging reports of their work. Archdeacon Lawrence, of Hillsboro, pointed out the real need of giving the country work of the Diocese greater and more intelligent support, showing that North Carolina, while an agricultural State, had ninety-two per cent of its Church people in the cities and towns, and but eight per cent in the country. Archdeacon Lawrence thought that this should arouse serious study of the Church service, methods and fitness of men for the country. Bishop Knight, of Sewanee, and the Rev. Henry O. Nash, doing work for the War Commission at Camp Green, also addressed the Convention.

October marks the twenty-fifth anniversary of the ordination of Bishop Cheshire to the Episcopate. The Convention ordered that this event be suitably recognized, and appointed a committee to plan an appropriate service which, upon the suggestion of Bishop Cheshire, will be held in Tarboro. In his address Bishop Cheshire discussed the right of a clergyman to take up war work. He said in conclusion:

"I appreciate the spirit of heroic self-sacrifice, which impels the young priest to feel that he must go and take his place in the ranks with his brethren. But we are not our own masters. We have dedicated ourselves to a particular work, an important work; and our country, no less than the necessities of the Church and of the world, has said to us that we must stand in our place, and do our own work, while those who are called for that other work fulfil also their duty in doing what they are called to do."

VIRGINIA.

Rt. Rev. R. A. Gibson, D. D., Bishop.
Rt. Rev. W. C. Brown, D. D., Coadjutor

One Hundred and Twenty-third Annual Council.

The one hundred and twenty-third annual meeting of the Council of the Protestant Episcopal Church in the Diocese of Virginia convened in St. James Church, Leesburg, at 10 o'clock on Wednesday, May 15. The following Bishops and Clergy were in the chancel for the opening service: Bishop Gibson and Coadjutor-Bishop Brown, together with the Rev. Messrs. Edward L. Goodwin, D. D., Secretary of the Council; G. McLaren Brydon and Conrad H. Goodwin, rector of the church. Bishop Gibson read a part of his address, which was followed by the administration of the Holy Communion to the members of the Council.

After the service the Council assembled for business, with Bishop Gibson in the chair. The Rev. E. L. Goodwin, D. D., was re-elected Secretary.

During the period ending December 31, 1917, Bishop Gibson confirmed fifty-seven persons as he was not able to make many visitations, while Bishop Brown confirmed four hundred and eighteen persons. The deaths of the Rev. Edward Wall, of Berryville; the Rev. Frank Page, D. D., of Fairfax, and Bishop Randolph, of Southern Virginia, were referred to by Bishop Gibson in fitting and sympathetic terms.

The Bishop also referred to the Diocesan contribution to the support of the War Commission of our Church. The Blue Ridge Industrial School, which suffered from fire during the past year, has been doing a splendid work and on account of this the Diocesan Missionary Society has pledged the amount of $3,000 at the present time to this school under certain limitations, which will advance the work of the school in its special work among the mountain children. The Council then took a recess for luncheon.

Wednesday Evening: The Council reconvened at 3 o'clock P. M., with Bishop Gibson in the chair. A report was made by the Rev. G. Freeland Peter on the Pension Fund, the chief recommendation being that hereafter the parishes and not the Diocese be responsible to the central officers of the Pension Fund.

The following resolution on Church Unity was offered by the Rev. E. L. Goodwin, D. D., and unanimously carried:

Resolved, That the Council of the Protestant Episcopal Church in the Diocese of Virginia regards with sympathy and hopefulness and with gratitude to Almighty God, the tokens of a growing discontent with the unhappy divisions among Christ's faithful people and of an awakened desire for the unity of His Church;

Resolved further, in order that the mind of this Church in this Diocese on this most vital matter of Christian unity may find expression, and that we may be directed and encouraged to do what in us lies to bring about that godly union and concord for which we pray; that a committee be appointed to consist of our two Bishops with four clergymen and three laymen to make a report to this Council on this subject, and to suggest such further action as may be desirable.

The Bishop appointed the following Clergy and Laity on this committee: Bishops Gibson and Brown, the Rev. Drs. E. L. Goodwin, Wallace E. Rollins, J. J. Gravatt, the Rev. W. H. Burkhardt, and Messrs. F. H. Moss, Judge Scott and Judge Norton. Their report will be found in another column.

The Rev. G. M. Brydon presented a resolution for the Rev. Conrad H. Goodwin, which called for a mission of prayer and repentance during this summer or fall that the Church may humble herself before God and beseech Him to give us the true spirit to win this war with our Allies. The Rev. Conrad H. Goodwin was accorded the floor to speak to this resolution, which was referred to the Committee on Church Unity.

Mr. Paul Shimmom, representative of Mar Shimun, patriarch of the Syrian Church, a native of Persia, spoke with much effect on the awful conditions of the Armenians and Syrians resulting from the bloody and destructive war waged against them by the Turks and Germans, the Huns of the present age. He thanked the Diocese of Virginia and the churches of this land for their generous aid and, while much had been given, they still needed more in their unparalleled distress.

The committee appointed by Bishop Gibson on the part of his address referring to the war, made a report through Bishop Brown, who introduced Mr. Rosewell Page, who spoke of the need of keeping up and supporting our men in camp and at the front; Dr. Ennion G. Williams, who told of the great improvement in health conditions, followed by the Rev. Dr. Bowie, who described the work of the Church War Commission and the great benefits derived from it. The following memorial was adopted:

To the President and Congress of the United States.

The Protestant Episcopal Church in the Diocese of Virginia, coeval with Anglo-Saxon civilization in America, now in Annual Council at Leesburg, recalling the faith of the founders of the republic and with unwavering loyalty to the inseparable principles of freedom and religion, declares its clear conviction of the righteousness of the cause for which the United States and our Allies are battling, and pledges to the President, to the Congress, and to the people of the United States and also to Belgium, France, Great Britain, Italy, Serbia and allied nations, its prayers and every support in its power for the winning of the war. Having supreme confidence in the triumph of right over might, we await with serenity the victory for which noble warriors have consecrated their lives, looking for the regeneration of the hearts and souls of all races of men, the spread of democracy throughout the world, and the establishment of a peace which shall be permanent because, with malice toward none, it shall be based upon justice, mercy and truth and upon the recognition of the rights of all in the spirit of universal love as exemplified in the life of Jesus Christ our Lord.

Thursday: The Standing Committee of the Diocese was re-elected as follows: The Rev. Drs. Berryman Green, P. P. Phillips and J. J. Gravatt, Colonel Arthur Herbert, Messrs. J. L. Zimmerman and Gardner L. Boothe. Other committees and commissions elected or appointed were nearly the same as last year. Delegates to the Provincial Synod are, the Rev. Messrs. W. H. Burkhardt, James W. Morris, D. D., W. Roy Mason and W. J. Morton, and Messrs. Robert Beverley, John B. Minor, E. C. Massie and W. W. Chamblin. The Rev. Matthew Porter, D. D., addressed the Council in behalf of the American Bible Society and especially on the emergency fund for supplying Bibles, Testaments, etc., to the soldiers and sailors. One million of dollars is needed for this purpose, of which the Diocese of Virginia was asked for $2,500.00. It was resolved that this sum should be raised and the Apportionment Committee was instructed to advise each parish of the proportionate amount expected from it. The Rev. G. P. Mayo presented an excellent report on the Blue Ridge Industrial School, showing its great value in developing the life of the mountain children of the Archdeaconry of the Blue Ridge, along the lines of Christian education, which in the truest sense fits them for usefulness in the world. The Rev. Mr. Ribble next gave the report of the Diocesan Commission on Religious Education. This showed a steady development in its work, among other things stating that there are boards connected with every convocation. The Summer Institute held last year was a great success, and another will be held at the University this year early in June.

The Rev. Dr. Smith, of Winchester, presented the budget of the Diocese for another year. In this $25,000.00 is apportioned to Diocesan Missions the largest amount ever apportioned. The whole budget amounts to $27,875.00, exclusive of the apportionment for General Missions, yet to be received.

Several changes in the canons were adopted, one of which was intended to emphasize the spiritual relations of vestrymen to the Church and the people. The canon on the Pension Fund was also amended, and hereafter payments to this fund will be made directly from the parishes to the Church Pension Fund.

In the evening addresses were made by Mr. Knapp, the Brotherhood Secretary at Camp Lee, and the Rev. Mr. J. J. Chapman, missionary to Japan.

The Council concluded its work on Friday morning. The report of the Committee on the State of the Church referred to war conditions in connection with the Church, urging the necessity of frequent and earnest prayers to the God of righteousness for success and victory instead of trusting to arms alone. As many rectors are now in training camps, or at the front, the laymen of the Church are called upon in case of lack of ministers, to do their part in keeping up the regular services. The clergy are also urged to see that proper honor rolls of parishioners in the service of their country be placed or recorded in the churches, or remembered on a service flag. Various reports were read by the Chairmen of the respective committees, among them being that of the Committee on the Mission of Repentance and Faith, which was strongly urged. If the Church as a whole should not take hold of it, it is to be organized for the Diocese. An interesting report was read from the Secretary of the Diocesan Branch of the Woman's Auxiliary. That from the Dean of the Theological Seminary showed a good attendance for the present session, notwithstanding the fact that a number of the students have entered the service of their country.

The Council closed at 12 o'clock noon with the usual religious exercises by Bishop Gibson.

This Council was somewhat smaller than usual, so many, both of our Clergy and laymen, being engaged in war work. Work of much importance connected with the Diocese was accomplished. All were gratified to see Bishop Gibson preside with ease to himself at all its sessions, and the whole Diocese gives hearty thanks to Almighty God for the recovery thus far granted to him, and its united prayer is that he may be spared for years yet to carry on the work he has so faithfully performed during the period he has ministered in his high office.

The hospitality of the people of Leesburg was unbounded, and the delightful sojourn of the Council in this quaint and historic town of Loudoun County will not soon be forgotten.

St. Paul's Memorial Church, University: The Rev. Hubard Lloyd, of Japan, is temporarily in charge of St. Paul's. At the close of the Virginia Episcopal School for Boys, the Rev. Thomas K. Nelson will have charge of the services until the first of September, when the Rev. Roger Walke, of Japan, will take charge and remain until the return of the rector, the Rev. B. D. Tucker, who is with the University of Virginia Hospital Unit.

The Rev. R. A. Goodwin, of the Missionary District of Anking, now in charge of Johns Parish, Aldie, Loudoun County, will go to France this summer as a Y. M. C. A. worker in charge of the Chinese laborers who are working behind the lines in France.

The Rev. Charles W. Sydnor, rector of Christ Church, Richmond, is spending a month at Camp Lee as a Y. M. C. A. Secretary. He expects to resume his work at Christ Church early in June.

The Rev. Alexander Galt, rector of Ridley Parish, Brandy Station, has accepted the call extended him by the vestry of Christ Church, Bowling Green, Ky., and leaves Virginia for his new work this week.

WEST VIRGINIA.

Rt. Rev. W. L. Gravatt, D. D., Bishop.

Wheeling Clericus: The monthly meeting was held in the parish house of St. Matthew's Church on Tuesday, May 14. The Rev. Jacob Brittingham, D. D., rector St. Luke's Church, read a paper on "The Breadth of the Minister's Obligation" as it concerns himself, the Church and the world, which was well received, and called forth much very profitable comment from the members present. There was a good attendance, and lunch was served by the ladies of St. Matthew's Church.

The Ohio Valley Sunday-school Institute: The institute met in St. Matthew's Church immediately after the conclusion of the meeting of Clericus. There was present a large representation of the Sunday-schools in the institute. Miss Bessie B. Leach, worker in the Hocking Valley, delivered an address on "The Church and Child Conservation." The Rev. R. N. Meade, rector of the Church of the Redeemer, Pittsburgh, Pa., read a paper entitled "From the Institute to the Child." The Rev. Sidney E. Sweet, rector St. Paul's Church, Columbus, made an address based on the question, "What should be the emphasis on our Sunday-school teaching in the light of the war?" Supper was served at six o'clock by the ladies of St. Matthew's Church, after which a short service was held, followed by a continuation of the session. The Rev. S. R. Tyler, rector of Trinity Church, Huntington, spoke on "The Sunday-school Teacher," and the Rev. William Porkess, rector Grace Church, Pittsburgh, Pa., on "Religious Education's Special Opportunities." The addresses were most instructive and helpful, and a limited time for open discussion was allowed after each one. This meeting of the institute was pronounced the best in its history.

Summer School for Sunday-school Workers at Conneaut Lake: Mr. Porkess called attention to this school, which is in its fourth year, and is the official Summer School for Sunday-school Workers in the three Dioceses, Ohio, Pittsburgh and Erie. The program is a very full one, and combines pleasure with education and spiritual profit at moderate cost. The school will be open for four days, July 8 to 12.

GEORGIA.

Rt. Rev. F. F. Reese, D. D., Bishop.

St. Mark's Church, Brunswick: A quiet afternoon for members of the Woman's Auxiliary and others was kept on Saturday, May 11, the addresses being given by Bishop Osborne, who came from Savannah for the purpose. The Bishop remained over Sunday, conducting the services of the day and also taking a funeral service at the colored church of St. Athanasius.

The parish is still without a rector, the Rev. Mr. Lawrence, of Americus, having felt obliged to decline the call he had hoped to accept.

SOUTH CAROLINA.

Rt. Rev. W. A. Guerry, D. D., Bishop.

Annual Council: Action on Christian Unity.

The one hundred and twenty-eighth Annual Council of the Diocese of South Carolina was held at Aiken, on May 14-16. Elections resulted as follows: Secretary, the Rev. A. S. Thomas, Cheraw; Standing Committee, the Rev. Messrs. John Kershaw, A. R. Mitchell, A. S. Thomas, S. C. Beckwith and W. H. K. Pendleton, Governor R. I. Manning, Messrs. T. W. Bacot, H. P. Duvall, J. N. Frierson and J. C. Bissell; Deputies to Provincial Synod, the Rev. Messrs. M. P. Logan, H. Thomas, G. C. Williams, T. T. Walsh, W. H. K. Pendleton and Walter Mitchell, Governor R. I. Manning, Messrs. J. E. Smith, H. W. Fraser, J. S. Whaley, Frank R. Frost and J. A. Ball; substitute delegates, the Rev. Messrs. William Way, F. H. Harding, A. N. Blackford, F. A. Juhan and J. M. Stoney.

The Council appointed a Diocesan War Commission.

The Rev. W. E. Cox, of Richmond, Va., addressed the Convention on the subject of Missions, and the Rev. William Way, on the subject of the War Savings Stamps.

A stated offering was designated to be taken in each parish annually for the colored work of the Diocese.

By a unanimous vote the Council concurred with the Diocese of North Carolina and the Diocese of East Carolina for the Diocese of North Carolina to elect a colored Suffragan-Bishop, who will have charge of the colored work in the Diocese of North Carolina of East Carolina and of South Carolina under the Bishops of these respective Dioceses; the Diocese of North Carolina agreeing to pay $1,200.00 per annum toward the salary of the Suffragan-Bishop, South Carolina $600.00 per annum, and East Carolina $400.00 per annum.

The Council recommended by an almost unanimous vote that the Easter offering in all parishes and missions of the Diocese be devoted to missions outside of the Diocese.

The Rev. William Way was appointed chairman of a newly created committee to be known as the Committee on the Dispatch of Business.

The one hundred and twenty-ninth Annual Council will be held in Georgetown, the second Tuesday in May, 1919.

Christian Unity: The committee to whom was referred that portion of the Bishop's address relative to Christian unity being essential to the upbuilding of the Kingdom of Christ, and especially so in order to meet the situation in the world at this time, submits the following preamble and resolution:

Whereas, in the Pastoral Letter of the House of Bishops of 1916, we find these words, "A divided Church is powerless to convert an undivided world. There must, therefore, be no relaxation in our steady efforts to bind up her wounds and manifest her destiny"; and

Whereas, we find this thought expressed by a recent author, a Bishop of our Church: "The future of the Christian Church, humanly speaking, will depend largely upon whether the Church will allow themselves to be drawn together into a catholic fellowship of the people of God"; and

Whereas, an appeal was recently presented to the House of Bishops on the part of representatives of nine communions of Christians, including our own, to approve a certain proposed plan of unity in the service of the Church upon the battlefields of Europe, and in that appeal the following statement appears: "The whole Church is called to-day to make one sacrificial offering of all things held to be of value in one great venture of faith for God"; and

Whereas, the House of Bishops did reply to the memorialists, presenting the above-mentioned appeal, in disapproval of the same, affirming that, in their judgment "the hasty adoption of ill-considered expedients in the face of an emergency we believe would endanger and retard, rather than further, the cause of reunion."

Whereas, the Chairman of the Commission on Unity, of the National Council of the Congregational Churches, as spokesman for the memorialists presenting the said appeal to the House of Bishops, in a recently published statement has declined to consider this reply as final; and further therein states, "We would lay again our appeal before the individual Bishops and the communicants in their respective Dioceses—the great body of Christian Laity—to consider any overtures for unifying action that shall express the fundamental unity of Christianity"; now, therefore,

Be it resolved, That it would be inconsistent with the position hitherto assumed upon all appropriate occasions by our communion as the "hope of the churches being found precisely where the hope of the nations is to be found in coming together into a single compact army of God"; to fail altogether to rise to this call for faith and action (and that this is in the present emergency of ministering to the American soldiers in foreign service no longer a purely academic matter) and, furthermore, that our Church must not be "afraid of its own ideals"; and, that we, therefore, instruct that a copy of this preamble and resolution be forwarded by the Secretary of the Council, to the respective Chairmen of the Commission on Unity of the National Council of the Congregational Churches and the Joint Commission on Christian Unity of our Communion, with an urgent recommendation to them on behalf of the Diocese of South Carolina to call together their respective commissions in joint session to confer upon a plan for reunion that may be by them jointly submitted to the next session of General Convention and to the National Council of the churches for further action.

TEXAS.

Rt. Rev. G. H. Kinsolving, D. D., Bishop

Election of a Bishop-Coadjutor.

At the meeting of the Council of the Diocese of Texas held in Houston, May 15-17, the Rev. Clinton S. Quin, of Trinity Episcopal Church, Houston, was elected Bishop-Coadjutor of the Diocese. His election was by a unanimous vote of both the clerical and lay delegates.

Mr. Quin is a native of Louisville, Ky. He graduated from the Theological Seminary in Virginia in 1908, and was ordained deacon and priest the same year by Bishop Woodcock. He was rector of Grace Church, Paducah, Ky., until his removal to Houston about a year ago.

NEWARK.

Rt. Rev. M. S. Lines, D. D., Bishop.
Rt. Rev. W. R. Stearly, D. D., Coadjutor.

The Diocesan Convention.

The Newark Diocesan Convention met May 14-15 at Trinity Cathedral, Newark. In his address, Bishop Lines read a long list of names of young men of the Diocese who had lost their lives in the army; as also a list of the officers of the Diocese and the parishes who had died within the year.

The support of the government in every possible way was presented as a religious duty; the spiritual side of the conflict and the events of the year was presented; an earnest appeal was made for the increase of salaries of the Clergy, the necessity of accepting changes in the methods of Church Teaching and Work under the new conditions, a new attitude towards other churches, and the need of a greater use of laymen were emphasized. The chief events in the Diocese during the year, the establishment of the James Barber Trust, yielding $15,000.00 annually for the Diocese; and the taking of Trinity Church, Newark, as the Cathedral Church, were referred to. Out of regard to the needs of the government, large building operations had been suspended, while many projects had been set forward. The former officers and delegates to the Provincial Synod were almost without exception re-elected.

A new canon on Religious Education, giving the Board a larger field and better position, was adopted. The Board is made up of the two Bishops, the four Archdeacons, eight persons appointed by the Bishop, eight persons elected by the Convention and the Board given authority to add five more.

The annual budget of the Diocese was adopted, with increases for education and Diocesan Missions at $33,500.00, or about nine per cent of the current expenses of the parishes.

A new canon was passed requiring the consent of the Convention or Finance Committee for the collection of money in the Diocese with the expectation that all property acquired by the commissions or institutions in the Dioceses will be guarded from mortgage or alienation in the same way as parish churches.

Bishop Stearly's address presented the work of the Diocesan War Service Commission, especially in Camps Dix and Merritt, where many of the Clergy have been serving terms of three months each with leave of absence from their parishes. The Diocesan Commission has raised about $50,000.00 for such work. His address also gave a summary of the Diocesan Missionary and Church Extension activities.

HARRISBURG.

Rt. Rev. J. H. Darlington, D. D., Bishop.

Annual Convention.

The fourteenth Annual Convention of the Diocese met in St. Paul's, Lockhaven, on Tuesday afternoon, May 14. At the conclusion of the Bishop's address four flags were presented and severally blessed by the Bishop. They were an American flag, the presentation followed by singing the Star Spangled Banner; a French flag, followed by La Marseillaise; an English flag, followed by God Save the King, and an Italian flag, followed by the Garibaldi hymn. The service was most dignified and impressive.

Major-General Clement was re-elected Secretary, and the Rev. William Dorwart was reappointed Assistant Secretary.

The Holy Communion was celebrated on the following morning, with a large number present. The business session, which followed, consisted of routine business, such as reading reports and election of officers, which required on this occasion one ballot.

The Standing Committee, as elected, consists of the Rev. Messrs. Rollin A. Sawyer, Harrisburg; Floyd Appleton, Ph. D., Harrisburg; Leroy F. Baker, Selins Grove, Pa.; William Heakes, Lewiston, Pa.; Franklin T. Eastment, Phillipsburg, and Messrs. T. Spencer Hamilton, Shamokin; John Langdon, Huntingdon; Hugh B. Meredith, M. D., Riverslide; David McMullen, Lancaster; Ralph T. Smith, Williamsport.

Too much could hardly be said of the splendid hospitality of the rector, the Rev. Lewis Nichols, wardens, vestrymen and people generally of St. Paul's, Lock Haven, on this occasion. Paul's, Lockhaven, on this occasion. The session was one of the briefest in the history of the Diocese.

The War-Time Supper of the Church Club of the Diocese took place on the evening of May 14 in the dining hall of the Central State Normal School, Lock Haven. While this has no relation to the Convention of the Diocese the occasion of the meeting of the Convention was utilized, large numbers of the Churchmen of the Diocese being present at the Convention. Nearly three hundred and fifty men attended the supper, which was served by the women of St. Paul's, Lock Haven.

The President of the Church Club, Mr. Richard M. H. Wharton, was the toastmaster, who spoke in the outset to the toast, "Our Country," "My Own, My Native Land." Sir John Willison, Canadian correspondent of the London Times and for two years editor of the Daily News, spoke to the toast, "Dauntless Canada. Never Did and Never Shall Lie at Proud Foot of a Conqueror." In the outset he read a message to the Church Club from the Prime Minister of Canada. He exhorted the people present not to be too critical of those in authority. "The sum of that which is efficient is so much more than that which is inefficient." "The world needs every ounce of strength that you have, therefore stand together."

He was followed by M. Stephane Lauzanne, who spoke to the toast, "Fighting France! The Land of Scholars and the Nurse of Arms." He declared that France would fight on to the end. "We will perish to the last, but the barbarian shall not pass." He said that "France is not bled white," and to prove it presented the facts that in September, 1914, France had 1,500,000 men in her army, now she has 2,750,000. In September, 1914, France was making for her own use 12,000 shells a day, now she is making 300,000. In 1914 she had 25,000 women working in her munition works, now she has 250,000. In the three first years of the war she spent twenty billion dollars, and of this she borrowed only two billion.

M. Lauzanne is a member of the French Commission to this country. He was an officer of the French army and was wounded at the battle of Verdun. The speeches of both these men were received with great enthusiasm.

The Bishop of the Diocese followed, speaking to the toast, "The Cross Victorious," "In hoc signo vinces."

The Rev. George I. Browne at Ascension tide passed his tenth anniversary of the rectorship of St. John's, Lancaster, and the twenty-fifth anniversary of his ordination to the priesthood. These events were fittingly celebrated on the eve of Ascension Day in the parish house of St. John's congregation. On the part of the vestry a purse of $125.00 in gold was presented to Mr. Browne by Mr. James H. Spotts, and the pastor's Aid Society presented him with a fine surplice. Both gifts were entirely unexpected by the rector.

The Pennsylvania Reserve Militia, the Lancaster Marine Training Corps and the Lancaster Machine Gun Company, attended St. John's Church, Lancaster, on the evening of Ascension Day for a special service. The united bodies assembled at City Hall at 7:30 and, headed by the mayor of the city, Hon. H. L. Trout, Major H. B. Keiper, of the Marine Training Corps, and by the Burger Military Band, marched to the church. The service was impressive in every way and the sermon by Mr. Browne most fitting. Mr. Browne is chaplain of the Marine Training Corps, and has a son in the United States Navy. At the time of this service a "service flag" containing nearly five hundred stars was placed in the charge of Chaplain Browne. It represents the men who have gone into the service from the organizations mentioned above. This flag was carried in the street demonstration which preceded the service. Major Keiper made the presentation speech.

DELAWARE.

Rt. Rev. F. J. Kinsman, D. D., Bishop.

Annual Convention.

The one hundred and thirty-second Annual Convention of the Diocese was held in St. Peter's Church, Smyrna, on May 15. At the opening service Bishop Kinsman delivered a short charge on the Church and the War. The business session was brisk and harmonious; and much was accomplished in a short time. Several changes in canons were finally adopted; and others approved on a first reading which lie over for final action at the next Convention. The most important of these provides for the election of delegates to General Convention by concurrent ballot.

The following officers were elected: Standing Committee, the Rev. W. H. Laird, D. D., the Ven. B. F. Thompson, the Rev. F. M. Kirkus, the Hon. E. G. Bradford, Woodburn Martin, Esq.; Missions and Education Committee, the Rev. R. W. Trapnell, the Rev. J. G. Gantt, John S. Grohe, A. Felix du Pont, H. V. Lyons; Trustee of the Diocese, Woodburn Martin, Esq.; Committee on Constitution and Canons, Rev. C. H. B. Turner, D. D.; Secretary, John S. Grohe; Treasurer, Frederick Bringhurst; Registrar, Professor Henry Hanby Hay; Deputies to Provincial Synod, the Rev. W. H. Laird, D. D., the Rev. F. M. Kirkus, the Rev. P. L. Donaghy, the Rev. T. G. Hill, Chancellor Charles M. Curtis, A. Felix du Pont, Hon. Richard S. Rodney and William Penniwill; Alternate Deputies, the Rev. Alban Richey, D. D., the Rev. J. G. Gantt, the Ven. B. F. Thompson, the Rev. R. W. Trapnell, William J. Fisher, William B. Jester, H. K. Greene, R. B. Rayner.

NEW YORK.

Rt. Rev. David H. Greer, D. D., Bishop
Rt. Rev. C. S. Buroh, D. D., Suffragan

Spring Convention.

For the first time New York Diocese had this year a spring Convention. A very large attendance greeted Bishop Greer, when he gave his short address, and the business was dispatched in one day. Not many difficult problems arose, the Convention having met only last November. At night there was a dinner of the Diocesan Missionary Committee, and a drive for General Missions was determined upon, back by action of the Convention. A leader in it was William W. Orr, the Chairman of the committee.

Friends of St. Stephen's College were disappointed in the action of the Convention in going no farther than commending an appeal for funds for Second Province scholarships, in place of the hoped for action of making the fund an assessment upon the parishes. The action was proposed by the financial leaders and approved by the Convention. No one spoke for the plan.

An important step was taken toward securing representation in the Convention from the youngest of missions—a democratic move intended to give everybody voice, no matter how small numbers there are behind him. There is created an Advisory Board.

The Seamen's Church Institute reported a most remarkable work owing in part to the demands upon merchant sailors because of the war. Sailors themselves contribute to the institute in payment for lodgings, for food, shipping and the Navigation School no less sum than $193,800 in a year. People of the country, largely beyond New York's limits, contributed last year $82,400 to help the sailors religious, moral and welfare. More than 16,000 contributors gave to this cause. The report states that there was spent in religious and social work $16,186. The institute has become a great business institution, the largest of its kind in the world, with a budget last year just under $300,000.

ERIE.

Rt. Rev. Rogers Israel, D. D., Bishop.

A very interesting service was held in the Cathedral, Erie, on Sunday morning, April 21, when two service flags containing fifty-five stars were unfurled, and also an honor roll placed in the vestibule of the church. One flag has been hung in the chancel, and the other outside over the main entrance. There is one gold star on these flags, as Karl Reznor gave his life for his country on the aviation field at San Antonio.

Brookville: The Rev. George A. Sutton, after a most prosperous eighteen months' work, has accepted a charge near Sharon (Farrell), where he will act as vicar, assisting also at the mother church in Sharon part of the time.

Kinzua: The Rev. Dr. O. M. Fisher, who has been in charge of this group of three mission stations, has been called, and entered upon his new work at St. Stephens, Rochester, N. Y. He has done faithful work for several years here.

Ridgeway: A handsome silk service flag has been given to the church and blessed by the rector, Archdeacon Radcliffe. The duplex system at last has been installed in this parish, after a four days' visit of the Provincial Field Secretary, the Rev. H. W. Stowell.

The rector of this parish quite recently preached an eight days' "Parochial Mission" for the Rev. F. T. Cady, rector of Trinity Church, Iroquois. At the request of Bishop Israel, seconded by six other Bishops of the Church and seven prominent clergymen, Grove City College, Penn., will confer upon Archdeacon Radcliffe, the degree of Doctor of Divinity, honoris causa, at their June commencement.

Southport: The rector, the Rev. W. E. Van Dyke, has taken foreign work under the Y. M. C. A. During his absence the Rev. E. H. Edson will be in charge. Mr. Edson will still retain his two mission stations, looking after them on week days.

LONG ISLAND.

Rt. Rev. F. Burgess, D. D., Bishop.

Services at Montauk.

Bishop Burgess and Dean Treder have arranged for the Rev. William Wilkinson, of Wall Street, to begin services at the air station at Montauk on broad lines, but Churchly and spiritual. Mr. Wilkinson has spent six Saturdays and Sundays out of the past seven weeks at the station. One Sunday has been supplied by the Rev. C. N. Morrow. It is hoped that the Rev. Mr. Bowen and his parish at Easthampton, being nearest to Montauk, may take supervision of the work. The officers and men show much interest in it. They have made a pulpit, and are making an altar. Mr. Wilkinson has given a Bible, Hymnal and Prayer Book for use of the Clergy, and has had given a good new piano, which will often be put to use at other times than in distinctly religious service.

INDIANAPOLIS.

Rt. Rev. Jos. M. Francis, D. D., Bishop.

Annual Council.

The eighty-first Annual Council of the Diocese of Indianapolis met in All Saints Cathedral, Indianapolis, May 14. Bishop Woodcock, of Kentucky, preached a sermon of power and appeal on the text, "Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself." After the service the Council organized by electing the Rev. J. D. Stanley Chairman pro tem. The main business of the Council was the ratification of the amended canons and constitution of the Diocese. Mr. Louis Howland, editor of the "Indianapolis News," read the Bishop's address, penned on a battlefield in France. The Council cabled greetings to Bishop Francis. The following elections were made: Standing Committee, the Rev. J. D. Stanley, Hon. Thomas Sullivan, the Rev. Lewis Brown, the Rev. William Burrows, Mr. Louis Howland, Mr. W. K. Hatt; Secretary of Council, Mr. W. W. Hammond; Provincial Synod, the Rev. Messrs. H. W. Wood, Wm. Burrows, W. R. Plummer and J. E. Sulger, and Messrs. J. S. Talbot, W. C. Mitchell, J. L. Rupe and T. L. Sullivan.

The Council passed a patriotic resolution pledging whole-hearted loyalty and service to the cause of democracy and humanity.

Following the Council a Diocesan dinner was held in Knickerbacker Hall in the interests of that institution. Addresses were made by Mrs. Edward Peck, the retiring President of the Woman's Auxiliary, who has been active in re-establishing Knickerbacker Hall. Mrs. Teegarden, matron of the Hall, also spoke, as did the Rev. George Burbanck, Chairman of the Social Service Commission of the Diocese. Dr. Lewis Brown was Chairman.

The annual meeting of the Woman's Auxiliary of the Diocese preceded the meeting of the Council. The Auxiliary Convention was one of the largest ever held here, and had the inspiration of a very impressive sermon by Bishop Woodcock, who had for his text, "Seek ye first the Kingdom" and "Go ye into all the world." The Bishop gave an address at a later session on the call and work of the Churchwoman.

NEW JERSEY.

Rt. Rev. Paul Matthews, D. D., Bishop

Annual Convention.

The one hundred and forty-seventh Convention in the one hundred and thirty-fourth year of the Church in the Diocese of New Jersey occurred in Trinity Church, Asbury Park, on Tuesday and Wednesday, May 14 and 15. It was a notable Convention in large attendance and quick dispatch of business. Bishop Matthews officiated at services and presided at business sessions throughout.

One successful feature was a joint session of the Convention, the Woman's Auxiliary, and the Girls' Friendly Society. Another was a Missionary Pageant enacted by people of Trinity Parish, Princeton.

Elections resulted in only minor changes, and appointments continued chiefly the existing committees and trustees.

The Bishop's annual address dealt comprehensively with local interests of the Diocese.

All trust funds, of which there are many in the Diocese, were reported in good condition.

In the matter of the recent effort at New Brunswick for religious unity, the Convention did not commit itself officially further than a resolution of approval of the Bishop's attitude in the matter.

An effort was made, but was defeated, to change the time of Convention from May to January.

The Committee on Constitution and Canons, co-operating with others to be appointed with them, is charged with the duty of a general revision of the constitution and canons.

A budget of expenses was adopted for the year, and appropriations were made for the various general Boards and commissions. It was decided to make the missionary apportionment for the Diocese $12,000 instead of $10,500, as last year.

The report of the Committee on the Church Pension Fund was an exhaustive one, revealing some present arrearage but with promise of the Diocese regularly meeting that obligation.

Church Club Meeting.

On Monday, May 13, the eve of the Annual Convention, the Church Club of the Diocese met at the Metropolitan Hotel, Asbury Park. The program of the evening comprised a business meeting and a dinner. The existing officers were continued for the present, and a committee was appointed for a thorough revision of the Constitution and By-Laws. The speakers at the dinner were the Bishop of the Diocese and Captain H. M. Hatcher, of the army transport service.

Christ Church, Toms River, the Rev. Charles H. Holmead, rector, has received a handsome silver chalice and paten in memory of Mr. Caleb Falkenburg, a former vestryman, and a processional cross in memory of Mrs. Laura Schureman, both presented by Mrs. Falkenburg.

An Extract From a Soldier's Letter.

"They say, who have come back from over there, that at night the troubled earth between the lines is carpeted with pain. They say that death rides whistling in every wind, and that the very mists are charged with awful torment. They say that of all things spent and squandered there young human life is held least dear. It is not the pleasantest prospect for those of us who yet can feel upon our lips the pressure of our mothers' good-bye kiss. . . . But, please God, our love of life is not so prized as love of right. In this renaissance of our country's valor, we who will edge the wedge of her assault make calm acceptance of its hazards. For us, the steel-swept trench, the stiffening cold—weariness, hardship, worse. For you, for whom we go, you millions safe at home—what for you? . . . We shall need food. We shall need care. We shall need clothes for our bodies and weapons for our hands. We shall need terribly and without failure supplies and equipment in a stream that is constant and never-ending. From you, who are our resource and reliance, who are the heart and hope of that humanity for which we smite and strive, must come these things."—Canadian Churchman.

Ordinations.

On the Feast of St. Philip and St. James, in St. Paul's Church, New Albany, Ind., Mr. James Reginald Mallett, a candidate of the Diocese of North Carolina, was ordained to the diaconate by the Rt. Rev. Joseph B. Cheshire, D. D., Bishop of North Carolina. The candidate was presented by his father, the Rev. Frank J. Mallett, rector of the parish, and the sermon was preached by the Rev. Lewis Brown, of Indianapolis. Other Clergy present were Dean R. L. McCready and Canon F. W. Hardy, of Christ Church Cathedral, Louisville, and the Rev. E. C. McAllister.

In the Church of the Incarnation, Great Falls, Montana, on Ascension Day, Mr. Claudius A. Ross was ordained to the diaconate and the Rev. J. Millard Nelson was advanced to the priesthood by Bishop Faber.

Deaths.

The Rev. Thomas B. Berry, D. D., warden of the DeLancey Divinity School, Geneva, N. Y., died at his home on the morning of Sunday, May 12. The burial service was held at the Church of the Good Shepherd, Buffalo, of which Dr. Berry was formerly rector, on Tuesday afternoon, interment being at Manlius, N. Y., on Wednesday afternoon.

Of all things on this earth, that over which parents may watch with bated breath, and friends must watch with wise caution, nay, that over which the great Christ tells us the angels of God linger to watch and hear, is the choice which a human being makes in the solemn hour of a life's decision. Toward what? Toward whom? And with whom? There is nothing more solemn in this world than the deciding choice of a human life.—Dr. J. H. Eccleston.

Christianity and the Community

Thy Kingdom Come on Earth

The adoption of the following resolution by the Annual Convention of the Diocese of Washington shows the trend toward a broader vision in Church circles:

"Resolved, That the Bishop of the Diocese appoint a committee of three, with Dr. Randolph H. McKim as chairman, to express to the Jewish Congress our sympathy with Judah's national aspirations, and to declare to the Congress that the Protestant Episcopal Church does not require Jews who accept Jesus as the Messiah to forsake the cherished love of Jewish family life, or to be disloyal to Jewish national duty and privilege, according to the mature decision of a General Convention of this Church."

Action was taken by the Diocesan Council of Virginia, recently in session, which if properly used may be the means of tapping great sources of spiritual power.

The Bishop in his annual message emphasized the importance of a more active co-operation of vestries with rectors in the spiritual affairs of the Church.

Acting upon this recommendation the canon relating to the duties of vestries was amended so as to read that vestries shall "use all earnestness in seeking with the rector to enlist new disciples for the congregation for Christ, and particularly as a body to meet, at the rector's appointment all persons desiring to be confirmed or to be transferred into the congregation, in order to express to such persons before their reception into the congregation what the vestries as lay readers of the congregation consider the duties and privileges of work and service for such prospective members of the fellowship to be."

This amendment, which is a decided innovation, was reported adversely from the Committee on Canons, brought out a very lively discussion before being finally adopted.

The encouraging feature of this debate was the active advocacy of the change by lay delegates.

One vestryman present said his present rector had been practicing this plan already, and he added modestly, but earnestly, "I do not know that anything I have ever said to those candidates for confirmation has ever helped them, but I do know that meeting those earnest young people about to take that solemn step and trying to tell them something of what it should mean to them, has helped me a great deal."

Another vestryman said emphatically, "The Episcopal Church has been standing on one leg too long. It is time for us to rest some weight on the lay leg and not leave the burden entirely to the clerical leg."

Such expressions emphasize the fact that in its desire to suppress emotionalism the laity of the Church have become almost spiritually dumb, and the old saying that the "Episcopal Church meddled neither with religion nor politics," has sometimes been pretty nearly true so far as our vestries were concerned. However a new day is dawning. Negative things cannot live in the strenuous atmosphere of the world today. Things must be positive or die.

Of course, rectors can allow this new canon to become a dead letter through disuse, and thereby let pass this splendid opportunity which has been given them to make our laity speak. We believe that most of the energetic Clergy will avail themselves of this new means to overcome the inarticulateness of our laymen.

It is true that in small vestries in rural districts and villages there may not be men who feel themselves qualified to speak of the deep spiritual feelings involved in confirmation and the preparation, but where is the vestry that cannot muster a spokesman who will at least say a few words of welcome to those who are coming to the Bishop to receive that solemn and Apostolic rite and to seek a home for their soul?

The very effort of producing and expressing suitable thoughts for such occasion will be a soul strengthening process of incalculable value.

In these days when the lure of the uniform is great, but we cannot all wear one, the following announcement is of special interest:

Social Work in War Time.

Richmond, Va.: The women of America are everywhere asking what they can do to help win the war. Few of them are able to go overseas. There is work to be done at home, however, which will afford many of them an opportunity to do their part. Among the most important of these lines of service open to women of special training is war-time social work. To enable women to qualify themselves in the briefest period of time for this war service at home the Department of Civilian Relief of the Red Cross and the School of Social Work and Public Health in Richmond have organized a Summer Course of six weeks in Emergency Social Service, which will begin June 24th.

War Creates New Social Problems.

Red Cross Home Service of Civilian Relief Work is one of the most important of the varied forms of social service which has arisen out of the war. The purpose of Home Service Work is to give service, assistance and encouragement to the families of soldiers and sailors who may be in need. This kind of work is of direct military value through its effect on the morale of the fighting troops. Soldiers worried about conditions at home and about the welfare of their families and friends are to the extent poorer soldiers. They have been attacked at their weakest point—their morale. To prevent this the Red Cross has developed this newest aspect of its work—Home Service.

The war has also increased the seriousness of the problem of juvenile delinquency. The Juvenile Court of Richmond and other large cities in the South and elsewhere report the need for more effective child welfare work if the war is to be made safe for childhood.

The development of protective work for girls as a result of the war has also given rise to an increasing demand for workers, especially in the South, where most of the cantonments are located and where adequate provisions for reformatory treatment of delinquent girls was not maintained before the war.

The great increase in the employment of women and girls since the war has given rise to another form of social work for girls—welfare work in munition factories and other industrial establishments making war supplies.

The problem of the health of the civil population during the war is also a serious one, especially in view of the large number of doctors called into military service from their regular work of caring for the health of the population at home. Workers are needed to assist in caring for the sick, but particularly to teach the principles of disease prevention, thus reducing the amount of sickness to be cared for by the doctors who remain and increasing the staying power of the nation.

Has Also Made Old Problems More Serious.

The war has also increased the seriousness of those social problems that existed before the war and which will remain with us long after the war is over. The combination of the creation of new problems and the increasing seriousness of the old has led during our first year of war to an unprecedented demand for social workers.

Plan Course of Training.

Courses will be offered in the summer course in: (1) Red Cross Home Service; (2) Juvenile Delinquency in War Time; (3) Protective Work for Girls; (4) Social Service in War Time, and (5) Technique of Social Case Work. The headquarters of the school will be in the Juvenile Court Building, 1112 Capitol Street, Richmond, Va. Full information will be sent upon request of the director, Dr. H. H. Hibbs, Jr., and of the Director of Civilian Relief of the Potomac Division of the Red Cross in Washington, D. C.

Pray Without Ceasing.

"Christ can give us life only when we abide in Him as the branch abides in the vine. But in order that we may do this, there are at least two conditions that we must fulfil. First, we must pray without ceasing. And this means much more than to be perpetually going to Christ for favors. It means that we have our daily season of spiritual fellowship with Him, that we go often to the quiet trysting place and commune with Him as friend and friend; for intimacy with Christ, like intimacy with our earthly friends, grows by association. But from the place of prayer we must go to the place of service. For it is written also: 'If ye keep My commandments, ye shall abide in My love; even as I have kept My Father's commandments, and abide in His love.'"

Trinity Sunday: The doctrine of the Trinity may be regarded from two distinct though related points of view. In technical theological language they are, respectively, the Ontological and the Economic Trinity. In other words, the one point of view is that of inherent and eternal distinctions within the Deity, while the other point of view is the Trinity of Divine manifestations, or God as Creator, Redeemer and Sanctifier. It is the former that is jealously guarded by theologians; it is the latter that is of interest to "the man in the street." Both are presented in the "Proper Prefaces" of the Communion Office. Moreover, when we are dealing with the threefold manifestations of Deity, as Father, Son and Holy Spirit; or Creator, Redeemer and Sanctifier; those manifestations may be simultaneous, as in the story of Creation and of the Baptism of our Lord; or they may be successive, as in history through which God reveals Himself.

But Trinity Sunday has another aspect which must not be ignored, and which, indeed, is the practical or pragmatic side of the Trinity of Manifestation; and that is, human regeneration (see Gospel for Trinity Sunday). From this point of view, Trinity Sunday is the Octave (and this is true both logically and in the actual development of the Church year) of Whitsunday. Nor must it be forgotten, although it too often is, that the whole Trinity season is the outcome of Whitsunday; being Redemption applied through the Holy Spirit; and (in the opinion of the present writer) ought to be named Sundays "after Whitsunday" instead of "after Trinity."

Now, for the lessons. The "acid test" of the Old Testament historical course may be said to come on Trinity Sunday. On Trinity Sunday of year 1, we had Joshua 8:30 to end; building (in the Promised Land) of an altar for worship of the true God and the reading of the covenant law that bound the people to their God. Worship belongs to the Ontological Trinity (cf. Epistle for Trinity Sunday; adoration of God as He is in Himself, while the Law is an appropriate reading for this Sunday viewed as Octave of Whitsunday, and stands for the idea of the obedience due from the Redeemed; fidelity to the law which our Lord came not to destroy but to fulfil. This second year brings us around (in the Old Testament historical course) to a corresponding situation: a renewal of the covenant of the law, but including a summary of history as the Trinity is a summary of doctrine; history, moreover, which exhibits the God of Creation, Redemption and Sanctification, in action (vs. 6, 9 and 20). More than this: in addition to the law, it expounds the idea of obedience in the Spirit which follows upon, or is designed to follow upon, Redemption; an idea which underlies the true but most inadequate statement, that "Doctrine occupies the first, and duty the second half of the Church year."

Other aspects of Trinity Sunday are provided for in the lessons which have not been referred to.

The lessons for next Sunday are keyed to the thought of the Collect, viz., evangelical obedience; a continuation of the line of thought already given us for Whitsunday and after.

Collect for Trinity Sunday.

Almighty and everlasting God, Who hast given unto us Thy servants grace, by the confession of a truth faith, to acknowledge the glory of the eternal Trinity, and in the power of the Divine Majesty to worship the Unity; We beseech Thee that Thou wouldst keep us steadfast in this faith, and evermore defend us from all adversities. Who livest and reignest, one God, world without end. Amen.

Note: Here Christ taught officially His ethical code. He developed the spiritual application of principles from the literal. In this He declared the progressive nature of the Kingdom, and rejecting the traditions of the fathers, He gave it principles of world-wide application. The Jews needed a fuller explanation of this (on account of their bondage to tradition), so St. Matthew's account is the longer. "A parable is a shell that keeps the good kernel for the diligent, and from the slothful."

Building Our Lives.

Some people seem to think that Jerusalem was built by men who desired a city, and said, "We will not build on a hill, because then it will be necessary to carry the stone and timber up. We will get a smooth, level country down in the valley, and there build a beautiful city, and we will have a temple in the midst of it, and then when it is done we will get together and pray, 'O Lord, we have built a city; we have built it in a plain, because it was easier; now, Lord, please lift up the ground and make a hill of it.'" So the Lord did it. Then they prayed, "Now, Lord, please pile the mountains around us for our defense." So the Lord did that also.

What are the facts? These people wanted a city, and they said, "It is best that this city should be on a hill. We will build where God has laid the foundation. It will be hard to get the stone up, hard to get the timber up; but we will do it." It makes all the difference in the world whether you lay your plans and ask God to prosper them, or give your life to God, and let Him make the plans, and they carry out His own plans. I fear that quite a proportion of the prayers of good people is really, "O Lord, my will be done." Did you pray this morning that God would bless you in something that you had made up your mind to do? You ought to have said, "Here, Lord, lies before me this strange, new day; I never saw it—nobody ever saw it. Here am I; what wilt Thou have me to do?" God will never move the mountains around a selfish man; you must put your house where God put the mountains before He put you into the world; put your life where God has put the plan and purpose of your life.—Alexander Mackenzie.

For the Southern Churchman. As It Was in the Beginning.

Just now, between the sunset and the dark,
Our streets were wan with twilight, till somewhere
A word went forth, and spark on magic spark,
And flower on flower of flame, bright-leaved and fair,
Burned answering in the air.

Then I forgot the city and its men.
My soul went groping back along the
night,
And standing on the brink of time again
Heard God say, in the gloom, Let there be Light!
And there was Light.

For the Southern Churchman. Doing Her "Bit."

Eugenie Du Maurier.

I make a habit of wandering through the shopping streets of the city where I live, for I like to give a cheery word to my friends who earn their livelihood in the stores. To-day I took my way across Lexington from Charles—the most interesting shopping district in the town. I was doing what I call "window shopping," and had stepped into the arcade-like entrance of one of those showy shops that put their wares on display for the enticement of just such susceptible passers-by as I. As I gazed admiringly at an attractive gown a voice at my elbow caused me to turn. A dear little gray-haired lady was standing close beside me; evidently she had spoken aloud almost unconsciously.

"Why, they have the wrong colors, haven't they?" She smiled and motioned toward the window.

"Yes," I responded to her mood. "And surely we should know how they go nowadays, should we not?" All along the two sides of the window there were worsted scarf decorations in groups—white, blue, red. "Perhaps the idea is that spectators look from the street in. But no, even then the colors would be seen out of the proper order."

"And that is not right," declared the little old lady. She tapped her forefinger positively on the glass, little twinkles of good-nature in her eyes. "It should always be red, white, blue—I think I should know!" There were no tears in her eyes; her face was almost cheery. But I am certain there were tears in her voice and heart.

"I am just from Camp Meade," she went on, "where hosts of the Maryland boys and some from Pennsylvania are encamped. My twin boys are there; they are all I have. They are—only twenty-one. I am a dressmaker, and my home is on the Eastern Shore."

A little, unpretentious figure, she stood there smiling, fairly glowing with heroic patriotism.

Two young girls rushed up to the window. "I'm crazy about those blouses!" one cried. "That blue is going to be mine if it takes my last cent."

The other professed a noisy preference for the purple, and they moved away chattering.

"I wonder if those girls know the significance of colors?" my companion mused. "Purple typifies suffering. God grant they may have only just enough to make them stronger in character—more serious about the business of life."

The little woman clasped and unclasped her small, black-gloved hands. She saw none of the hurrying metropolitan crowd, it was plain, and felt nothing unusual in addressing a stranger. She just wanted to talk things over with some one.

"I stayed near the camp two weeks," she said. "Oh, it was wonderful! It was very sad, too, sometimes, especially when I'd notice that a lad looked homesick. Their mothers were far away, you see. But they weren't giving in to the homesickness; don't think I mean that for a minute . . . On the trolley I met some young women who had left their husbands at the training camp; the husbands of two others had already gone to France. They were all cheerful, brave girls, and they were very kind to me. My sons—" She straightened with pride, and her eyes sparkled. "One is a lieutenant and the other a corporal. They are expecting to be sent 'over there' very soon, now. The woman with whom I boarded near the camp let me use her sewing machine, and I fixed up all their clothes. I told them to tell the other boys to bring their sewing to me. My, but I was kept busy, mothering boys!"

The voice of a prosperous looking stout woman broke in my friend's monologue. "I hate this late winter weather when spring don't seem to know whether to come with a bounce or crawl like a snail, don't you? Look at that lovely spotted skirt with the hip pockets!" The two moved off.

The gray-haired woman gazed curiously after them. "Why, I love this season!" she said. "I know my mother—she's very old—has been turning over the snow in the grass to force the crocuses; she does that every spring. It gives the sun a better chance to love them up into the light."

I drew closer to the healthy-minded little woman, conscious of a temptation to pat her on the back.

Her thoughts returned to the main topic of her soul. "They said, both my boys did, 'Now, mother, don't you worry. We're coming back!' They look on it as a grand trip—they are only twenty-one, you see. Their father loved beautiful France; we spent most of our honeymoon in Midi and Marseilles."

"Why, bless your heart," I cried, "I was born in Marseilles!"

Her face lighted afresh. "Oh! when were you there last?"

"When I was twelve. We were planning to go over the summer the war began. Since the fighting started I have lost an uncle, who was an officer in the Belgian army, and two French and three English soldier cousins."

She clasped both my hands. "You poor, dear child," she said. "But that makes all the more links to bind you to the eternal shores. And after all that sorrow, you can still smile?"

"You are smiling, too," I reminded her.

"So I am," she agreed. "My dear, we women who suffer most can smile the best, somehow. And why should we add, anyway, to the burdens of those around us? When I left my sons this morning I said, 'I would not shed a tear, and I have not. God is with them—and with you and me.'"

"Your boys will come back," I prophesied.

"If it is God's will," she answered.

"I am bound to be brave at home," she continued. "I live with my mother; she is feeble now, and she worries."

"The only thing for us stay-at-homes," said I, "is for each to do whatever she can to help. That and prayer."

The little lady nodded. She looked proudly at a Liberty Bond button on her coat lapel. "I bought a bond some months ago," she said, "and paid the last on it to-day. And sometimes I get a chance to go up to the Red Cross rooms and make bandages." She glanced at a clock in a jeweler's window. "I must hurry to my train!" she exclaimed.

I accompanied her to the station and we clasped hands warmly at the last. "Yours is a big 'bit,'" I said. "You have given your all to begin with. I envy you."

She waved a cheery good-bye. As the train pulled out her smile radiated a real benediction.

The Religion of Signs.

We smile indulgently when mention is made of the voodoo practices of certain African tribes and the "evil eye" of our Italian neighbors. Funny superstitions we name them, and so they surely are, but it might disconcert us if we could know in cold figures just how many practical, every-day American citizens are under the influence of superstitions just as funny and even more reprehensible. Indeed, it would be laughable if it were not a little sad to note how widespread is the serious belief in "signs"—signs of all kinds and descriptions, from the appearance of a comet in the heavens to the overturning of a salt cellar at the tea table.

Portents are as numerous and as significant all over this enlightened land as measles or mumps. That the comet and the salt cellar are obedient to hard and fast laws of nature means nothing to the believer in omens. Neither does he see that it would be a terrible sign indeed if the comet failed to arrive on schedule or if the salt cellar stayed right side up when it received a hard knock. All he understands is that the two things are signs, and bad signs, at that. It is a curious commentary on human nature, by the way, that there should be recognition of so few good signs.

One trouble about these ideas is that they grow on us so. A pet superstition that starts out as a mere imp of mischief develops after awhile into a regular bogie—a long-armed shape that lurks in the shadows and is likely at any time to reach out and touch its victim on the shoulder. And apparently the creatures are legion—everybody is familiar with a dozen or so of them. Perhaps the most familiar is the fear of Friday and of the number thirteen—particularly of the combination, though so far statistics have not proved that the universe is any more harassed on Friday the thirteenth than on any other date. What really does happen is that if a man breaks his bone on Friday the thirteenth he remembers the date for the rest of his life; if he breaks it on Saturday the fourteenth he remembers only the bone. Who has not seen a happy dinner party suddenly thrown into squawking confusion by the discovery that there are thirteen at the table? Mercy, one of them would be sure to die! So somebody is pushed off into the cold, at a side table—and the whole baker's dozen of them dies, sooner or later, but at any rate everybody is satisfied.

The long-armed bogie nearly always concerns himself with death—not so strangely, perhaps, since superstition is founded on fear, and the dread of death is the most common of all fears. There are in truth so many death signs that it is a wonder we are any of us alive. It is a sign of death to walk under a ladder, and almost immediate dissolution to have three lighted lamps in a room at the same time. If a bird flies into a sick room, watch the patient: if he dies—ah, the bird; if he recovers—ah, well! A dog howling under the window at night portends certain death—"to the dog," an irreverent scoffer interpolates, but that is beside the mark. A black cat can scarcely stir without perpetrating a "sign."

Omens and their meanings differ widely in different localities. In some neighborhoods, if a housewife is so criminally careless as to sweep dirt out of her door after sundown her bad luck is sealed. To suggest that the bad luck lies mainly in the task's having been postponed so long is merely to be disregarded. In other neighborhoods a caller never thinks of leaving the house through any door save the one by which she entered. To do otherwise would be as blatant a declaration of enmity as to have called with a loaded revolver in her hand, since to come in at the front and leave at the back or the side means sure calamity to the home. Then, there are districts where a woman caller on New Year's day is an almost unbearable insult—a belief strangely at variance with the custom obtaining in many other places, where the insult lies in the breach, not in the observance. One unkind omen, known everywhere, has to do with a maiden's stumbling up the steps—not that year need she hope to be married. Here the penalty seems so out of proportion to the offense that an outsider is moved to wonder. Another legend connected with marriage bears on the connection between the bride's marital happiness and the weather. Many a girl has plighted her troth red-eyed because of the rain. One cannot resist the reflection that to the poor groom her tears must have seemed far more ominous than the raindrops. But, "happy is the bride that the sun shines on." The sun did not shine—Ergo!

Always we have in our midst the knocker on wood. Knocking on wood, be it known, however, is not a sign, but a rite. It is a ceremony that must be observed directly on the heels of a boast, no matter how grateful and innocent the boast may be. "I have not had a cold all winter," an acquaintance confides to us, and immediately raps sharply on chair or table. If she happens to be standing in the middle of a wide field when she boasts, that makes no difference: wood must be found somewhere. Earth will not do; nothing but wood—else she will have a cold. The idea is that the knock (on wood) placates some power or other—heaven alone knows who, or why he should be so needlessly cross-grained. "I don't really believe it," the knocker says, meeting our astonished eye. "I just like to be on the safe side." That's the hallmark of the believer in signs: these people seldom confess to "really believing it." But they go on kotowing to their silly little gods and are quite satisfied with themselves and scornful of other people with other signs in their creeds. Meanwhile the observance grows into a habit and the habit into an obsession—and there they are.

Investigators tell us that many of these ideas have their origin far back among peoples who, not knowing the real God, made for themselves a sort of religion of fear. Which brings us to the sober side of the subject. In one aspect the cult of signs is laughable enough, but it has also a very serious aspect. It is more than a relic of barbarism—it is a form and a well-defined form of idolatry. In allowing ourselves to be governed by an unseen force for which we have no name, no explanation, and no warrant in Scripture nor even in common sense, we have, to a certain degree, set up a false god. The woman who says gratefully that she hasn't been ill for ten years and then whacks her knuckles on the wall instead of adding, "thank God," has virtually bent the knee to a heathenish little fetish of some sort, though no doubt she would be horrified to know it. She has behaved painfully like the poor ancient folk who ran around cutting themselves with stones in order to appease their angry divinity.

One encouraging thing about the sign habit, however, is the fact that it can be readily overcome when taken in time. A sign that is not noticed dies a natural death; it may die hard, but it cannot live on air. And after its departure life will be a lot easier in the living, for to take the future on trust without having it pointed out by a long-fingered black omen will prove a big relief. It will be a good sign for the world, indeed, when the last pet portent is relegated to the ash-heap, where it belongs.

For the Southern Churchman.
Familiar Hymns.

Holy, Holy, Holy, Lord God Almighty.

(A subscriber has requested that we republish in The Southern Churchman some of the old hymns that were omitted in the revision of the Church Hymnal. We shall be glad to do so from time to time, and also to append whenever possible an account of the author. Besides those selections requested the series will include some of the especially familiar hymns still in the Hymnal, likewise a few that are not officially listed by the Church, but that are known and sung the world over.)

Holy, Holy, Holy, Lord God Almighty.

Holy, Holy, Holy, Lord God Almighty!
Early in the morning our song shall rise to Thee:

Holy, Holy, Holy! merciful and mighty!
God in Three Persons, blessed Trinity!

Holy, Holy, Holy! All the saints adore Thee,

Casting down their golden crowns around the glassy sea;
Cherubim and seraphim falling down before Thee,

Which wert, and art, and evermore shall be.

Holy, Holy, Holy! though the darkness hide Thee,

Though the eye of sinful man Thy glory may not see,

Only Thou art holy; there is none beside Thee,

Perfect in power, in love, and purity.

Holy, Holy, Holy! Lord God Almighty!
All Thy works shall praise Thy Name in earth, and sky, and sea;

Holy, Holy, Holy! merciful and mighty!
God in Three Persons, blessed Trinity!

The above hymn is the great Trinity anthem of the Church. It was written by Reginald Heber, Bishop of Calcutta, who died nearly a century ago, but whose inspired hymns will live for many centuries more. Heber began to write in early childhood, and when a young man he won the Newdigate prize for his poem, Palestine, which he read aloud to the Poet Scott before he submitted it in the contest. From his youth India had a fascination for him, and after sixteen years of devoted service as the head of a parish in his native country he was consecrated Bishop of Calcutta. Most of his hymns, including the above, were written during his English pastorate.

"Holy, Holy, Holy, Lord God Almighty" is universally loved and sung, but to an Episcopalian it is the very spirit of the Trinity season embodied in song. It has been aptly described as "that majestic anthem modeled on the rhythm of the English Bible . . . a splendid metrical paraphrase of Rev. 4:8-11."

I Want Thee With Me.

Mary A. Harper.

I want Thee with me when the day begins,

All through the crowded hours of daylight's din,

To feel Thy presence and to do Thy will,
To hear Thee whisper low, My child, be still.

I want Thee with me when the evening comes,

When all the labor of the day is done,
My arms laid down at last, the victory won,

To hear Thee in the distance saying,
Come.

I want Thee with me in the dead of night,
When grim and darksome hours my soul would fright,

To lean upon Thee, in Thy strength my might,
Then to wake in Thy presence, Glorious Light!

Who's Who in Potatoes.

I sent an invitation to some thirty young people, asking them to meet at my house on a certain evening if they wished to know "Why." Their curiosity aroused, they all came! I had the rooms decorated with question marks, and a simple lunch ready. At table I announced my plan: that we organize ourselves into a club for study of the common things around us. I told them I had always wanted to know "the whys and wherefores" of the things we used every day, and suggested we find out together, having some good fun along with our study. Their response was enthusiastic. And when (to test out the "study" part of my plan) I picked up the salt cellar, then the pepper, then some glass, and asked questions about them, no one knew anything.

We named ourselves the "Want to Know Club." As our badge, we adopted the question mark. I was elected president, and at once arranged where we should meet next time. For our first subject I selected "Potatoes," giving out thirty topics on the potato, each member to study up and give us a little talk on his particular item. We also planned the supper for our potato meeting. It was to consist of nothing but potatoes, so we had to think hard. We decided to have them fried, baked, scalloped, made into cake, and used in so many different ways that, besides having fun over it, many of us learned how to use the common potato. Each member was to bring one potato item for the menu.

That potato evening was a great success. Clever decorations and place (Continued on page 19)

For the Southern Churchman. The Children on Memorial Day.

The flowers that we bring to-day,
Upon the quiet graves to lay
In fragrant armfuls, white and red,
Are for our soldier dead:
"Rest, soldier dead!" we say.

The flowers that we left to-day
Upon the hill, along the way,
Are for our living soldier men
When they come home again:
"Dear soldier men!" we say.

For the Southern Churchman. The Kitten That Stayed.

Mary Nelson Talbot.

The kittens' last name was Snow, because they were all so white and soft that they looked like flakes of snow. There were six of them, just the right number to go around among the Bond children. Somebody who didn't like cats had dropped them all near the Bond gate. Never had cats a more royal welcome.

"Now, first names!" cried practical Jack, as each child picked up a kitten.

"This one," said Pauline, gazing into the green eyes of the little cat she held, "couldn't be anything, to save its life, but Snowdrop. See, it's all white and green, just like my favorite flower."

"Mine's fat," chuckled Bob. "How would Snowball do?" The others, looking at the roly-roly kitten under the roly-poly arm, agreed that Snowball was a most suitable name for Bob's.

"And mine is Snowcream," Janie declared. "Because it's good enough to eat." Janie loved cats even better than she loved dolls, which was saying a great deal.

Jack decided that Snowdrift was the best name for his kitten, and they named the baby's pet Snowflake, because of the smallness of both kitten and owner. At length only one kitten remained nameless.

"Celia!" they all cried together. "How about yours, another snow word, you know?"

Little lame Celia looked up shyly. She had been so busy stroking the tiny white head in the crook of her elbow that she had not seemed to hear the talk. Already she had taken the kitten to her loving heart, name or no name. Celia had not walked for a long time, and a pet meant to her what games and frolics meant to other children. "Just Snowwhite, I think," she said, after a pause. "See, it's pure white; it's the only one of the family without a single tiny black spot anywhere."

"So it is!" the others cried, in chorus, as they gathered round her chair. Celia smiled and smoothed Snowwhite. Her little pale face among the other's ruddy faces looked like a white flower nodding in a bed of tulips.

Janie hummed a tune as she tied a blue ribbon around the furry neck of Snowcream. "She shall have a blue saucer, too," she planned.

Just then mother came in. "Dearies," she said, "I should have told you that we must pick out homes for all of the kittens but two. Choose a pair, now—which ever two you wish."

A silence fell. Everybody but the baby looked grieved; he only grabbed at his kitten's tail and made happy noises in his throat.

"We'll have to draw straws," they decided. So the straws were brought, and they drew anxiously. The lots fell to Janie and the baby. Then a shadow crept into the room. Pauline pouted a little; Jack put Snowdrift down rather hard, and walked away; Bob winked hard and hid his face in Snowball's neck. Snowflake and Snowcream, the fortunate pussies, stood on their hind legs and patted wildly at each other under a rocking chair.

Janie glanced at Celia. How should she take it? But Celia had learned a great deal about giving up pleasures. She looked up brightly, though her hand still smoothed Snowwhite's creamy head. "Now, for homes for the other Snows," she smiled. But, alas, before she knew it one big round tear squeezed through her lashes and dropped in the kitten's fur. She ducked her head so quickly that she thought nobody saw the tear, but she was mistaken.

Janie walked over to the window and stood quite still for a little while, looking out. When she turned back her face was quite determined. "I don't know what the rest of you think," she said, as she picked up Celia's kitten. "But I believe this is the kitten that ought to stay. It's the whitest, and the prettiest, and it has the sweetest face of all when you look at it real hard."

"I do believe it has," the others declared, gazing into the blue eyes of Snowwhite. Celia's face looked as though the sun were shining on it.

"Oh," she cried, "how lovely! And we'll make her a black velvet collar and put a silver bell on it."

"And she shall have music wherever she goes," laughed Janie. But it wasn't only Snowwhite that had music, after that; something sang on in Janie's heart long after the other kittens had gone.

Their Messenger.

Dick and Lula sat on the doorstep, and Guard lay at their feet, with his nose between his paws.

Dick heaved a sigh. "Lula," he said, "I'd rather have a sprained knee on the Fourth of July than on Memorial Day!"

"I wish that you had waited," answered his sister. "There! The last of the procession has gone round the bend!"

A year ago these two had marched with the slow throng that moved from the village to the cemetery. But now Dick could only hobble, and there was no one else to go with Lula.

The children sat and stared at their rosebush, which was crimson with velvet roses—the roses that Dick and Lula had watched from the time that they were tiny buds, and that they had hoped to see in full bloom on Memorial Day.

"Let's send Guard," said Lula, suddenly. "He'll go. Doesn't he go to drive home the cow from the field next the cemetery?"

Her brother listened a little doubtfully, but ten minutes later Lula, with basket and shears, was gathering the rich red blooms, while Dick sat with a tablet resting on his well knee, and wrote a message. Both had forgotten their disappointment.

Having heard his name, Guard knew that something would shortly be given him to do, and he rose now and stood by, alert and eager. They tied the note to his collar, and put the handle of the basket into his mouth.

"Go for the cow, Guard!" cried Dick, and he clapped his hands sharply, as he always did to start the dog on this errand. "You see," he added, to Lula, "it's not deceiving him, because he would go with the roses if he understood."

Guard's tail wagged violently, and his ears pricked up. Perhaps in his dog heart he wondered why Buttercup must be brought home at noon. He did not hesitate, however, but trotted away briskly, holding the handle firmly in his mouth. The children watched him go down the yard and along the road as far as they could see him. They knew that to reach the pasture he must pass by the procession, and they felt sure that some one would spy the note and read its message:

Dear Friend—Please take this dog's flowers and put them in the cemetery.
Dick and Lula Brown.

An hour they waited, two patient little figures in the sweet sunshine. Their rose-bush looked rather bare, but it waved happily. Mother, within the house, could hear the earnest hum of their talk.

"The crowd's coming back very early," said Lula, suddenly. "Look, what a dust!"

The cloud of dust came up the road rapidly, but began to clear away at their gate. Out of it two objects scampered. "Well!" Dick cried. "Guard and Buttercup!"

So it was—Buttercup in front, with her head down, angry at being forced from her grazing at such an hour; and behind her, trotting in dignified haste, came Guard, with the basket empty in his mouth.

"Oh," the children cried to each other, in concert, "do you s'pose he's lost our flowers and spent all his time bringing home that cow?"

Guard, after chasing the cow into her pen, walked pompously to the door-step and set down his burden. In the bottom of the basket lay a note.

The message was plainly printed so that Dick could read it without any trouble. It ran:

Dear Dick and Lula Brown—I read your letter addressed to "The Procession," and did what you asked. When the dog came past me again, driving a cow, I knew he was on his way home, and so I gave him the basket. I think that you have the most beautiful flowers and the smartest dog in the world.
A Friend.

"Good old Guard!" cried Dick, and Lula turned to hug the dusty messenger. But Guard, his duty done, was asleep on the cool grass; even his tail was as still as a mouse.—The Youth's Companion.

"I've Thought of Somebody."

I've thought of somebody—a man. He was at first a sinful man, and he went about persecuting the people of God, but one day, while he was taking a journey, he had a wonderful experience that changed his whole life. From that time on, also, we know him by another name. He grew to be one of God's greatest preachers and most useful servant. After he became a good man he had many trials and afflictions to bear—scourgings, stonings, shipwrecks, hunger, cold and other hardships. History tells us that he met his death by being beheaded at the hands of a wicked king.

Who is the man?

Answer to last week's questions: Naaman. 1. The little girl told him of the prophet in her country who could heal his leprosy. 2. Samuel.

Mother's Little Helper.

Mother's little helper, time to get up, dear!

Birds are wide awake now, ready for the day;

Much is waiting you, many things to do—
Hours of willing service, hours of merry play.

Wash and dress and hurry—set the table, please;

Feed the hungry chickens, ring the breakfast bell;

Help amuse the baby, run an errand, maybe—

Here a duty, there a duty, all done well.

Mother's little helper, time to go to bed.
Birds have cuddled in their nests, busy bees are still;

Surely it is best hands and feet should rest
When the tired daylight creeps across the hill.

All the steps you've saved, dear, all the tasks you've done.

Soft the angels write them in the books they keep;

Work and love and play made a happy day—

Mother's little helper, sleep a happy sleep!

Four Rules.

He was a new boy in school, and according to custom—though nobody seemed to know when or why such a custom started—the others were teasing him and trying to make him uncomfortable. They did not succeed very well, for Don did not appear to notice their efforts. When the school hours ended, however, and the pupils scattered for the homeward walk, there was a fine chance.

"Here, you little softy-boy!" cried Archie, catching up with the newcomer at the end of the brick wall, "what are you hurrying off so fast for? For three cents I'd throw your book so far you'd never find it, and roll you clear down that hill."

"I wouldn't pay you three cents for throwing my book where I couldn't find it," laughed Don, "and I don't mind you rolling me downhill if you want to. It looks so smooth and green I'd like to roll down it, anyway. Come on, boys. Let's see who can roll down the fastest."

And before they quite knew how it came about, Don and Archie, with the two boys who had stopped to see what would happen, were having the merriest sort of game. Of course, Don did not stay a new boy for very many days. He was so good-natured that it wasn't easy to tease him, and so full of fun that everybody liked him, but Archie—who really liked him best of all, because they went home the same way and were together so much—always noticed how Don managed to laugh himself out of quarrels, and had a suspicion that his friend was something of a coward.

"I don't b'lieve you'd fight a rabbit," he said, tauntingly.

"Of course not. 'Twouldn't be a fair fight," laughed Don.

Archie himself was so fond of teasing that he often forgot to think anything about what was fair or kind. That was the way in which he was tormenting a little German girl one day when he met her upon the road with a kitten in her arms.

"Here, I want that cat! Give it to me," he demanded. "Hand it over right away, little girl."

"No, it is mine. I home take it," urged the small Bertha, her blue eyes frightened and filling with tears.

"Ho, this isn't a Dutch cat!" declared Archie. "Here, let me have it."

He was drawing it out of her arms, while she struggled and tried to hold it fast, when suddenly he received a push so violent and unexpected that it knocked him over. Somebody promptly sat down upon him, while Don's voice, still good-natured, said:

"Run along with your kitten, sissy. This fellow doesn't want it, and he's so tired that he's going to lie still and rest awhile."

"Aw, get off. What did you do that for?" growled Archie, wriggling to throw off his burden.

"You can have three guesses—if you need 'em," answered Don. "If that had been your sister Esther and you had seen any boy plaguing her, what would you have done?"

"Punch him," admitted Archie, honestly.

"Well, punch yourself, then," said Don, rolling off and giving him a chance to get up.

Archie sat up, brushed the dust from his clothes and looked with a new curiosity and respect at the other small boy.

"Say, Don, I don't believe you really are afraid, after all," he said. "What makes you always act as if—as if—"

Don's brown eyes grew bright.

"It's my grandfather," he explained.

"He's the bravest man I know, and he told me. He was a soldier and an officer, and he says there are four rules for courage: 'A laugh is a better weapon than cross words or fists. Don't think it is brave to quarrel and fight. Never strike unless you have to. Don't stand by and see some one smaller and weaker than yourself be abused.'"

"Humph!" answered Archie—if that could be called an answer—and he walked away thoughtfully.—Kate W. Hamilton, in Christian Standard.

Pleasant Alice Bird.

Fannie H. Davisson, Crawford, W. Va.,
Aged 12.

"Oh, mother," said Alice Bird, "I do wish the girls wouldn't call me Stuff! I know I'm large, but it isn't very pleasant to hear, 'Hello, Stuff!' and turn to find that they mean me. I wish they wouldn't."

"Dear child," her mother answered, "you have many blessings, remember—good health, a good home and a great deal to make you happy. Think of all this when the girls call you by the unpleasant name. Try to smile and answer sweetly. Then, I am sure, your nickname will soon be changed."

Alice looked doubtful. "But, mother, I've just thought of a name for Mary Field. She always calls me Stuff, yet she is so tiny that she is funny looking herself."

"It would be easy to pick out a nice name for Mary," said Mrs. Bird. "Will she like the one you have for her? If it is a nice one that will be returning good for evil."

"I meant an unpleasant name," Alice said. "One that will make her feel sorry that she called me what she did. But I will not give it to her, mother, if you say so." She rose from her chair and started to the door. "I must go and dress now."

Next morning she felt happier as she started to school. She had not not walked far when she heard some one call, "Stuffy, wait a minute." She did not reply, but walked on. A minute later Mary Field was by her side. Alice was strongly tempted to say, "Hello, Shrimp!" but she thought of her mother and said instead, "This is a fine day, isn't it, Mary?"

"Yes," Mary answered, "but I had to run so fast to overtake you that I am tired. We have plenty of time; let's walk slowly."

"All right," Alice agreed with a smile.

At school she greeted all the girls pleasantly, and was surprised to see how fast the day flew and how soon she was home again. For several weeks after that she tried the plan of being bright and sunny in her manner.

"Why, Stuffy, you are getting thin," Mary Field remarked one morning as they walked to school. "I think we'll have to change your name to something that suits you better. What will it be? I'll ask the other girls about it. You have been to school with me every day for a month, did you know it?"

"No, I didn't," Alice smiled.

That evening a very happy little girl ran upstairs to her mother's room.

"Mother, mother," she cried, "your plan worked, for my name has been changed, sure enough! Can you guess what it is now?"

"Don't try to make me guess," her mother replied, as she put her arms around her.

"Pleasant Alice Bird!" the little girl cried. "And, oh, mother, you did it all! Do I deserve that lovely name? Tell me quick!"

Her mother thought, and she said so, that there never was a girl who deserved such a name more than Pleasant Alice Bird.

"God Bless My Brother."

Now I lay me down to sleep,
I pray Thee, Lord, my soul to keep.
God bless my brother gone to war,
Across the seas, in France, so far.
Oh, may his fight for Liberty
Save millions more than little me
From cruel fates or ruthless blast
And bring him safely home at last.

The idea expressed in the above paraphrase of this familiar prayer, is that of the plea made by a little girl whose brother is fighting in France. It would be a wonderful thing if all the little brothers and sisters of American men "across the seas in France" were taught to pray, "God bless my brother gone to war." It would be just the moral backing needed for those who are saving their pennies and investing them in War Thrift Stamps and thus helping those brothers "save millions more than little me."

A Game You May Not Know.

The game of mountain climbing may be played in city or country, at the seashore or mountains, by any number of children. The players all stand in line, and the first one begins the game by acting out the first event in the climb, at the same time telling what he is doing. Thus he may say: "First, we cross a brook," and illustrate it by jumping as if there was a brook to go over. The second player repeats both the words and action of the first player and adds a new action, perhaps, for instance, going under some bushes, stooping and shielding his face. The third child repeats the acts of the first two players and adds still another of his own invention. Thus the game goes on until the last player in the row is reached. After repeating the words and actions of the previous players he says: "And now I'm at the top of the mountain," and waves his arms. This is a signal for the other players to give chase to him, and he is pursued by all the mountain climbers until he is caught. cards (with jingles), stuck in potatoes, showed originality and imagination. We gave our talks while at the table, each one rising. It was all good fun and very informal. I started the ball rolling by giving a history of the potato bug, passing around some colored drawings. Then we had the origin of the potato, which brought in quite a bit of history; then the countries where grown; the various kinds of potato; the keeping qualities; the cultivation and handling of the various kinds, and the transportation problem. The remarks made by a young fellow about seventeen on the transportation of potatoes were wonderful.

This potato meeting was followed by an "orange" evening, and at Easter time an "egg" evening. The subjects Incurable.

Mrs. H. was an incurable grumbler. Her pastor thought he had found something about which she could not complain; the old lady's crop of potatoes was certainly the finest for miles around. "Ah, you must be well pleased," he said, beaming as he met her. "Every one's saying how splendid your potatoes are this year." The old lady glowered at him as she answered: "They're not so poor. But where's the bad ones for the pigs?"—Answers.

Count One.

An atom fills its place
A universe of worlds
Would miss its tiny place.

Each human life counts one:
Each word and deed records
The good or ill we've done.

Not to the swift the race,
Nor even to the strong;
But to the child of grace.

The power of God is thine,
To take by faith and prove
An agency divine.

For sorrow, comfort sweet,
For every weakness strength,
For victory complete.

Take Him and then count one.
With Him fill well thy place,
And hear His sweet "well done."

MRS. WM. S. LEWIS.

Entered into life eternal at the residence of her daughter, Mrs. W. C. Shackelford, May 3, 1918, MRS. FRANCES CAMPBELL LEWIS, widow of the late William S. Lewis, of Albemarle, in the eighty-eighth year of her age.

In the death of Mrs. Lewis her children have lost a loving, sympathizing mother, and her friends the inspiration of a true and loyal heart, whose watch-word was "Duty" and whose life work was "Helpfulness." Hers was a useful life, a devoted life, an earnest Christian life, and Paradise seems nearer to us since she has attained the glorious immortality of Christ's faithful servants where she awaits the coming of her loved ones.

"We bless Thy Holy Name for all Thy servants departed this life in Thy faith and fear, beseeching Thee to give us grace so to follow their good examples that with them we may be partakers of Thy heavenly kingdom."

Mrs. Lewis is survived by five children—Mrs. E. R. Mays, Afton, Va.; Mrs. F. K. Page, Cobham, Va.; Mrs. E. P. Kellam, Atlanta, Ga.; Mrs. W. C. Shackelford, Stony Point, Va.; Arthur S. Lewis, Lexington, Ky.

COL. CARY BRECKENRIDGE.

Died at his home in Fincastle, Va., on May 11, 1918, COL. CARY BRECKENRIDGE, in his seventy-ninth year. Col. Breckenridge was the son of Capt. Cary Breckenridge and Emma Walker Gilmer, and was born at "Grove Hill," Botetourt County, Va., that fine old estate where his ancestors had lived and dispensed a generous hospitality for generations, and from which the Kentucky branch of the family migrated. He was graduated from the Virginia Military Institute, and at the outbreak of the Civil War enlisted as a private; he rose rapidly to colonel of the Second Virginia Cavalry, served through the entire war, having five horses shot under him and being three times wounded. In the last days of the struggle he was promoted to brigadier-general, but never having borne that title on the field of battle, never claimed it. A member of the Episcopal Church, he was as a man kind, gentle, modest, high minded, of uncompromising integrity and lived above reproach, and as a neighbor who knew him well remarked on learning of his death, "There wasn't a spot on him." His fine commanding presence attracted attention in any company and proclaimed him the product of a time that has gone. The environment of his day contributed to a nobleness of mind that coming generations may find it difficult to emulate, but must always revere. Physically a giant, he was otherwise superb, and as a soldier he was the peer of any. He was truly of heroic mould, one of those magnificent characters that a kind Providence sometimes lends to us as an inspiration.

IN MEMORIAM.

CATHERINE GIFFORD SKELTON, widow of Thomas Norman Jones, passed from the home of her son Thomas Norman Jones, Norfolk, Va., into the home of her Father, not made with hands, eternal in the heavens, prepared for His children, among whom this beautiful character was early recognized as a member of Christ, a child of God, an inheritor of the kingdom of heaven. Her soul was full of music attuned to the harmonies sung by raptured saints above. Now, even through tears for their loss, all who loved her can give thanks for her joyful reunion where "the saints of all ages in harmony meet, their Saviour and brethren transported to greet." She graced the sphere of womanhood as daughter, wife, mother, grandmother, and in her living influence will be an inspiration, not only to her children, who rise up and call her blessed, but to all who came within the glow of her sublime faith, triumphant over all trial.

Born in 1850 at "Paxton," Powhatan County, Va., the home of her parents, Dr. John Gifford Skelton and his wife, Marianne Old Meade, entered life eternal April 10, 1918.

On Growing Old.

There are few men or women who like to see the grey hairs appear upon themselves. We may talk eloquently enough about the beauty of the silvery locks, but we usually appreciate them much more upon others than we do upon ourselves. And yet it is useless to worry over the signs of advancing years, for growing old is both natural and inevitable. And as it has undoubtedly disadvantages, so also it has undoubtedly compensations. We may lose some of the joys of youth, but we may gain other joys which will at least counterbalance our loss. To grow old is not necessarily to grow either useless or unhappy.

One thing at least years bring to us—the enormous advantage of a varied experience. Youth suffers often from misplaced confidence. We accept things at their face value, and some of our bitterest disappointments result from the realization that "things are not what they seem." Age makes us more cautious and it should make us better judges of human nature. We avoid many of the pitfalls of youth because we have learned to detect them. And we have learned that our fears also are not to be trusted, and this means much added peace. Youth is excitable and apprehensive, and many young folks have at least a dozen different diseases every year. In the years when nature is making great drains upon us in perfecting physical manhood and womanhood, we pass through strange experiences, which not seldom cause hours of keen anxiety. There is probably nothing very much the matter with us, but we think there is, and we suffer accordingly. To outgrow this stage is surely an advantage. Age has its own alarms, but it has had so many that they no longer excite the same keen apprehension. Age makes for peace and comfort.

But it has also its disadvantages and its own peculiar temptations. One of these is unfortunately too common even amongst good people; we refer to the development of the dictatorial spirit. The very fact that we have had a wide experience sometimes leads us to adopt a "wiser than thou" attitude, and in our dealings with others, especially if they are younger, we are inclined to insist upon having our own way. Of course, these young people mean well, but they will know better when they get older, and, therefore, we have no right to ride roughshod over all their arguments and plans. This is a blunder which is often made; but for it the blunderer pays dearly, sometimes in the open opposition of the young, but oftener in a silent breach between him and them which widens continually.

Age has the advantage of experience, and this very experience should warn it from the rock upon which age is too often wrecked. The dictator is not welcomed even if his hair be silver.

And age sometimes becomes pessimistic. The young folks are not as serious as they were years ago. They are light and trifling, devoid of respect for old age, lacking in love for parents, wasting their time in novel reading and such diversions and even in church work they are not measuring up to the years of the past. This is the doleful cry of not a few good people who are hopelessly out of touch with the young life of to-day. And others, who will not admit for a moment that they are pessimistic, cannot hide the fact that they have but small faith in the youth of our age. Now if the indictment of the pessimist be true, we have nothing to gain by denying it; but if it be only half the truth, we have much to lose by forgetting the other and brighter side. In any case it is well to remember that the same complaints concerning the young were made by age thousands of years ago. It is natural for age to see the dark side, and the tendency should be steadily resisted.

Age should bring sunlight and sympathy. As we get nearer the heavenly land we should see more of its glory and reflect more of its light. Why should the milk of human nature sour by the time one is forty? This seems absolutely inexcusable in a Christian man or woman. And yet in many a home the fact that father, or mother, or both, dwell in Grumble Alley is very much in evidence. In such cases the type of religion is evidently very low, and an increase of faith and love is an urgent necessity.

And age should be sympathetic. Why should men and women find such bitter fault with youthful mistakes? The boy is probably very much like what his father was thirty years ago, and the girl is probably not so much different to her mother at the same age. Youth means well and needs all our sympathy and all our help. And yet sometimes fathers and mothers have not half the sympathy for their own children which a good stranger will show. The trouble is not that the parents are growing old, but that they are growing narrow. This is one of the faults which is often associated with years, but there is no necessary connection.

But what will prevent age from becoming pessimistic, and arbitrary, and narrow? We think the religion of Jesus Christ will do it, if we will allow it to have its way with us. It isn't too much religion which makes the chasm between youth and age. It is rather too little religion, or religion of the wrong type. If grey hairs are increasing, and along with them you are finding it harder and harder to get along with the young people, better get a little nearer your Lord!—Christian Guardian.

The Outlook and the Uplook.

"When the outlook is dark, try the uplook."

These words hold a message of cheer; Be glad while repeating them over,
And smile when the shadows appear.
Above and beyond stands the Master.
He sees what we do for His sake;
He never will fail nor forsake us,
He knoweth the way that we take.

"When the outlook is dark, try the uplook"—

The uplook of faith and good cheer;
The love of the Father surrounds us,
He knows when the shadows are near.

Be brave, then, and keep the eyes lifted,
And smile on the dreariest day;
His smile will glow in the darkness;
His light will illumine the way.

The Bishop of Fredericton On the Canadian Chaplains' Service.

In his annual charge to the Synod of Fredericton, on April 9, Bishop Richardson, who has just returned from a trip to the Front, spoke of the Canadian chaplains' service as follows: "I desire to express my deep conviction that the work being done by the chaplains is of such a character that it deserves the very best that the Church can give to it in the way of support and sympathy. I have had an unhindered opportunity of examining the chaplains' services, not less closely in regard to its personnel than in regard to its ordered workings, and it is at once a duty and a privilege to say that I have come home with nothing but respect and admiration for it. In the director, Colonel Almond, the Church has a splendid representative and one of whom we may well feel proud. By a statesmanlike policy, by patient perseverance, and by untiring energy, he has succeeded in placing the service upon a footing that leaves little to be desired. I wish, further, to pay a tribute of sincere respect to the able men whom he has gathered round him on his staff. Representing as they do, various religious bodies, and widely differing in theological convictions, they are giving to the director a loyal and sympathetic support in a work of vast importance and great difficulty. It is only right also that I should say how profoundly I have been impressed with the calibre and character of the chaplains as a whole. From every quarter there have come to me the most enthusiastic commendations of their work, whilst from the beginning to the end of my tour I did not hear one word of adverse criticism. To quote from a statement made to me by one of the army commanders, "By sheer hard work the chaplains have made themselves an indispensable factor in the fighting efficiency of the army." The Church may rest assured that its interests are being admirably served by the Clergy who have gone overseas to do this important work."—Exchange.

The French Spirit.

As illustrating the spirit displayed by the people of Paris even in the midst of want, a story is told by an American just returned of a French woman who gave a dinner to some American officers. After the dinner they were loud in their praises of the manner in which it was served and of the excellence and liberality of the service. They felt that if such a meal could be served in the fourth year of the war, France could not be in such bad stead. They did not learn until later, through some mutual friends, that this Frenchwoman had given up to her guests on that one night her full supply for a week.

One thing we are learning is that psychology is having its part in winning the war. Morale is often mentioned along with food, men and munitions as necessary to a campaign. A part of the French psychology is that they shall never permit themselves to appear "down at the heels." When they do so, then indeed they will have lost something of the spirit that is carrying them on to victory.

It is for us in America to understand and venerate this spirit. It has kept France in the trenches for three and a half years and has made the world safer for Americans. Above everything, we must not confuse their courage with prodigality. France as a whole is in a desperately dangerous condition as to food. It will take all of America's aid to keep her from crossing the danger line. And France knows it and is economizing all she can. But she refuses to put on a doleful countenance. She would rather be heroic with a smile.—Exchange.

Guard Your Friendships.

Friendship is worth taking a deal of trouble about. We should remember the apostle's command: "Hold fast that which is good." Thoreau said: "The only danger in friendship is that it will end." Correspondence and conversation and social courtesies are the ways in which we throw guards around our friendships lest they end. A boy or girl who loses a friend for want of a letter now and then is like a man who loses his money for lack of a pocketbook. He is losing a very precious thing for lack of a very little expense and trouble. How carefully Jesus selected the close circle of his friends! And how watchfully he guarded their mutual friendship after he had selected them! The friend who sticketh closer than a brother is always one who has taken some trouble in the matter of his friendships. Let us be careful that we do not go through life with holes in our pockets through which our friendships slip.—The Way.

To-day is your day and mine, the only day we have, the day in which we play our part. What our part may signify in the great whole we may not understand; but we are here to play it, and now is our time. This we know; it is a part of action, not of whining; it is a part of love, not

HOW SHIVAR MINERAL WATER RELIEVES RHEUMATISM.

According to the standard medical books, Rheumatism is not a germ disease but is the result of imperfect nutrition. The food is either imperfectly digested or imperfectly assimilated. Poisons accumulate and these irritate and inflame the delicate linings of the joints, the heart and other organs. To cure rheumatism it is therefore necessary to stop the formation of these poisons and get rid of those already formed.

The celebrated Shivar Mineral Water acts on the stomach and kidneys it corrects the digestion and washes out the poisons through the kidneys. This is the opinion of physicians who prescribe it. If you suffer with rheumatism, dyspepsia, indigestion, gall stones, disease of the kidneys, bladder or liver, uric acid poisoning, or any condition due to impure blood, read the following letter, then sign it, enclose the amount and mail it. Only two out of a hundred, on the average, report no benefit.

Thoughts For the Thoughtful

No religion can do us any good that does not make us try to do good to others.

It is not in what we are to Christ, but in what Christ is to us, that our rest and security lie.

When we are alone we have our thoughts to watch; in the family our tempers; in company our tongues.

If Jesus is right in His teaching about the Divine Fatherhood, immortality follows as a matter of course.

Applaud us when we run, console us when we fall, cheer us when we recover, but let us pass on—for God's sake—let us pass on!—Burke.

Ask yourself whether you are happy and you cease to be so; the only chance is to treat not happiness, but some external to it, as the purpose of life.—
Carlyle.

One smile can glorify a day.

One word true hope impart.

The least Disciple need not say,

"There are no alms to give away,"

If love be in the heart.

Enthusiasm is the thing which makes the world go round. Without its driving power nothing worth doing has ever been done. Love, friendship, religion, altruism, devotion to career or hobby—all these, and most of the other good things in life, are forms of enthusiasm.

The secret of success lies in embracing every opportunity of seeking high and right ends, and in never forgetting the Golden Rule of Catechism, "Doing your duty in that station of life to which it shall please God to call you."—Duke of Wellington.

If any little love of mine
May make a life the sweeter.

If any little care of mine
May make a friend's the fleetier,

If any lift of mine may ease
The burden of another

God give me love, and care, and strength,

To help a toiling brother.

The test of the profession of knowing God is in doing His will. It is not only the test, it is the way in which to have profession verified by the Spirit in the inner life, the way in which the Spirit bears witness with our spirit that we are the children of God. There can be no assurance of sonship apart from an obedient walk with God.—Daily Bible.

Life to me is as a station

Wherein, apart, a traveler stands—
One absent long from home and nation,
In other lands—

And I, as he who waits and listens,
Amid the twilight's chill and gloom,
To hear, approaching in the distance,
The train for home.

the embroiderer, instead of being interwoven with the stuff so as to become a part of it. Mere outward decorum and religious decency are not what God requires, though they are often, alas! what is presented to Him in lieu of the beauties of holiness. It is easy to assume the character of God's people, to imitate their manners, to use their language, to conform to their habits. It is easier to paint a flower

A Prayer.

Unfold my life, from hour to hour,
Like the blooming of a flower,
Of each deed a petal make,
Fair and fragrant, for Thy sake,
Of the thoughts within my brain,
Nursed by nature's joy and pain,
Living pistils, that shall bear
Fruit for God from year to year.

Of grief and thwarting—ay, of them
Make a straight yet pliant stem.
Of my soul, strong, struggling roots,
Sending the life-seeking shoots
Daily deeper in the sod
Of the boundless love of God.

And when blooming time is done,
And the petals, one by one,

Drop away,
O may the seeds,
Born of lovely thoughts and deeds,
Wafted by Thy Spirit's breath,
Warmed upon Thy heart beneath,
Spring to life and nobly bear,
Fruit for God from year to year.

And the old roots left alone
When the blooming time is done;
Let them bide still in the sod
Of the boundless love of God;
Waiting for the spring to come,
To arise in fairer bloom.

If We But Knew.

If we but knew that through the closing door
Some one we love would enter never-more,
Would we not hasten with our richest store?

If we but knew!

If we but knew that from the market-
Soon we should miss some kind, familiar face,
Would our cold greetings not be touched with grace?

If we but knew!

Dear Jesus, patient, understanding,
kind,
We are Thy lost sheep in a winter wind,
Forgive us that we are so wilful, blind!
Teach us to know!

—Annie S. Swan, in British Weekly.

Disappointment.

Someone has aptly said that "Disappointment is the grandmother of reflection," and that is only a quaint way of putting what we recognize at a second glance as a familiar truth. For, while the first result of a disappointment is likely to be sorrowful complaints and perhaps tears, a little sober afterthought often convinces us that the experience has a brighter as well as a darker side. Sometimes reflection shows us that we have been making a mountain out of a mole-hill, and that the trifle we missed was not worth making ourselves unhappy about. Sometimes, we even see that what we sought was "better lost than won," and that the disappointment we wept over was really a blessing in disguise. God's greater plan for us, and for all things, is, so to speak, outside our little plans, and it is always working forward to fulfilment. Reflection may help us to understand that our failure was a concession to the success of God's wiser purpose, and that, in itself, ought to content us, for all God's plans are the deep laid schemes of a Loving Father for our highest good. But the most useful discipline of disappointment is to show us our own shortcomings. Perhaps our methods have been crude and faulty, perhaps we have not put our whole heart into the task before us. Nobody with a resolute spirit accepts failure tamely, and a bitter disappointment not infrequently paves the way to more successful effort.—East and West.

Why do the faces of some whom we have met on life's journey shine like beacon lights to guide us on our way?

I think it is because their eyes are truly windows of the soul, through which shine out the beams of faith and joy. Their faith and their joy are the stronger for their passing, and would fain linger in their presence.

What is this wondrous influence they possess? It is the love of Christ constraining them to make known to others the joy and peace with which their own hearts are filled. Christians such as these are the backbone of the spiritual life of a parish. They have wrestled long in prayer, they have suffered and agonized on many a hard-fought field, but they have not despaired or yielded.

It is not easy to talk of spiritual things, but those of whom we are thinking are always forgetful of self and eager to share their joy with others. They are, indeed, showing forth God's praise not only with their lips but in their lives. They miss no opportunity of doing loving service to their fellow-men. They speak comfort and cheer to the doubting heart and the sorrowful soul. They hold out loving hands to the weary and heavy-laden. Above all, they pray without ceasing.—Parish Leaflet.

The dullest man has in him something original. It is sin.—Ex.

Church Year Sermons for Children

By PHILLIPS E. OSGOOD

Contains fifty-six live talks on topics suited to the Church Year, as well as for special occasions. Arranged as sermons with texts, which can also be used as talks to children. The book is not only for the clergy, but is just as suitable to read to the children at home. Illustrations from sketches by the author.

"No better book of sermons to children has ever come to the notice of the present reviewer than this. In its imaginative understanding of the child's instinctive interests, in the remarkable skill with which its subjects are arranged to follow the beautiful lessons of the Church Year, and in the convenience of its typographical arrangement, the book is equally admirable. The illustrations, sketched by Mr. Osgood himself, are quite as fascinating as the text."—From a review in the Southern Churchman, written by W. Russell Bowie, D. Changes That Will Come.

The great war means a change in the life and thinking of the world which very few appreciate and are willing to accept, and it means great changes in the Church in ways of thinking and teaching and methods of work. We are leaving behind many controversies and discussions which occupied large time in the lives of those who went before us and in the lives of some of us when we were younger. There ought to be and will be no break with the eternal principles and the Gospel of Jesus Christ and with the great fundamental truths of religion or with the purpose for which our blessed Lord established His Church. But much that we have valued and thought of perpetual significance has gone forever and the Church must set itself in a new way to do its work for a new world and to make over that world into a better world than that which has gone. The Church must cease to spend time upon unimportant things. The great truths must be emphasized. To millions of our young men what is real in life is presented as never before. All men are thinking of the real things, such as immortality, the relation of this life to the next, the things best worth doing now. And the Church must have a message for them, and leadership. There has been something unchristian in the industrial, political and social order which we have accepted and of which we have been proud. Many intelligent business men are taking an entirely new attitude as regards organized labor, for example, and there ought to be thankful recognition of it. It is not a time for the Church to develop ecclesiasticism, but great plans of service; not for the Church to think of itself, but to think of its mission to the world, accepting the Master's teaching and example in giving its life that it may save its life. Christianity and Christian teaching have been covered up and obscured by much that is unmeaning and has scant relation to human life, and it is a time to get at what is real, to be learned from the example and teaching of the Master Himself and from the experience of the Church, through the ages gone. We are to believe that the spirit of God will come to us as truly as on the day of Pentecost and guide us, if only we are prepared to receive Him and to accept His guidance. The power to work miracles is only lost with the loss of the presence of the Spirit of God. Be not offended because changes must come and things which we have counted irregular will be done. Timid counsels never make large achievement. The restoration of what some people call discipline and mourn for is an idle dream. The Church needs not so much restrictive legislation as it needs being set free to do its work. True prophets have never been very amenable to discipline. Large liberty is the condition of a large ministry. Authority must be largely found in the minds and hearts of right minded men and women who are willing to sacrifice their opinions and prejudices that the work of God may go forward, although not in their way.

In new ways God is speaking to the hearts of men, calling them to give up many prejudices, to accept new visions and hear Him speak in new ways. We need to pray that our eyes may be opened that we may see, our hearts quickened that we may have larger sympathies, our minds enlightened that we may have greater wisdom, our faith increased that we may set ourselves to our work with new faith and new courage. A new world is coming in. Pray God that the Diocese of Newark may be well up in the front rank among those making it a world in which dwelleth righteousness.—Bishop Lines, Convention Address.

The Hope of Church Unity.

A few years ago it seemed to the most optimistic that the day of Church unity must be very far in the future. If, however, the Apostles, directed by the Lord Himself, were only to preach so as to bring their converts to baptism and then leave them to complete their Christian life in their own way by prayer and conference, why should not we be willing to call all men brethren, who are baptized in the name of the Trinity and are striving by the use of the other means of grace to live a godly and Christian life. Perhaps we have asked too hard and exact uniformity of doctrinal belief and practice, and have received little encouragement. Now, if we ask less, perhaps the agreement of Christians together may be that like that in a family where all are united by love and sympathy, and yet where each one as an individual develops harmoniously his own personal character. I am not ready to formulate yet a platform of our coming together, or even to suggest it, but it does seem to me that we should give thought to this unity of soul and purpose which is being recognized by the young men at the front, and while we are behind them in giving them support in their warfare, we should not lag behind them or retard the great surge and current which will run towards greater union than has been in the past. If we can unite so cordially and without any friction in supporting the Red Cross Society and the Young Men's Christian Association work, why can we not get together directly without these intermediaries and with broadness of vision and sincerity of heart conserve all that is of value in ancient Church law and theology while we reach out our hands towards our fellow baptized Christians of other names, and labor together to establish the kingdom of God on earth. Strive for it brethren, pray for it, and may God in His mercy soon show us how it is to be done.—Bishop Darlington, Convention Address.

THE CLERGY AND WAR SERVICE.

We have received from the office of the Brotherhood of St. Andrew a list of the clergy of the Church who are actively engaged in service for and with the army and navy, and it is a surprisingly long one. Some, as many as are allotted to our Church, are regularly appointed chaplains in government service. Others are civilian chaplains under the Y. M. C. A. or the Brotherhood of St. Andrew or are performing other duties in the camps. Others still are connected with the Red Cross or are in the ambulance service, and some are officers or privates in the ranks. A large number are already at the front in France and others are going over almost daily. Although not subject to draft, we imagine that no class of our citizenship has a larger percentage of men actively engaged in actual war service in one form or another than the clergy of the Church. It appears that fully five per cent of the entire body of the clergy, including the superannuated and disabled, are thus actively employed. In some dioceses eight or ten per cent have volunteered for this work. The service flag of the Theological Seminary in Virginia has stars representing ten per cent of the living alumni. The soldiery of the United States represents only about four per cent of its male citizenship.

We are proud of those who go. But none the less do we appreciate the spirit of sacrifice in those who might go and yet stay; by whom the urge to be in the thick of it is as strongly felt as by their more envied brothers, but whom the voice of duty bids to serve among the people at home. No one can say which has the greater or the more heroic service to perform. It would be a great loss to the country as well as to the Church if the ranks of the ministry at home were to be seriously depleted and the unusual and very important service which they are expected to render in this crisis be wanting. The ardor, the courage and steadfastness and high idealism of the army at the front are dependent upon the same qualities in the greater army at home, and here as well as there they are based upon the deep principles of righteousness and love and self-sacrifice, in a word, of godliness, which are embalmed in our gospel and found in their strength and purity nowhere else. If the war is to be continued and ended by America as it was begun, and with yet more consistency of aim and purpose as the stress becomes greater, a fundamental responsibility rests upon the preachers and exponents of that gospel which may not be conspicuous, but is tremendously real. Let no man who is faithfully ministering the word of God in these days by speech and life be doubtful of the service he is rendering his country or impatient of his opportunities. To broaden and strengthen the foundations upon which rest the whole structure of what we are fighting for is no unworthy task.

Doubtless many of our Bishops have discussed this matter in their convention addresses, for it is one that comes close to them upon whom the care of all the churches, but especially the vacant churches, rests heavily. The Bishop of North Carolina, who was quoted in part in our last issue, was very emphatic in stating his conviction that unless under unusual circumstances which do not at present exist the clergy were not justified in leaving the proper work of the ministry to engage in secular duties arising out of our great struggle. This, of course, does not apply to chaplaincies, but to some other forms of army work. He continues, stressing a point that must not be overlooked:

"Our country so far from calling on the Clergy to abandon their proper functions, has declared expressly and emphatically that they should not do this. By exempting the Clergy from military service, exempting them as Clergymen, our Government has said that their proper function is so important to the welfare of the nation that the country demands of them that they apply themselves diligently to their proper duties. There is abundant work for them, both at home and in the army. If some proper appointment in the army, calling for exercise of his function, comes to a Clergyman he may properly accept it. * * * As it seems to me the Clergyman who abandons his function and undertakes work that gives no special opportunity to him as a Clergyman, is violating the fundamental principle so wisely adopted by the Government in carrying on this war. He is deserting the great cause of the organized moral and spiritual form of society, and is undertaking the task which our Government has wisely offered to other men."

Carolínians are notoriously prompt to get in when a hard fight for a good cause is in prospect, so the Bishop of South Carolina had also a timely word of counsel to offer on the same subject:

"It has been a matter of great pride and gratification to me to find so many of our Clergy filled with a patriotic desire to serve the Country in this crisis. There has been, as you see from the record just read you, no lack of volunteers, or of willingness to spend and be spent for the cause in which we are enlisted. In fact, if the Clergy had their way, and were free to leave their families and their parishes, there would soon be so many vacancies in the Diocese that the people at home would seriously suffer for the ministration of the Word and the Sacraments. Indeed, we are in danger, some of us at least, of forgetting that the work of keeping the Church alive at home is just as important in this war as the work of carrying the message to the men in the trenches. Our Army would be deprived of its splendid idealism and faith in the righteousness and justice of our cause if there should be a weakening of the moral and spiritual foundations of the nation at home. It cannot be too often repeated that this is no war of Governments, but of peoples and of ideals. The principles involved are so fundamental—the issues which must emerge when the war is over so tremendous, and the task of reconstruction which lies ahead of us so exceedingly difficult—that our people will stand in need of the highest moral and spiritual leadership. As the casualty lists grow longer and sorrow and bereavement come to many an American home, the ministrations of the Church will become more and more to many a burdened soul. The time is close at hand when the utmost capacity of faith and of sacrifice of the life in the Nation will be put to the test. And if there are no clergy at home to proclaim the unsearchable riches of Christ, and to strengthen the faith and hope of our people, what will become of the spiritual defenses of the Nation? I am not here to discourage any man who has the qualifications for successful service overseas, but I would have him realize that the conservation of the religious forces at home in this crisis is as vital and important a factor to the winning of the war as any contribution he is likely to make "Over there." The question, after all, is not where one would like to go, or what is best for one's own self development, but where can he serve most effectively to the Glory of God and the good of the Cause. Upon the answer to this question, coupled with the obligations which one owes to his own household and to the community in which he lives, will depend the clearness of the call which takes him away from his present field of service."

BISHOP BRENT ON CHURCH UNITY.

(The following letter from Bishop Brent to a personal friend has been sent us for publication.—Editor S. C.)

Easter, 1918.

"Just as now is the time to strike for the unity of nations, so is it the time to strike for the unity of the churches. I wonder how many people at home realize that our chief difficulty in connection with the morals of the army is due to the divided Church. You meet it at every turn. Many feel it so keenly that they can see no enduring or substantial good coming out of our purely physical or human effort without some movement pari passu earnestly aiming for a Kingdom of God among men not divided against itself.

"Last Sunday I was with our fellows just before they went into the great battle, some of them to die before the week closed. In one place the chaplain asked for the use of the church. It was refused. The schoolhouse was refused. The little town was so crowded with soldiers that the only place we could find for service where we were welcome was a barnyard. There under the wide-spreading eaves of a great barn we set up an improvised altar. The French peasants and the cattle that stood by were hospitable to us. The weather was bleak and dull. It was Bethlehem over again as the massed khaki knelt in the litter of straw before the Christ of Bethlehem. There was no room for Him in the inn. All that exclusiveness can do is to shut out men from itself and drive them nearer to God. Sometimes ecclesiasticism is so cold and cruel with its anathemas and lack of vision that one wonders how God can continue to use it for His Kingdom—if He does. I give this incident as an illustration.

"It seems to me the time has come for us to do something daring and loving for the Kingdom's sake. It is antediluvian to continue thinking in mere terms of continuity or of yesterday. We must both think and act in terms of the new order, in terms of the Kingdom of God. Individual effort, of course, must be continued, and has its effect. But the churches should act. The constitutional assembly of every one should meet for the definite purpose of moving for a conference on the peace of the churches, with no other aim to distract—our own General Convention should lead. Not the House of Bishops alone, but the whole Convention. Then the churches willing to share in such a conference should do so, regardless of those which might choose to sit apart. The world is falling to pieces, the churches are tagging on behind the armies, and nothing is being done that is worthy the name of witness-bearing for unity as Christ begs of us to interpret it. Happy the church that takes the lead in such an adventure of faith! I have often thought of our late determination to reach the Russian Church. We were not too early but too late, much too late, too diplomatic, too calculating.

"In the A. E. F. I can do more in behalf of unity in the work that has been chosen me than in any other task at the moment at any rate. It may not be much but it is something."

THE ARMY AND NAVY DEPARTMENT OF THE BROTHERHOOD OF ST. ANDREW.

What It Is and the Work It Does.

Immediately after the fateful Good Friday when this nation decided to enter the great war, the National Council of the Brotherhood of St. Andrew made plans for a program of Christian work among the men in the service, which resulted in the formation of the Army and Navy Department, under its own Council, and with full authority to guide and direct the Brotherhood work for the men in the service.

The Brotherhood alone, among all the hundreds that began work for our soldiers and sailors, announced at the beginning that it had no material help to give, but rather was going to demand that our boys should give, not money, but service to God, among their comrades.

The movement was not popular at first, but its very merit won. In no better way can the work be typified than by the remark of the young infantryman, who, when asked what the group he belonged to was, replied: "Why, that's the Help the Other Fellow Society!"

Our young men have gone to the front and are now quartered in camp and hospital, exposed to hardship and temptations. The Church has not deserted them. Her sacraments are being brought to them and every effort made to strengthen their spiritual lives.

The Brotherhood has enlisted in this service laymen of the Church. So rapidly has the work spread afield there is an ever growing demand for more and more consecrated workers. These laymen, Brotherhood Secretaries, they are called, work in close co-operation with the Bishops, chaplains and Clergy and with the religious workers of the Y. M. C. A. and other organizations.

Secretaries have been placed in most of the large camps throughout the country and soon the work is to be extended overseas. The Brotherhood Secretaries usually live in camp, mess with the men and in many camps are attached to the Y. M. C. A. camp staff, but are free to occupy all of their time in personal religious work.

The basis of this work is to get earnest Christian men in the ranks to help their fellows to live clean lives. The Brotherhood Secretary expends his energies in lining up men capable of carrying on this work. These men are called "keymen," and it is around them little groups of personal workers are formed.

A word about these groups as expressed in Trench and Camp, the soldier's paper, sums up the situation well:

"It's a happy idea to have these groups of men getting together and standing for the clean things in life. The democracy of the group is paramount. They make their own rules, elect their own officers and meet once a week when possible. One thing they have in common is their motto of 'Prayer and Service' and 'Get Your Brother.' Fundamentally they stand pat for things religious in a strictly interdenominational way. In some of the barracks a chapter from the Bible is read by one of the group before they turn in. The Sick Committee keeps track of the boys sent to the base hospital and sees that someone visits them."

That briefly gives an idea of the group work. The men touched by the Brotherhood Secretaries and the groups are urged to go to church—to make their communion at least once a month if possible. Naturally, the Brotherhood Secretaries' first and most intimate points of contact are with Churchmen and Brotherhood men particularly, but they zealously serve the chaplain, of whatever faith he may be, and also co-operate heartily in all Y. M. C. A. activities.

The Brotherhood's Camp Secretary is also the active helper to all our Clergy in touch with his camp and assists in arranging for celebrations of the Holy Communion and bringing men to attend this and other services. In short, he so conducts himself as to be a "faithful servant" of our Lord and Saviour, co-operating with all who are like-minded to do His will.

The organization of the Army and Navy Department of the Brotherhood is composed of the Central Office, of which Frederick S. Titsworth is Executive Secretary, and the field workers of which B. F. Finney is Chief Secretary, and G. Frank Shelby, Personnel Secretary. Mr. Shelby will be Chief Secretary for the work in France.

It is the function of the Central Office to keep a corrected, up-to-date card catalogue of all enlisted Churchmen, giving their parish, home and as much information as may be obtainable concerning their families. On May 15th more than thirty thousand names were in this catalogue, and the work of adding names goes on daily. There is urgent need for every parish to send in names for this great honor roll of the Church, giving full military address and other information concerning members of the parish in the service. This honor roll is used to the fullest extent. The names of these men are sent to the Brotherhood Secretaries, chaplains and Clergy in their respective camps—and through the medium of this honor roll they are brought a personal touch from the Church. The Central Office fosters correspondence with these men and ministers to their wants by co-operating with all agencies available for the purpose, such as the distribution of literature, comforts and the like. The Central Office also endeavors to keep correct census of all Church chaplains of the army, navy and Red Cross, and all Clergy attached and unattached to the ranks.

The Central Office acts as a bureau of information to Brotherhood Secretaries to aid them in their work and to collect and disseminate their experiences and make them available to all concerned, and also promotes and co-ordinates work of neighboring parishes with the work within the camps.

The Challenge to Laymen.

In the imperative and urgent call for men, the individual parish can do much if it will but sound its own laymen and every worthy candidate for service as Brotherhood Secretaries in the camps, here and overseas. Too much stress cannot be laid on this. Each day that passes sees the growth in the ranks of those serving the colors, and each day that passes must see men stepping forward to help the men who are standing ready to make the supreme sacrifice.

Those who hear the call of this challenge should communicate with

WHAT CONSTITUTES A DIOCESAN SCHOOL?

In the Churchman (New York) of May 4 appears a letter from a Richmond correspondent about Stuart Hall. This letter emphasizes that the school was not a Diocesan School, but was formerly rented to "successive tenants who each one conducted and developed the school as his or her individual property" . . . "but it was in no sense a Diocesan School, beyond the fact that the Diocese . . . owned the land and buildings and rented them out."

The annual catalogue of the school always bore on its title page, "The Diocesan School of Virginia," and later, "Virginia and Southern Virginia." If not true, why was this error not corrected thirty-five years ago? During all these years it was invariably known as such by Bishops and the Clergy, and the catalogue published the names of the Board of Trustees from the two Dioceses.

The school was leased for a term of five years. If not a Diocesan School why was an annual board meeting held at the school and an annual report made to this board and to the Councils of Virginia and Southern Virginia? The Diocesan Journal published all reports as from the Diocesan School.

At the annual meetings the board had a voice in all matters concerning the school; its finances, its policies, and its spiritual progress. The rector of the parish was the local head of the board and as such consulted and advised with the head of the school whenever he saw the need. The board always visited the house from garret to cellar and suggested improvements or declared themselves satisfied.

When Mrs. Stuart resigned in 1898, the school carried a debt of some $20,000 on its buildings, but Mrs. Stuart owned the entire equipment, having purchased the same from Dr. Phillips. The board preferred to lease the school rather than buy the equipment. They had no money to do so. In 1898 Miss Duval, then Vice-Principal, was invited to succeed Mrs. Stuart, and in turn purchased the equipment, working out old and working in new until the house was almost furnished anew. In 1915 this equipment was offered the board at the low figure of $6,000, and included twenty-one pianos almost new.

Had the Dioceses been able to come forward and relieve the situation by paying the debt many years ago and releasing the annual rental of $3,500 for scholarships, then the school would have been truly a Diocesan School, but the lessees assumed these scholarships, thus relieving the Dioceses of much financial responsibility. No clergyman's daughter or orphan was ever refused, nor paid for tuition, and the school was no expense to the Dioceses.

The annual income as rental of $3,500 and the costs of keeping up the property, enabled the board to pay all interest on the debt and carry a sinking fund for its gradual liquidation. In time this plan would have worked out successfully. Of course, there were times of big expenditure as in the building of Whittle Hall.

For thirty-five years the school did the work of a Diocesan School without a gift from or a dollar spent by either Diocese. Each year the Missionary Society of the school did its part by both Dioceses, averaging nearly $500 a year in gifts divided equally because belonging to Virginia and Southern Virginia. The school also carried its own expenses, made substantial improvements, paid all dues, did faithfully its part to the Church and to the public. The curriculum was advanced, its faculty added to as the progress of years demanded, and it made for itself a name worthy of its founders and the Virginia Church.

During this long period of years the principals and faculty believed they were serving the Diocese in a Diocesan School. Now the question arises in any intelligent mind, what constitutes a Diocesan School?

Feeding Orphans Under Difficulties

The Widely Loving Society of Osaka has many American friends. Bishop Tucker, of Kyoto, and Miss Leila Bull, of Osaka, are the foreign members of its Board of Trustees, and Mr. Kobashi, its founder, the Rev. Mr. Naide, of Christ Church, Osaka, and Miss Hayashi, who have all visited this country, are among the Japanese members. The number of children now in the Home are one hundred and thirty-four; the number of workers, fifteen; the number of contributors, from ten sen a month upwards, 1,441. From the English column of the monthly report of the Society we read of an unusual experience of last fall. Miss Bull writes:

"From the first of October most unusually heavy rains caused the dykes of a river to give way, and for nearly the duration of the rains which caused Noah's flood, the Widely Loving Society and its neighbors were in the midst of a lake four feet deep. We had only a small boat for our farm work on the irrigating canals, but a kind Christian friend lent us his larger one, with which we removed seventy of our small children into the Love Your Neighbor Evening School in the city of Osaka, and for six weeks and more carried food and drinking water to the more than forty larger children and their caretakers, left in the upstairs rooms of the cottages of the Widely Loving Society. The larger children became quite skillful in sculling the larger boat. In fact, with the high spirits of youth, they looked upon the inundation as a long continued camping out picnic. But it was hard for the workers to see the carefully cultivated, and, before the flood, especially hopeful crops of rice and vegetables entirely ruined. One thousand yen worth of foodstuffs gone, another one thousand and five hundred yen damage to the buildings and five hundred yen expended to ensure the health of the big family—the thought of three thousand yen of unexpected outlay, in these times of high prices for the necessities of life, would have appalled us if our trust had not been in our Almighty Heavenly Father. And it is with the deepest thankfulness that we record that He sent to us, through the kind hearts and generous hands of many of His children, just about that amount, and we closed the year 1917 without a deficit."

Miss Bull adds in a later report:

"His Majesty, the Emperor, was pleased to grant in aid to the sufferers from the floods last fall a generous sum of money, and the Widely Loving Society received a share of the Imperial bounty with profound reverence and gratitude. The anniversary of the founding of the Japanese empire is celebrated every year by the Home Office granting a sum to each benevolent institution in the country, which, on careful inspection, is judged worthy of such recognition. To the four hundred yen sent to the Widely Loving Society on this occasion, February 11th, was added a gift of one hundred yen to Mr. Kobashi himself, accompanied by an engrossed testimonial to his long and devoted services to the cause of the betterment of society.

"'Tis an ill wind that blows nobody good," says an old English adage, and the flood which caused us so much harm last fall has been the means of our obtaining a piece of land which indented ours on the main highway, and which the owner always refused to sell except at a prohibitive price. Eleven small tenements had been put up on the lot, and the tenants were obliged to flee from them when the water arose. A judicious go-between has succeeded in persuading the owner to exchange the lot for another more convenient for the Widely Loving Society and a reasonable balance in cash. We took the latter from our precious reserve fund; but expect to return the amount from the rental of the tenements. These are now repaired and house tenants of our own choosing, including the family of the teacher of the Widely Loving Society's primary school.

"So has been fulfilled to us anew the promise that 'all things work together for good to them that love God.'"

The Missionary Treasury.

The Treasurer of the Board reports that on May 1 the offerings showed a large apparent increase over those of the same date last year, due, however, in large part to the Lenten Sunday-school offerings which this year, owing to an earlier Easter, came in during the closing days of April instead of May. When all deductions have been made on this account there is still a proportionate falling off in contributions as compared with the preceding fiscal year, though not so large as a month ago. This deficiency is chiefly in the parish contributions. The total offerings to May 1 amounted to $557,922.46.

Even the Igorots of the Philippines are taking part in the Liberty Loans. Far up in the mountains of Luzon, in the neighborhood of the school where Deaconess Anne Hargreaves represents the American Church Mission, they dug up ancient Spanish pieces and other relics from the ground and brought them out of other hiding places peculiar to these mountain people, in order that they might do their bit for liberty.

Some of us do not think that unbelief is a sin at all; that man is no more responsible for his belief than he is for the color of his face. Well, what is it that a man turns away from when he turns away from Christ? And what does such an attitude indicate as to the rejecter? He stands in the presence of the loveliest revelation of the Divine nature, and he sees no light in it. Why, but because he is incapable of seeing God manifest in the flesh he loves the darkness rather than the light. He turns away from the revelation of the most self-sacrificing love. Why, but because he bears a heart cased with selfishness? He turns away from the offered hands heaped with the blessing that he needs. Why, but because he does not care for the gifts that are offered? Forgiveness, cleansing, purity, a heaven which consists in the perfecting of all these has no attractions for him.—A. MacLaren.

Summer Conferences for Church Workers: Announcements From the Educational Department of the Board of Missions.

From the Board of Missions comes the following detailed information regarding the various Conferences for Church Workers this summer:

Church Conferences.

Eagles Mere, Pa., Province III, June 17-21.

Gambier, Ohio, Province V, June 19-20.

Cambridge, Mass., Province I, June 21-July 6.

Geneva, N. Y., Province II, July 1-12.

Racine, Wis., Province V, July 17-25.

Sewanee, Tenn., Province IV, August 6-13.

Brotherhood of St. Andrew.

Northfield, Mass., August 14-21.

Interdenominational Conferences of the Missionary Education Movement.

Blue Ridge, N. C., June 25-July 4.

Silver Bay, N. Y., July 5-14.

Estes Park, Colo., July 12-21.

Asilomar, Cal., July 16-25.

Ocean Park, Me., July 19-28.

Lake Geneva, Wis., July 26-August 4.

Seabeck, Wash., July 30-August 8.

The Church Conferences are, of course, intended primarily for Church people. They provide the best possible courses of instruction in the various phases of Church work, usually grouping the courses under the three departments of religious education, social service and the mission of the Church, respectively. Excellent instructors, both clerical and lay, conduct the courses throughout the morning of each day of the conferences. The afternoons are given over to recreation and excursions, for which the location of each conference provides abundant opportunity.

The interdenominational conferences have a somewhat more specialized aim, in that the main emphasis is laid on the missionary enterprise. At these conferences, therefore, one expects to get information and instruction of a more exclusively missionary character, to meet missionaries from foreign lands and get their experiences at first hand, and to receive the stimulus of a large gathering of men and women representing wide varieties of religious experience. No Churchman need feel other than at home in these gatherings, since there is always a large proportion of Church people present, and the proportion grows year by year. The special attention of men should be called to the Brotherhood Conference at Northfield, in August. This is the Brotherhood's first attempt at holding a Summer Conference. A program of great interest has been prepared, and the occasion promises to be one of the most important of the whole summer for the laymen of the Church. Unless all signs fail, the week of August 14th will become memorable in the Church through this men's conference. It would be abundantly worth while if vestries would seriously consider paying all the expenses incident to sending at least one member of their parish to the Conference within their own Province. The cost, exclusive of railway fares, and the small registration fee ($3.00—$5.00), varies from about $10.50 to $17.50 per week. Further information regarding any of the Conferences can be procured from the Educational Department, 281 Fourth Avenue, New York City.

Thirtieth Anniversary of Archdeacon Neve.

On Thursday, May 23, the thirtieth anniversary of the Ven. F. W. Neve, Archdeacon of the Blue Ridge, as rector of St. Paul's Church, Ivy Depot, Va., was celebrated by a large gathering of Clergy and lay people who assembled at St. Paul's Church to do honor to the founder of our growing work among the mountain people of this Diocese. A historical sermon, outlining the development of the mountain work was preached by the Rt. Rev. R. A. Gibson, D. D., Bishop of the Diocese, and the Holy Communion was celebrated by the Rt. Rev. William Cabell Brown, D. D., Bishop-Coadjutor. After the service, luncheon was served by the ladies of the parish on the lawn of the rectory at Ivy, which was followed by addresses made by Bishop Brown, the Rev. W. Cleveland Hicks, Missionary Secretary of the Province of Washington; Dr. John W. Wood, Corresponding Secretary of the Board of Missions, Dr. W. C. Rives, of Washington; the Rev. G. M. Brydon, Executive Secretary of the Diocesan Missionary Society, and others. An appreciation of Mr. Neve's work by the vestry of the parish, was read by Mr. R. W. Macreth, of the vestry, and a loving cup presented by the Rev. W. Roy Mason on behalf of the mountain workers, was a visible token of the affection and gratitude felt by all who have had the privilege of working with Archdeacon Neve. After a happy response by the Archdeacon, the assemblage was dismissed with the benediction by Bishop Gibson.

Shortly after entering upon the rectorship of St. Paul's, Mr. Neve established the first permanent mission in the mountains of the Diocese. Under his care and oversight as Archdeacon the work has spread through five counties, with eight Clergy engaged wholly or in part in mountain work, and a large number of school teachers and other lay workers.

The Virginia Summer School for Sunday-school Workers.

The third session of the Summer School for Sunday-school Workers in the Diocese of Virginia will be held at the University of Virginia from Monday evening, June 10, through Friday forenoon, June 14. This school is held under the direct supervision of the Board of Religious Education of the Diocese of Virginia.

The curriculum for the school has been arranged with especial reference to the New Partial-Credit Plan in Teacher Training, authorized by the General Board of Religious Education. In order to meet the conditions of Summer Schools, the General Board has decided to break up the longer courses required by the Standard into five-lesson parts, any one of which, when successfully completed by a student, will be recognized by what is to be known as a "Partial Certificate." When all the partial units of the longer courses have been accomplished, the General Board will give in exchange for the partial certificates a full certificate for the course completed.

The Mount St. Alban Summer School is unable to hold a session this season, and its management strongly advises all those hitherto attending its session to participate this year in the Summer School at the University of Virginia.

The Clergy and Superintendents of Virginia and the neighboring Dioceses are most earnestly asked to give notice of the school at once to their Sunday-school teachers, and to urge all to attend.

The matriculation fee is $2.00 for each person, resident or non-resident, whether attending all or a part of the course. A special rate of $1.50 for each person will be allowed in the case of four or more coming from one congregation or Sunday-school. Mail the necessary fee to the Rev. H. H. Williams, Treasurer, University, Va.

Reservations for board and lodging should be made at the very earliest possible moment with Mr. E. I. Caruthers, University, Va.

An enthusiastic meeting of the Richmond Missionary Society was held in Grace Church Parish House last week. The report of the city missionary for the past five months showed his activities to have been as follows: Calls, 463; visits to institutions, 202; services and addresses, 161.

The report of the Treasurer showed the finances of the Society to be in unusually good shape.

Plans were adopted for the extending of the activities of the Society along several lines, and committees were provided for on music, social service, transportation and hospitals. The meeting adjourned to the third Monday in June, at which time it is hoped that the committees will be ready to report, so that plans can be arranged for promptly taking up the work and pushing it vigorously at the first fall meeting, and for carrying on some enterprises through the summer.

A Chip From an Old Block: The following item appeared in the Florida Record, Tallahassee, of May 4:

"Mr. Paul S. Appleyard, who has enlisted in the regular army, Heavy Field Artillery, left this morning for Fort Screven, Savannah, Ga. Paul was the recipient of a number of useful gifts before his departure, and among them was the Bible that was carried and read by his father during the Civil War. This Bible was presented to Colonel Appleyard, as a prize in the public schools in Richmond, Va., in 1860, by Mr. Samuel Denoon, Chairman of the Board of Trustees. Paul also takes with him his mother's Prayer Book."

The Paul Appleyard here mentioned is a son of Colonel T. J. Appleyard, an old "Richmond boy," who has lived in Florida for forty years. Colonel Appleyard entered the Confederate navy when twelve years of age. He attended Grace Church Sunday-school in Richmond, when the Rev. F. M. Baker was rector, over fifty years ago. His Sunday-school teacher was the late Vincent Bargamin, who will be remembered as a prominent Churchman of that period.

For the Red Cross: At a meeting held recently at the Episcopal High School, near Alexandria, nearly one thousand dollars was subscribed for the Red Cross. The meeting was opened with prayer by the Rev. Professor Crawford, and addresses were made by Hon. A. J. Montague, Major Miller, of the British Embassy, and Hon. R. Walton Moore.

Closing Exercises St. Paul Normal and Industrial School.

The thirtieth annual closing exercises of the St. Paul Normal and Industrial School, Lawrenceville, which began Sunday, May 19, with the preaching of the baccalaureate sermon by the Rev. Junius L. Taylor, D. D., rector of St. Stephen's Church, Savannah, Ga., and an alumnus of the school, and closed Wednesday, May 22, with the graduating exercises, were among the most enthusiastic and successful in the history of the school. Unusual interest was attached to the celebration this year on account of its being also the thirtieth anniversary of the founding of the school. The program emphasized both the academic and industrial features of the school's training. The gathering was also remarkable for the presence of three Bishops of the Church, Bishop Lloyd, President of the Board of Missions; Bishop Tucker, Bishop of the Diocese of Southern Virginia, and Bishop Suffragan Thomson, of the same Diocese.

Bishop Thomson opened the exercise with a short prayer, in which he paid a most feeling tribute to Bishop Randolph, late President of the Board of Trustees of the school. The program was an excellent one and splendidly rendered. The singing of jubilee songs by the quartette was greatly enjoyed. "Little David, Play on Your Harp" and "Swing Low, Sweet Chariot," were among those sung. The salutation was Miss Martha Claiborne, Lawrenceville, whose topic was "Woman's Place in the World." Fraudie Barnes was valedictorian.

The Alumni address by the Rev. Junius L. Taylor, D. D., attracted special attention on account of the unusual circumstances of his career. He came to St. Paul's a full grown man unable either to read or write. So illiterate was he that no class could be found for him. He stayed at the school, however, worked his way through by learning the shoemaker's trade, and finished his academic course and went to the Bishop Payne Divinity School, Petersburg, for his theological training, graduating from there with honor in 1904. He has been engaged in the sacred ministry ever since.

Bishop Tucker presented Bishop Lloyd, who delivered the commencement address. Bishop Lloyd's address was wonderfully inspiring and helpful. He had just returned from Liberia, and he said: "I have seen the only spot on God's green earth where Africans are working out their destiny in their own way without hindrance or help from any one; pure blooded Africans working out for themselves the destinies and problems that make full citizens." He reminded the class of his injunction to a former class to make the best use of the opportunities that awaited them in the new life into which they were about to enter. He eulogized the splendid work of the school, and spoke in the highest terms of the work the principal is doing.

Mr. William Anthony Aery, from the Hampton Institute, followed Bishop Lloyd in a forceful speech of five minutes, full of hope and encouragement. He told the school that he brought greetings from Hampton Institute and its new principal. Bishop Tucker presented diplomas and trade certificates to twenty-five young men and women, taking occasion to deliver a short but helpful address on the duties and responsibilities they were about to undertake.

One of the most interesting of the commencement celebrations was the unveiling of the service flag of the school, with one hundred and ten stars, one of them a gold star.

The Board of Trustees held a long and most enthusiastic meeting in the evening of commencement day.

Thursday a splendid memorial tablet to the glory of God, and in loving memory of Mrs. Katharine Van Rensselaer Delafield, a former donor of the school and a strong friend of negro education, was unveiled in the memorial chapel.

The principal's report laid stress on the fact of the large enrollment and the financial condition of the school. Of the twenty-two members of the academic class eleven were from Brunswick, the school's home county.

Other honors were awarded as follows: "For Exemplary Conduct," $5.00, given by the Rev. Giles B. Cooke, was divided between Cora Church and Fraudie Barnes; oratorical contest prizes, "Simmie D'Onner Memorial," $10.00 gold prize, given by Mr. A. H. Turner, won by Thaddeus Caldwell, of St. Augustine, Florida; Founder's $5.00 gold prize won by Myrtle Smith, of Jersey City, N. J.; "Harriet Carper Memorial" of $5.00, given by the matron, won by Martha Claiborne, of Lawrenceville.

SOUTH CAROLINA.

Rt. Rev. W. A. Guerry, D. D., Bishop.

The Rev. C. B. Willmer, D. D., rector of St. Luke's Church, Atlanta, Ga., spent Sunday, May 26, in Charleston, preaching in the morning at Grace Church and in the evening at the community service in the Artillery Hall.

The Rev. M. P. Logan, D. D., rector of St. Paul's Church, Charleston, delivered the address at the Confederate memorial exercises at Magnolia Cemetery via Charleston, May 10. Dr. Logan preached the baccalaureate sermon to the graduating class of the South Carolina College, at St. Paul's Church, Charleston, May 19.

TENNESSEE.

Rt. Rev. Thos. F. Gallor, D. D., Bishop.

Hoffman-St. Mary's Industrial Institute, Keeling, held its commencement, May 17th. The closing exercises began May 12 with a commencement sermon by the Rev. F. A. Garrett, A. M., and continued until the 17.

A party of more than two dozen delegates of the Diocesan Convention, after its adjournment, headed by Bishop Gallor, came out from Memphis to witness the commencement. The Rev. B. B. Ramage delivered the annual address.

Bishop Gailor gave the people in attendance very good advice, and presented the diplomas and certificates. Mrs. Bolton Smith presented the prizes.

This is the only Church school of its kind for the Christian and industrial education of colored girls and young women. A representative of the United States Bureau of Education speaks in a most complimentary way of the character and kind of work that is being done in this institution, and says it should be supported. The girls had some of their work on exhibition at the recent Diocesan Convention, which was held in Memphis. This work must be continued, for which the Bishop and Archdeacon are asking the Church friends to help in doing some work which must be done for the good of the school before its next term.

KANSAS.

Rt. Rev. James Wise, D. D., Bishop.

Annual Convention.

Combining a training school in Christian leadership with the fifty-ninth Annual Convention of the Diocese of Kansas, proved a remarkable success in Topeka, May 12-16. Not only did the three hundred visiting delegates and Clergy make the convention the most successful in the history of the Dioceses, but the inspiration and enthusiasm caused many of the fifteen new priests in the Diocese to declare it was the most successful Diocesan Convention they had ever attended anywhere.

The convention voted to establish the first Diocesan Publicity and Advertising Bureau in the history of the Episcopal Church. To membership on the bureau Bishop James Wise appointed three clergymen of the Diocese who had reported to the convention of their pioneer efforts in using display advertising in their local newspapers. The Rev. Joseph Harvey, of Pittsburg, Kas., was made chairman; the other two clerical members being the Rev. Carl W. Nau, of Emporia, and Dr. P. T. Fenn, of Wichita. Mr. A. J. Carruth, Jr., city editor of the Topeka State Journal; Carl Bolmer, cartoonist of that newspaper; Paul J. Brindel, Kansas City newspaper man who handled the publicity for the convention, and Professor N. A. Crawford, of the Kansas State Agricultural College Department of Journalism, are the other members of the bureau. Mr. Brindel was elected Secretary, and Mr. Haynes advertising expert of the bureau.

The bureau is preparing display advertising copy to be used by the parish churches in their local newspapers similar to that which brought remarkable returns in William Allen White's Emporia Gazette.

The Every Member Canvass is expected to become a popular institution in the forty parishes of the Diocese as a result of a series of eight addresses on that subject and missions given at the convention by Dr. Robert W. Patton. Immediately following the close of the convention Grace Cathedral parish, Topeka, set an example for the Diocese by making a canvass. As a result the largest church in the Diocese now has nearly seven hundred active contributing members instead of only about a third of that number.

The Rev. T. R. Ludlow, a former missionary of the Church to China, and the Rev. Dr. Patton succeeded in arousing much interest in Foreign Missions, especially in China. The Rev. Mr. Ludlow leaves early in June for France as one of forty Y. M. C. A. workers being sent there for work among the Chinese troops helping the allies behind the lines.

The Rev. Lester Bradner, Miss Frances Withers and the Rev. Paul Micou, of the General Board of Religious Education, also were leaders of conferences.

Delegates to the General Convention in Detroit were elected as follows: Dean James P. DeB. Kaye, the Rev. Robert H. Mize, the Rev. P. T. Fenn, the Rev. R. K. Poole, Messrs. O. B. Hardcastle, Henry Diegel, C. J. Brown and C. A. Magill.

The Diocesan Standing Committee re-elected as follows: Dean Kaye, Dr. O. B. Hardcastle, Henry Diegel, C. J. Pooley, Mr. Hardcastle, Messrs. D. W. Nellis, H. C. Kibbee and E. E. Murphy.

Delegates to the Provincial Synod at Waco, Texas, next October will be Dean Kaye, Dr. Fenn, the Rev. Messrs. H. L. Virden, F. F. Busch, A. M. Grant, of Atchison, H. Hawkins and Professor Crawford, Messrs. John M. Haynes, Murphy, C. A. Magill, A. F. Kinnilmoth and E. J. Shakeshaft.

The convention closed Friday morning with the first ordination service in the new Cathedral. The Rev. Herbert Hawkins, Secretary to the Diocese and the Bishop, and the Rev. Alfred Pannell, in charge of the oil district missions at Augusta, Eldorado and Eureka, Kas., were the first two priests to be ordained by Bishop Wise. Both men started their church career in England.

LEXINGTON.

Rt. Rev. L. M. Burton, D. D., Bishop.

Noon-day Intercessions: Following the recent service of intercession for the allied cause, held at the Cathedral, Lexington, a novel method has been inaugurated to interest all citizens of Lexington in the success of the cause of the allies. Every day at noon the Cathedral chimes ring out for five minutes, during which time the citizens of Lexington, whoever they are and wherever they be, are requested to pause and offer a prayer for the success of the allied cause.

The mission at Latonia, recently made vacant by the resignation of the Rev. Peter Langendorff, has been placed by Bishop Burton under the charge of the Rev. J. Howard Gibbons, Secretary of the Diocese and rector of Trinity, Covington.

Active Chaplain: The Rev. A. H. Marshall, rector of St. Andrews, Fort Thomas, continues his active services as chaplain at that post. More than seven thousand men recently have been assembled there.

Building Lot Secured: The congregation of the Good Shepherd, Lexington, the Rev. Dr. Richard Wilkinson, rector, whose church building was destroyed by fire last January, has secured a new lot for its new church building. The lot purchased, situated on East Main Street at the corner of Bell Court, for which the former lot on East Maxwell Street was given in part payment, is considered the most eligible and desirable lot in the city of Lexington for church purposes.

Novel Plan of Paying Off Church Indebtedness.

Trinity Church, Covington, on May 6, after the annual election of vestrymen, at the congregational meeting, held in the evening, a unique plan for paying off the church indebtedness was put into operation. The plan proposed the selling of two hundred and fifty "Blocks of Church Indebtedness," a number of which blocks were sold that night, at $10 a block.

NEWARK.

Rt. Rev. E. S. Lines, D. D., Bishop.
Rt. Rev. W. R. Stearly, D. D., Coadjutor.

War Service Work of the Diocese.

The interest in the war service work of the Diocese is strongly maintained. The Rev. Warren L. Rogers, of Jersey City, is taking the place at St. George's Chapel, Camp Dix, of the Rev. Edgar L. Cook, who returns to his important work at Hamburg and Vernon. The Rev. John C. Donnell, of Newark, at Y. M. C. A. Building No. 4, Camp Dix, takes the place of the Rev. Charles W. Popham, of Belleville, who returns to the care of his parish.

The construction of the Parish House for Camp Merritt is being pushed to completion and the Rev. Edwin S. Carson, of Ridgewood, takes the place in camp of Rev. Barrett P. Tyler, of Morristown, who returns to his work with the beautiful new Church of the Redeemer approaching completion. The ordinary term of leave of absence on service of the Clergy is three months.

It is a pleasure to record that some of the restrictions in the administration of the Holy Communion in the camps have been lessened so that there is a record of many services of the Holy Communion for large or small groups and many baptisms. The minds of soldiers especially those who are to go to France, turn to the two sacraments above all other religious observances. Many of the Clergy are expecting appointments as chaplains or in service of the Y. M. C. A. or Red Cross Society in France or in our military camps.

The Rev. Hugh D. Wilson, of St. George's, Passaic, has accepted a call to missionary work in Western Colorado, to the great loss of the Diocese and the great gain of the Missionary District.

The Rev. Frederick B. Bartlett, of West Hoboken, also goes soon to work in South Dakota; also a man who will be greatly missed in the Diocese of Newark.

LONG ISLAND.

Rt. Rev. F. Burgess, D. D., Bishop.

The Rev. Frank M. Townley, rector of St. Bartholomew's, Brooklyn, recently celebrated the tenth anniversary of his rectorship. He preached an historical sermon, and several brother clergymen were present, including his predecessor in the parish, the Rev. R. M. W. Black, now rector of Douglaston. On Monday evening following the Rev. Mr. Townley and his wife were tendered a reception by the Men's Club of the parish, at which addresses were made by the Bishop, General Wingate, Judge Wahle and others, and Mr. Townley was presented with a substantial token of his parishioners' esteem.

St. Philips' Church, Brooklyn, celebrated its nineteenth birthday on May 1, and at the same time the fifteenth anniversary of the Rev. Dr. Boyd's incumbency. Dr. Boyd's success here has been beyond question, and his people and friends showed their appreciation by handing to him a check in sufficient amount to buy a small motor car, which will doubtless facilitate his parochial work.

Farewell Service: Whitsunday was observed in old St. Peter's, State Street, Brooklyn, as a farewell to the old building, which, as previously announced, is for sale. A service will still be maintained every Sunday at 8 A. M., but the services of Whitsunday, for the great majority of the parishioners, marked the end of an epoch in the history of the parish. It is the intention of the trustees to erect a new St. Peter's somewhere in Brooklyn. But in the present state of the real estate market it is not likely that these plans will be carried out soon.

The Rev. Duncan M. Genns, rector of St. Thomas, Brooklyn, was recently presented by a group of friends with a Dodge motor car, and a garage has been built for it on the church property. Mr. Genns has worked his parish single handed lately, and this burdensome task had its effect upon his health. The car will be of much assistance in the work of such a parish.

ERIE.

Rt. Rev. Rogers Israel, D. D., Bishop

Eighth Annual Convention.

The Convention met in the Cathedral parish in Erie on Tuesday and Wednesday, May 14 and 15. The proceedings opened with Evening Prayer, and addresses by the Rev. Dr. Martin Aigner, President of the Standing Committee of the Diocese. In the evening one hundred and fifty men of the Diocese met for their annual dinner at the Lawrence Hotel. Sergeant Pritchard, of the Canadian Highlanders, was the chief speaker. The next morning the Rev. W. E. Van Dyke, who is about to leave for France, officiated with assistants at the Holy Communion. At the business sessions the following committees were elected: Standing Committee, the Rev. Drs. Aigner and Reilly, the Rev. George F. Potter and Ven. R. S. Radcliffe, Messrs. E. R. Shepard, C. E. Martin, S. P. Ker, Turner W. Shacklett; Provincial Synod, the Ven. E. J. Owen, the Rev. B. V. Reddish, the Rev. A. R. Van Meter and the Rev. A. L. Seiter, Colonel E. V. Seldon, Major J. W. Reynolds, F. B. Mallett and Colonel M. M. Gillett. One delegate from each mission was allowed to vote in this convention for the first time. The Pension Fund and a careful consideration of its needs was brought forward by the Rev. E. H. Edson. The Archdeacon of Meadville and the Archdeacon of Ridgway made their reports. The Rev. B. V. Reddish reported for the Social Service Committee.

PITTSBURGH.

Rt. Rev. C. Whitehead, D. D., Bishop.

The annual missionary rally of the Sunday-schools of the Diocese took place on Whitsunday afternoon, in Trinity Church, Pittsburgh. The Girls' Choir of Calvary Church led the procession, with representatives from the various schools bearing flags and banners, followed by the Clergy and Bishop. Bishop Whitehead made a short address of welcome, and the missionary address was delivered by the Rev. R. B. Evatt, of New Kensington. Diocesan pennants for 1918 were awarded and the Lenten Mite Box offerings were received by the Chairman of the Diocesan Board of Religious Education, and amounted to about forty-five hundred dollars, with some schools still to be heard from.

Hospital Commencement: The sixth annual commencement and graduating exercises of the St. Margaret Memorial Hospital, was held in the hospital chapel on the afternoon of Whitsunday. The baccalaureate sermon was preached by the Rev. L. F. Cole, of the Church of the Incarnation, Pittsburgh. Dr. Titus made an address on behalf of the staff, and Mr. C. L. Snowdon, President of the Board of Trustees, commented on the raising of $200,000 by a whirlwind campaign during the year last past, and of the erection in the near future of the new Home for Nurses. Bishop Whitehead was present and spoke in a congratulatory manner. The diplomas were presented by Mr. Snowdon to twelve graduates.

The Rev. Samuel H. Rainey, of Huntingdon, Diocese of Harrisburg, has accepted the rectorship of Christ Church, New Brighton, begins his new work on the first Sunday in June.

EASTON.

Rt. Rev. Wm. F. Adams, D. D., Bishop

The Southern Convocation met in All Hallow's Church, Snow Hill, Tuesday and Wednesday, May 14-15. Tuesday, after Evening Prayer, the sermon was preached by the Rev. W. D. Gould from Acts 1:9, dwelling on the Ascension. Wednesday morning an essay on Optimism in Religion was read by the Rev. J. A. Brown, and discussed by all the clergymen present.

The joint meeting of the Worcester County Auxiliary and Convocation began with a celebration of the Holy Eucharist and sermon by the Bishop of the Diocese, who took for his theme the Parable of the Laborers in the Vineyard, praising highly the work of the Woman's Auxiliary throughout the Church and in the Diocese. After luncheon the Auxiliary held their meeting, and the Convocation returned to the church, where all the Clergy present engaged in a discussion, led by the Rev. Louis L. Williams on "Has the Introduction of Elaborate Music in Our Services Proved Conducive to Pure Worship?"

The concurrent opinion was that it had not.

The result of the elections was as follows: To be nominated to the Bishop for Dean, the Rev. S. A. Potter; Vice-President, the Rev. G. M. Galarean; Secretary-Treasurer, the Rev. Louis L. Williams.

At Evening Prayer the sermon was preached by the Rev. Herbert D. Cone, based on St. Luke 21:25.

The Convocation was glad to welcome two new members, who have recently taken work in the Diocese: Rev. W. D. Gould, of Holy Trinity, Baltimore, has become rector of Great Choptank parish, Cambridge, and the Rev. William T. Reynolds, recently in war service, has become rector of St. Paul's-by-the-Sea, Ocean City.

The Rev. J. A. Brown, formerly of Spring Hill parish, but now retired, has taken up his abode at Princess Anne.

PENNSYLVANIA.

Rt. Rev. P. M. Rhinelander, D. D., Bishop.
Rt. Rev. T. J. Garland, D. D., Suffragan.

Death of the Rev. T. William Davidson.

The Rev. T. William Davidson, a retired minister of the Diocese of Pennsylvania, and for many years the faithful correspondent for the Southern Churchman from that Diocese, died on Ascension Day, aged seventy-four years. Funeral services were held from St. James Church on Monday, May 13, the Bishop, the rector, the Rev. Dr. J.

DeWolf Perry, and the Rev. F. M. Taft officiating.

Mr. Davidson was ordained by Bishop Stevens in 1871, and later went to the Diocese of Central Pennsylvania. In 1875 he returned to assume charge of St. Timothy's Church. He later, working under the Bishop, started St. Simon's Church, also the church which later became the South Memorial Church of the Advocate, the Church of St. John the Divine, which changed its name to St. Bartholomew on entering a new location, and for fifteen years was associated with the City Mission as chaplain of the State Penitentiary and of the Home for Consumptives.

ALBANY.

Rt. Rev. R. H. Nelson, D. D., Bishop.

Brotherhood of St. Andrew.

At the meeting of the Albany Diocesan Assembly, Brotherhood of St. Andrew, held recently in St. George's Parish House, Schenectady, George H. Randall, Secretary of the National Brotherhood, was the chief speaker. Delegates were present from a number of cities, including Albany and Troy. President Harvey Rextrew presided. Mr. Randall described the war work being done by the Brotherhood under the oversight of the Church War Commission, and Sydney T. Jones told of the work Brotherhood men are doing in the missionary plan for the Every Member Canvass. The Rev. Dr. Taylor, rector of St. George's, welcomed the Assembly. The meeting was one of the largest and best held in recent years.

NEW YORK.

Rt. Rev. David H. Greer, D. D., Bishop.
Rt. Rev. C. S. Burch, D. D., Suffragan.

West Point's Chaplain Accepts Rectorship of the Incarnation Parish.

The Rev. H. Percy Silver, chaplain at West Point, has accepted election as rector of the Incarnation parish, succeeding the Rev. Dr. Howard C. Robbins, now Dean of the Cathedral. Chaplain Silver has been at West Point since 1913, and previous to that time was chaplain in Kansas, serving in all more than fifteen years in army service. More and more business conditions creep up Madison Avenue, and even into Thirty-fifth, as well as Thirty-fourth Street, the last named long ago a busy cross town shopping mart. A task before Chaplain Silver will be, in large part, a transition program that shall include the remaking of the Incarnation work on lines successfully followed by Grace, Calvary, Trinity, Holy Communion and other down-town parishes.

"Seabury-Marvel House."

The Seabury Society secured at nominal rental four years ago a one-time-mansion in Twenty-fifth Street, just east of Madison Avenue. The front parlor served as office, and the back parlor extension for hall. Presented with furniture sufficient for one bedroom, the entire house, four story and basement, kitchen and dining-room, have been well furnished out of the house's own earnings. The furnishings paid for, and worth $1,100, have just been presented to the Marvel House, and the house, save only the parlor, turned over at the nominal rental of $5 a month to Marvel House home for boys. It is to be used at present for a home for soldiers and their friends, but its purposes when the war is won are two: First, to be a Christian home for stranger lads, fifteen to twenty years, whose wages are small, and who need father and mother care. Persons competent to carry on such home are in charge. The second purpose is to be a pattern or example to parents in churches where the society is at work, to demonstrate how such parents can make Christian homes out of apartments, and fathers and mothers how to deal with their own boys.

The house is hereafter locally to be known as Seabury Marvel House, and it is a part of a chain of three houses through which New York churches will try to do Christian hospitality work for parents of sick soldiers and sailors, compelled to visit New York to care for their boys. A dedication service was held on Trinity Sunday afternoon, not of the houses but of the idea of Christian homes in their influence upon the winning of the war and upon the boys of this and coming generations.

WESTERN NEW YORK.

Rt. Rev. Chas. H. Brent, D. D., Bishop.

Annual Council: Election of Coadjutor Approved.

The eighty-first Annual Council of the Diocese was held at St. Luke's Church, Jamestown, May 1.

The Bishop of the Diocese, the Rt. Rev. C. H. Brent, D. D., being absent on his duties at the war front in France, as general headquarters chaplain, the Secretary of the Council, the Rev. G. S. Burrows, acting under the canon, called the Council to order.

The Rev. C. A. Jessup, D. D., rector of St. Paul's, Buffalo, was elected presiding officer of the Council.

Officers elected at the Council are: Secretary, the Rev. G. S. Burrows; Treasurer, W. E. Moore.

Standing Committee: The Rev. Messrs. C. J. Davis, C. A. Jessup, D. D., W. A. R. Goodwin, D. D., C. M. Sills, D. D., and Messrs. A. C. Walker, S. S. Brown, J. W. Crafts, M. D. Mann, M. D.

Deputies to the Provincial Synod: The Rev. Messrs. C. A. Jessup, D. D., P. Cushing, G. S. Burrows, G. N. Irish, and Messrs. W. J. Tully, A. B. Houghton, J. M. Prophet, J. G. Buckley.

A very important business before the Council was the consideration of communications from Bishop Brent proposing either the arranging for his resignation as Bishop of the Diocese because of his detention abroad on war duty, or the election of a Bishop-Coadjutor. The communication drew from the Council a memorial and resolution, which was unanimously adopted, recording the deep appreciation of the privilege of giving their Bishop for this great work; heartily endorsing the action of the Standing Committee in granting him indefinite leave of absence; "that in the judgment of this Council the relation existing between Bishop Brent and ourselves is one which only death can sever; and that we extend to him the assurance of our personal affection and complete approval of his acceptance of the high office conferred upon him by our government, and we ask the prayers of the people of the Diocese, for his overwhelming success in the discharge of the duties as senior chaplain, and his safe return to this Diocese at the end of the war."

The Council adopted resolutions approving of the election of a Bishop-Coadjutor for the Diocese and requesting the consent of the Bishops and the Standing Committees of the Church; and providing that as soon as the necessary consents are obtained a Special Council be called to meet as early after the first of September as possible.

At the evening session of Tuesday a message from Bishop Brent to the Council and the people of the Diocese was read by the President of the Standing Committee, the Rev. Dr. Sills; also an address was made by the Rev. Dr. Goodwin urging upon the Church in the Diocese a meeting in full of its missionary opportunities and obligations.

A very happy feature of the Council was the presence of the Rt. Rev. Frederick Courtney, D. D., who, upon the request of the Council, addressed it, expressing his thanks to the Church people of the Diocese for the cordial reception accorded him in his work in the Diocese.

Bishop Brent's message to the Council was on Making Democracy Safe For the World, and contained the following telling sentences:

"A salutary whirlwind is sweeping through the world, bearing both life and death in its tearing, scorching breath.

"The one thing for us to attempt to do is to translate democracy into terms of the Kingdom of God.

"There is no lesson which the churches are learning in the war zone of greater importance than the impotence of our divided Christianity. I see no glimmer of hope for permanent and fraternal peace among the nations without at least as permanent and fraternal a peace among the churches.

"We, a complex and shattered world, stand face to face with the simple and only God. When men and nation and churches shall have become as simple as His only laws, the two laws of love, require us to be, then the kingdoms of this world will become the Kingdom of God and His Christ."

The Rev. Dr. Thomas B. Berry.

The Rev. Thomas B. Berry, D. D., warden of the DeLancey Divinity School for the past nine years, notice of whose death appeared in last week's Southern Churchman, was born November 18, 1846, in Dublin, of English parentage, his ancestors coming from Sussex. He was educated at the King's School, Dublin, and at the Cambridge, Mass., Theological Seminary and the Virginia Theological Seminary, Alexandria.

Dr. Berry came to this country in 1866 and engaged in the teaching of the deaf at the New York Institution for the Deaf in New York City.

He was ordained deacon in 1871 and priest in 1873 by the late Bishop Doane, of Albany, and served first as curate at St. Paul's Church, Albany. In addition to his duties as a parish priest he held services in the sign language for the deaf throughout the State, frequently coming to Geneva and Rochester for that purpose. He was later engaged in missionary work in Wisconsin and South Dakota, and while in Sioux Falls founded what is now the State School for the Deaf. In 1888 he was called to the Church of the Good Shepherd (Ingersoll Memorial), Buffalo, as its first rector, where he served faithfully for nearly twenty-one years. His last sermon was preached in his old parish last February.

He was appointed Registrar of the Diocese by the late Bishop Cox, which office he continued under Bishop Walker until his appointment in 1909 as warden of the DeLancey Divinity School in succession to the Rev. Charles W. Hayes, D. D.

CENTRAL NEW YORK.

Rt. Rev. C. T. Olmstead, D. D., Bishop.
Rt. Rev. Charles Fiske, D. D., Coadjutor.

A Brotherhood Week-end was observed in the Diocese of Central New York recently. Under the direction of Mr. Frank H. Pyke, of Syracuse, member of the Brotherhood Council for Central New York; Mr. G. H. Randall, the Executive Secretary of the Brotherhood, came for a series of helpful meetings.

A reception and general meeting was held in the Lockwood Memorial Hall of St. Paul's, in Syracuse; Mr. Randall was one of the speakers at the dinner of Trinity Men's Club on Monday, and on Tuesday night in the Parish House of Grace Church, Cortland, a dinner was given, followed by one of the best and largest group meetings of the week, some forty men being present from Cortland, Syracuse, Ithaca and other cities. Bishop Fiske came from Syracuse for the occasion, and addresses also were made by Mr. Randall and Mr. Pyke.

On Sunday a Brotherhood Corporate Communion was celebrated at Trinity Church, Syracuse, and Mr. Randall made addresses on the Brotherhood's war work in Grace Church, Syracuse, in the morning, and All Saints at night, with Mr. Pyke forming a chapter at the latter church.

On Sunday afternoon addresses on the war work were made by Mr. Randall in the chapel of Auburn prison and at St. Peter's Church, Auburn.

CONNECTICUT.

Rt. Rev. C. B. Brewster, D. D., Bishop.
Rt. Rev. E. C. Acheson, D. D., Suffragan.

The Convention.

The Annual Convention was held in Christ Church, Hartford, May 21 and 22, preceded by a Diocesan conference of one session, in the Church of the Good Shepherd. The attendance was large; the subject at the conference was Temperance, and the interest rose to a high point. Professor Irving Fisher and Dean George Blumer, both from Yale University, delivered addresses; the former having particular reference to and in favor of a nationwide prohibition. The Rev. Charles O. Scoville, of New Haven, and the Rev. Philip Pearson, of Naugatuck, appointed to address the meeting, supported the principles of prohibition, both for their intrinsic ethical value and for their proven power in maintaining military efficiency.

In the afternoon the Convention was called to order in the Parish House of Christ Church, a commodious building, dedicated last year, and is a magnificent memorial gift to the parish by a devoted Churchman and member of the honored Goodwin family. After prayers, the Bishop of the Diocese delivered his annual address to a large and expectant assembly, representing every section of the State, in fullest sympathy with the speaker and with one another. Beneath the masterful hand of the Bishop, "the present world convulsion" was presented with statesman-like conviction, and his reasons why we may expect "a true revival of religion" lead us to hope it may come, as when the warmth of a day in May succeeds the noise and confusion of a thunder storm.

Bishop Acheson reported his work for the year and, with the statistics harmoniously fitted together, delivered an address to hearten and inspire, because, deeper than the common ore of numbers, he revealed the richer veins of spiritual realities in our parishes and missions.

Elections, except where death or removal from the Diocese made re-election impossible, followed the usual routine and, therefore, with few exceptions, continuity and efficiency are characteristics of Connecticut.

Elections, committee reports, canon-cal amendments and resolutions were courteously and quickly disposed of.

The Church Pension Fund was carefully reviewed and the legislation of last year reconsidered in so far that the Convention is not yet fully prepared to merge all its Clergy aid funds. It is certain that so large an enterprise will receive continued and progressive adjustment to meet unanticipated contingencies. The Rev. Dr. McCook, diplomatically and with thorough knowledge, presented a preamble and resolution in a most kindly spirit, looking toward readjustments in the operation of the Church Pension Fund. They were adopted.

Closely allied, in thought, though not connected in legislation, the Convention adopted, unanimously, a resolution placing the minimum stipend for a married clergyman at $1,200.00 and rectory; single men, $1,000.00. The resolution, as introduced, placed it at $1,000.00 and rectory; the Bishop, in his usual good regard for his Clergy, tilted the motion to $1,200.00. Of course, the action is advisory, not mandatory, but it will have much moral value.

The Convention unanimously reaffirmed its position of last year on the temperance question, which favored war period prohibition.

One of the excellent by-products of the Convention is the Diocesan dinner, the evening of the first day. There were about three hundred present. The Bishop presided.

The Convention was one of the very best ever held in every respect.

The Rev. George L. Paine, rector of St. Paul's, New Haven, leaves for "over there" at an early date. He has tendered his resignation to the vestry, and they have declined to accept it. It has been laid on the table until October. The Rev. H. S. Harte is engaged to serve as locum tenens.

SPOKANE.

Rt. Rev. Herman Page, D. D., Bishop.

Annual Convocation.

A dominant note of patriotism, with an appeal for self-sacrifice within the Church during these times of stress ran through the Convocation address given by Bishop Herman Page at All Saints Cathedral, Spokane, on the morning of May 14. A public missionary service had been held the evening before, and addresses from men in various parts of the field were listened to with attention, and gave the keynote to all the Convocation in as much as they evidenced that the Clergy were determined to spare no pains to do all in their power for the extension of the Church's usefulness in all parts of the community. One-sixth of the Clergy of the district are now away from their work serving their country as chaplains and Y. M. C. A. Secretaries, and the men who are staying at home are endeavoring to fill up the vacant places thus caused, with the Bishop, as usual, doing the lion's share.

A committee was appointed by Bishop Herman Page to arrange for a series of preaching missions for the ensuing year. A Diocesan committee was appointed by the Bishop to attend to what is known as the Bishop's Penny Fund, which goes towards the work in the district. It was originated in St. John's Church, Spokane, by Mrs. J. R. Neeley, and quite a few dollars have found their way to a good work by means of pennies.

The usual boards and committees were elected and appointed. The Sunday-school Conference held on Tuesday evening was led by the Rev. H. I. Oberholtzer.

The Girls' Friendly Society presented a program for the benefit of their Liberty Bond purchased a few weeks ago. They report a successful year, and are planning for greater things this year.

The Secretary and the Registrar of the Convocation is the Rev. H. H. Mitchell, to whom all journals should be sent as well as any communications for the district. The Women's Auxiliary held their annual meetings at St. Matthew's Church, Spokane, and had a very interesting and profitable series of sessions. Mrs. W. H. Farnham was duly elected as President for 1918.

WYOMING.

Rt. Rev. Nat. S. Thomas, D. D., Bishop

Semi-Centennial, St. Mark's, Cheyenne.

During the week of May 12-19 a memorable event was celebrated by St. Mark's Church, Cheyenne, Wyoming, being the semi-centennial of St. Mark's parish, commemorating the erection of the first church, 1868; the first services in the present church, 1888; and the cancellation of the indebtedness on the parish house, 1918.

Over two hundred communicants and well wishers of St. Mark's gathered at a fellowship supper held in the parish house on Thursday evening, May 16. A number of out of town guests were present and assisted in the splendid program of addresses given following the supper. It was a notable occasion, and many tributes were paid to Cheyenne's first rector, the Rev. Joseph W. Cook, whose pioneer work in this vicinity secured the building of the first church in 1868; to the Rev. George C. Rafter, who for twenty-two years served the parish as its rector and who still serves it as its beloved rector emeritus; to Bishop N. S. Thomas, under whose inspiration the parish house was built; and to the present rector, the Rev. S. A. Huston, whose rectorship marks the cancellation of the indebtedness upon the parish house.

The addresses, reminiscent in character, were given by Mr. Frank S. Burrage, member of the vestry of St. Matthew's Cathedral, Laramie, who has lived in Wyoming a number of years, by Dr. Rafter, who declared his intention of spending the rest of his days with St. Mark's; by Bishop Thomas; by Bishop Johnson, of Colorado, who was a guest on this occasion; by Dean Thornberry, of St. Matthew's Cathedral, an old friend and classmate of Mr. Huston, and by Mr. Luke Voorhees and Mr. J. H. Walton, of the present vestry.

St. Mark's Guild, successor to St. Mark's Mite Society of former days, entertained the women of the parish on the afternoon of May 17, and on that evening the Bishop confirmed a class.

Services on the morning of Whitsunday were in commemoration of the twenty-fifth anniversary of the consecration of the present beautiful structure, one of the finest now to be seen. The rector's sermon was on the text, "Ye are the temple of the Living God."

NEW MEXICO.

Rt. Rev. F. B. Howden, D. D., Bishop.

Progress in the Diocese.

At the Annual Convocation, recently held in Albuquerque, the progress made under the present Bishop was noted, specially the freeing from debt of the Bishop's house, and the consecration of several churches.

The first Convocation in New Mexico was held in Albuquerque, in May, 1880, thirty-eight years ago. The Missionary District then comprised the two territories of New Mexico and Arizona. Three Clergy from the district, along with Bishop Spalding, of Colorado, were in attendance. There were probably less than one hundred communicants then in New Mexico, and in Arizona probably no more. We had no Clergy then in Arizona. The conditions of today are in marked contrast with the feeble beginnings of work then. Now there are about four thousand communicants in the two States. Two persons present at the Convocation in 1880 are still in New Mexico, the Rev. D. A. Sanford, the missionary at Gallup (who was present at the Convocation this year), and Ex-Governor Prince, of Santa Fe, now in feeble health, and for whom resolutions of sympathy were passed by the Convocation.

Like As a Father.

My child is lying on my knee,
The signs of Heaven she reads;
My face is all the Heaven she sees—
Is all the Heaven she needs.

And she is well, yea, bathed in bliss,
If Heaven is in my face—
Behind it all is tenderness,
And truthfulness and grace.

I mean her well so earnestly,
Unchanged in changing mood;
My life would go without a sigh
To bring her something good.

I also am a child, and I Am ignorant and weak;
I gaze upon the starry sky,
And then I must not speak.

For all behind the starry sky,
Behind the world so broad,
Behind men's hearts and souls, doth lie
The Infinite of God.

If true to her, though dark with doubt
I cannot choose but be,
Thou, who dost see all round about,
Art surely true to me.

If I am low and sinful, bring
More love where need is rife;
Thou knowest what an awful thing
It is to be a Life.

Hast Thou not wisdom to enwrap
My waywardness around,
And hold me quietly on the lap
Of Love without a bound?

And so I sit in Thy wide space,
My child upon my knee;
She looketh up into my face,
And I look up to Thee.
—George MacDonald.

How many of us worship through sense? We say, "It made me feel so good;" and that may be a very great blessing provided it made you honest and pure and true. What Moses was getting in the mount was a law of right, while the people were getting a worship to make them feel good. Feeling is a very blessed thing when based on honest conviction; and it is a very transitory and treacherous thing when it is simply the indulgence of a sensation. Truth can be carried into minds on the wave of God-given song. Into which it never else could enter. But the waves of sound may go in, and leave the truth outside. Let us thank God that feeling is a privilege, not a gauge of faith or Christian life either.

Christianity and the Community

Thy Kingdom Come on Earth

AN APPRECIATION AND A NOTICE.

Nearly four years ago the Rev. W. Russell Bowie, D. D., rector of St. Paul's Church, Richmond, at our request undertook the editorship of this page of the Southern Churchman, under the caption and motto of his own selection, to be devoted to the general subject of Social Service. He has never cared to have his name appear upon it, seeing in it only another opportunity of fulfilling his ministry to men; but in the midst of the duties which crowded his busy life, and even when absent on vacation or taking duty in distant cities, his "copy" has never been wanting. Always limited as to space, he would usually fail to direct that matter of his own composition should be "lead," so that his readers have perhaps not recognized the amount of original work he has contributed or the full measure of their indebtedness to his ready pen.

Having entered the Service as Chaplain of the Medical College of Virginia Hospital Unit, Dr. Bowie is obliged to relinquish this task. For ourselves and our readers we thank him for the valuable work he has done for us and them, and wish him God-speed in his new labors and a safe return.

For the present at least this "Christianity and the Community" page will be under the editorial charge of the Rev. R. Cary Montague, a gentleman thoroughly fitted both by culture and experience to conduct it. We shall hope soon to reckon him as a permanent addition to our staff.

A typographical error occurred on this page last week, when, in quoting the amendment to the Virginia Canon it was made to read "the vestries as lay readers of the congregation," whereas it should have read "the vestries as lay leaders of the congregation."

Ever since the Belgium atrocities and the sinking of the Lusitania most of us have realized that the call to arms was a Christian call, and the struggle in which we are now engaged was one of right against might. But rarely has this fact been more simply and clearly stated than in the following letter written by a young Canadian bank employee to his mother.

This young man was just a private in the Canadian forces, and he only expresses in this letter, which was published in the Indianapolis Tribune, what hundreds of thousands of us feel both "over there" and over here:

Mother, dear, your letters worry me, worry me considerably. It is evident that you do not understand, but I shall put it to you this way: Do you realize that Christ was the first one to fall in the present war?

How? Well, simply this: The very principles for which Christ gave His life are identically those principles for which Britain is to-day giving her life-blood. It is an old struggle and Christ Himself was the first martyr to the cause. We are fighting for principles. Right against might. Would the world be worth living in if might and might alone prevailed?

Therefore, mother, rather than pray that Harry and I should never be sent to the front, pray that we shall acquit ourselves like men and be strong, for we are on duty primarily for God. Don't feel badly if you hear that we have been specially detailed for dangerous work. Rather look on it as an honor and a special privilege that we should be chosen for special duty in upholding the cause for which Christ laid down His life. If you pray for our return and only for our return, it is selfishness. Other mothers have been called on to endure greater sacrifices than any we can endure in this war.

Pray for victory, for right; pray that we shall be able to do our duty faithfully and if we fall in the cause of Christ, remember, mother dear, that "greater love hath no man than this that he lay down his life for his friends."

Personally, I don't want to go back except with honor and a clear conscience of having done my duty. Life under any other circumstances after the war would not be worth while.

Recently the governor of a great Southern State, in which are located large army cantonments, called a conference to discuss the suppression of vice.

He invited doctors, ministers, lawyers, heads of police departments and social workers.

Some excellent addresses were delivered by persons invited to speak and whose names appeared upon the printed program. Among these was an admiral and a general of the United States army.

These speeches were good and were appreciated, but the real life of the meeting came from the impromptu remarks brought forth by the informal discussion of the second half of the day.

Three really vital points were brought forward by these last named speakers.

First, a commonwealth's attorney emphatically declared that the real way to stop the spread of venereal disease was by a law requiring the listing of every case treated by physicians by name and address and not by serial number.

Second. The establishment of a single standard of morals in sexual conduct instead of having one standard for men and another for women was earnestly advocated by a man and heartily applauded by all present.

What a disgrace it is to our Christian civilization and to the influence of our churches, that a man can betray and mislead a girl, and leave her facing physical suffering and danger, moral disgrace and social ostracism with an added and a well-nigh insupportable financial burden, and go scot free!

Every church and every minister should be an eager and fearless advocate of drastic bastardy laws to protect such girls and bring to book their seducers, and so to raise the moral standards of men that such conduct would bring disgrace upon the man as well as the woman.

These objects cannot be accomplished without plain and courageous preaching. The time has come when the minister should lay aside prudishness and false modesty and stand forth fearlessly as the champion of new and better order of things.
